When Mrs. Lovel went up stairs into Lady Anna's room not a word was said about the occurrence of the morning. The elder lady was afraid to ask a question, and the younger was fully determined to tell nothing even had a question been asked her. Lord Lovel might say what he pleased. Her secret was with him, and he could tell it if he chose. She had given him permission to do so, of which, no doubt, he would avail himself. But, on her own account, she would say nothing; and when questioned she would merely admit the fact. She would neither defend her engagement, nor would she submit to have it censured. If they pleased, she would return to her mother in London at any shortest possible notice.

The party lunched almost in silence, and when the horses were ready Lord Lovel came in to help them into the carriage. When he had placed the three ladies, he desired Minnie to take the fourth seat, saying that he would sit with Mr. Cross on the box. Minnie looked at his face, but there was still the frown there, and she obeyed him without any remonstrance. During the whole of the long journey home there was hardly a word spoken. Lady Anna knew that she was in disgrace, and was ignorant how much of her story had been told to the two elder ladies. She sat almost motionless looking out upon the fields, and accepting her position as one that was no longer thought worthy of notice. Of course she must go back to London. She could not continue to live at Yoxham, neither spoken to nor speaking. Minnie went to sleep, and Minnie's mother and aunt now and then addressed a few words to each other. Anna felt sure that to the latest day of her existence she would remember that journey. On their arrival at the rectory door Mr. Cross helped the ladies out of the carriage, while the lord affected to make himself busy with the shawls and luggage. Then he vanished, and was seen no more till he appeared at dinner.

"What sort of a trip have you had?" asked the rector, addressing himself to the three ladies indifferently.

For a moment nobody answered him, and then Aunt Julia spoke. "It was very pretty, as it always is at Bolton in summer—we were told that the Duke has not been there this year at all. The inn was very comfortable, and I think that the young people enjoyed themselves yesterday very much." The subject was too important, too solemn, too great, to allow of even a word to be said about it without proper consideration.

"Did Frederic like it?"

"I think he did yesterday," said Mrs. Lovel. "I think we were all a little tired coming home to-day."

"Anna sprained her ankle jumping over the Stryd," said Minnie.

"Not seriously, I hope."

"Oh dear, no; nothing at all to signify." It was the only word which she spoke till it was suggested that she should go up to her room. The girl obeyed, as a child might have done, and went up stairs, followed by Mrs. Lovel. "My dear," she said, "we can not go on like this. What is the matter?"

"You must ask Lord Lovel."

"Have you quarreled with him?"

"I have not quarreled, Mrs. Lovel. If he has quarreled with me, I can not help it."

"You know what we have all wished."

"It can never be so."

"Have you said so to Frederic?"

"I have."

"Have you given him any reason, Anna?"

"I have," she said, after a pause.

"What reason, dear?"

She thought for a moment before she replied. "I was obliged to tell him the reason, Mrs. Lovel; but I don't think that I need tell any body else. Of course I must tell mamma."

"Does your mamma know it?"

"Not yet."

"And is it a reason that must last forever?"

"Yes—forever. But I do not know why every body is to be angry with me. Other girls may do as they please. If you are angry with me, I had better go back to London at once."

"I do not know that any body has been angry with you. We may be disappointed without being angry." That was all that was said, and then Lady Anna was left to dress for dinner. At dinner Lord Lovel had so far composed himself as to be able to speak to his cousin, and an effort at courtesy was made by them all, except by the rector. But the evening passed away in a manner very different from any that had gone before it.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TOO HEAVY FOR SECRETS.

DURING the night the young lord was still thinking of his future conduct—of what duty and honor demanded of him, and of the manner in which he might best make duty and honor consort with his interests. In all the emergencies of his short life he had hitherto had some one to advise him, some elder friend whose counsel he might take even though he would seem to make little use of it when it was offered to him. He had always somewhat disdained Aunt Julia, but nevertheless Aunt Julia had been very useful to him. In later days, since the late Earl's death, when there came upon him the necessity of setting aside that madman's will, as the first of his troubles, Mr. Flick had been his chief counselor, and yet in all his communications with Mr. Flick he had assumed to be his own guide and master. Now it seemed that he must, in truth, guide himself, but he knew not how to do it. Of one thing he felt certain. He must get away from Yoxham and hurry up to London.

It behooved him to keep his cousin's secret, but would he not be keeping it with a sanctity sufficiently strict if he imparted it to one sworn friend—a friend who should be bound not to divulge it further without his consent? If so, the Solicitor-General should be his friend. An intimacy had grown up between the great lawyer and his noble client, not social in its nature, but still sufficiently close, as Lord Lovel thought, to admit of such confidence. He had begun to be aware that without assistance of this nature he would not know how to guide himself. Undoubtedly the wealth of the presumed heiress had become dearer to him—had become at least more important to him—since he had learned that it must probably be lost. Sir William Patterson was a gentleman as well as a lawyer—one who had not simply risen to legal rank by diligence and intellect, but a gentleman born and bred, who had been at a public school, and had lived all his days with people of the right sort. Sir William was his legal adviser, and he would commit Lady Anna's secret to the keeping of Sir William.

There was a coach which started in those days from York at noon, reaching London early on the following day. He would go up by this coach, and would thus avoid the necessity of much further association with his family before he had decided what should be his conduct. But he must see his cousin before he went. He therefore sent a note to her before she had left her room on the following morning:

"DEAR ANNA,—I purpose starting for London in an hour or so, and wish to say one word to you before I go. Will you meet me at nine in the drawing-room? Do not mention my going to my uncle or aunts, as it will be better that I should tell them myself.

"Yours, L."

At ten minutes before nine Lady Anna was in the drawing-room waiting for him, and at ten minutes past nine he joined her.

"I beg your pardon for keeping you waiting." She gave him her hand, and said that it did not signify in the least. She was always early.

"I find that I must go up to London at once," he said. To this she made no answer, though he seemed to expect some reply. "In the first place, I could not remain here in comfort after what you told me yesterday."

"I shall be sorry to drive you away. It is your home; and as I must go soon, had I not better go at once?"

"No—that is, I think not. I shall go, at any rate. I have told none of them what you told me yesterday."

"I am glad of that, Lord Lovel."

"It is for you to tell it, if it must be told."

"I did tell your aunt Jane—that you and I never can be as—you said you wished."

"I did wish it most heartily. You did not tell it—all?"

"No—not all."

"You astounded me so that I could hardly speak to you as I should have spoken. I did not mean to be uncourteous."

"I did not think you uncourteous, Lord Lovel. I am sure you would not be uncourteous to me."

"But you astounded me. It is not that I think much of myself, or of my rank as belonging to me. I know that I have but little to be proud of. I am very poor—and not clever like some young men who have not large fortunes, but who can become statesmen and all that. But I do think much of my order; I think much of being a gentleman—and much of ladies being ladies. Do you understand me?"

"Oh yes—I understand you."

"If you are Lady Anna Lovel—"

"I am Lady Anna Lovel."

"I believe you are with all my heart. You speak like it, and look like it. You are fit for any position. Every thing is in your favor. I do believe it. But if so—"

"Well, Lord Lovel—if so?"

"Surely you would not choose to—to—to degrade your rank. That is the truth. If I be your cousin, and the head of your family, I have a right to speak as much. What you told me would be degradation."

She thought a moment, and then she replied to him, "It would be no disgrace."

He too found himself compelled to think before he could speak again. "Do you think that you could like your associates if you were to be married to Mr. Thwaite?"

"I do not know who they would be. He would be my companion, and I like him. I love him dearly. There! you need not tell me, Lord Lovel. I know it all. He is not like you—and I, when I had been his wife, should not be like your aunt Jane. I should never see people of that sort any more, I suppose. We should not live here in England at all—so that I should escape the scorn of all my cousins. I know what I am doing, and why I am doing it—and I do not think you ought to tempt me."

She knew at least that she was open to temptation. He could perceive that, and was thankful for it.

"I do not wish to tempt you, but I would save you from unhappiness if I could. Such a marriage would be unnatural. I have not seen Mr. Thwaite."

"Then, my lord, you have not seen a most excellent man, who, next to my mother, is my best friend."

"But he can not be a gentleman."

"I do not know; but I do know that I can be his wife. Is that all, Lord Lovel?"

"Not quite all. I fear that this weary lawsuit will come back upon us in some shape. I can not say whether I have the power to stop it if I would. I must in part be guided by others."

"I can not do any thing. If I could, I would not even ask for the money for myself."

"No, Lady Anna. You and I can not decide it. I must again see my lawyer. I do not mean the attorney—but Sir William Patterson, the Solicitor-General. May I tell him what you told me yesterday?"

"I can not hinder you."

"But you can give me your permission. If he will promise me that it shall go no farther—then may I tell him? I shall hardly know what to do unless he knows all that I know."

"Every body will know soon."

"Nobody shall know from me—but only he. Will you say that I may tell him?"

"Oh yes."

"I am much indebted to you even for that. I can not tell you now how much I hoped when I got up yesterday morning at Bolton Bridge that I should have to be indebted to you for making me the happiest man in England. You must forgive me if I say that I still hope at heart that this infatuation may be made to cease. And now, good-by, Lady Anna."

"Good-by, Lord Lovel."

She at once went to her room, and sent down her maid to say that she would not appear at prayers or at breakfast. She would not see him again before he went. How probable it was that her eyes had rested on his form for the last time! How beautiful he was—how full of grace, how like a god! How pleasant she had found it to be near him! How full of ineffable sweetness had been every thing that he had touched, all things of which he had spoken to her! He had almost overcome her, as though she had eaten of the lotus, and she knew not whether the charm was of God or devil. But she did know that she had struggled against it, because of her word, and because she owed a debt which falsehood and ingratitude would ill repay. Lord Lovel had called her Lady Anna now. Ah, yes; how good he was! When it became significant to her that he should recognize her rank, he did so at once. He had only dropped the title when, having been recognized, it had become a stumbling-block to her. Now he was gone from her, and, if it was possible, she would cease even to dream of him.

"I suppose, Frederic, that the marriage is not to be?" the rector said to him, as he got into the dog-cart at the rectory door.

"I can not tell. I do not know. I think not. But, uncle, would you oblige me by not speaking of it just at present? You will know all very soon."

The rector stood on the gravel, watching the dog-cart as it disappeared, with his hands in the pockets of his clerical trowsers, and with heavy signs of displeasure on his face. It was very well to be uncle to an earl, and out of his wealth to do what he could to assist, and, if possible, to dispel, his noble nephew's poverty. But surely something was due to him! It was not for his pleasure that this girl—whom he was forced to call Lady Anna, though he could never quite believe her to be so, whom his wife and sister called Cousin Anna, though he still thought that she was not, and could not be, cousin to any body—it was not for any thing that he could get that he was entertaining her as an honored guest at his rectory. And now his nephew was gone, and the girl was left behind. And he was not to be told whether there was to be a marriage or not! "I can not tell. I do not know. I think not." And then he was curtly requested to ask no more questions. What was he to do with the girl? While the young Earl and the lawyers were still pondering the question of her legitimacy, the girl, whether a Lady Anna and a cousin—or a mere nobody, who was trying to rob the family—was to be left on his hands! Why, oh, why had he allowed himself to be talked out of his own opinion? Why had he ever permitted her to be invited to his rectory? Ah, how the title stuck in his throat as he asked her to take the customary glass of wine with him at dinner-time that evening!

On reaching London, toward the end of August, Lord Lovel found that the Solicitor-General was out of town. Sir William had gone down to Somersetshire with the intention of saying some comforting words to his constituents. Mr. Flick knew nothing of his movements, but his clerk was found, and his clerk did not expect him back in London till October. But in answer to Lord Lovel's letter Sir William undertook to come up for one day. Sir William was a man who quite recognized the importance of the case he had in hand.

"Engaged to the tailor, is she?" he said, not, however, with any look of surprise.

"But, Sir William, you will not repeat this, even to Mr. Flick or to Mr. Hardy. I have promised Lady Anna that it shall not go beyond you."

"If she sticks to her bargain it can not be kept secret very long. Nor would she wish it. It's just what we might have expected, you know."

"You wouldn't say so if you knew her."

"H—m. I'm older than you, Lord Lovel. You see, she had nobody else near her. A girl must cotton to somebody, and who was there? We ought not to be angry with her."

"But it shocks me so."

"Well, yes. As far as I can learn, his father and he have stood by them very closely, and did so, too, when there seemed to be but little hope. But they might be paid for all they did at a less rate than that. If she sticks to him, nobody can beat him out of it. What I mean is that it was all fair game. He ran his chance, and did it in a manly fashion."

The Earl did not quite understand Sir William, who seemed to take almost a favorable view of these monstrous betrothals.

"What I mean is that nobody can touch him or find fault with him. He has not carried her away and got up a marriage before she was of age. He hasn't kept her from going out among her friends. He hasn't—wronged her, I suppose?"

"I think he has wronged her frightfully."

"Ah—well. We mean different things. I am obliged to look at it as the world will look at it."

"Think of the disgrace of such a marriage—to a tailor."

"Whose father had advanced her mother some five or six thousand pounds to help her to win back her position. That's about the truth of it. We must look at it all round, you know."

"You think, then, that nothing should be done?"

"I think that every thing should be done that can be done. We have the mother on our side. Very probably we may have old Thwaite on our side. From what you say it is quite possible that at this very moment the girl herself may be on our side. Let her remain at Yoxham as long as you can get her to stay, and let every thing be done to flatter and amuse her. Go down again yourself, and play the lover as well as I do not doubt you know how to do it." It was clear, then, that the great legal pundit did not think that an earl should be ashamed to carry on his suit to a lady who had confessed her attachment to a journeyman tailor. "It will be a trouble to us all, of course, because we must change our plan when the case comes on in November."

"But you still think that she is the heiress?"

"So strongly that I feel all but sure of it. We shouldn't, in truth, have had a leg to stand on, and we couldn't fight it. I may as well tell you at once, my lord, that we couldn't do it with any chance of success. And what should we have gained had we done so? Nothing. Unless we could prove that the real wife were dead, we should have been fighting for that Italian woman, whom I most thoroughly believe to be an impostor."

"Then there is nothing to be done?"

"Very little in that way. But if the young lady be determined to marry the tailor, I think we should simply give notice that we withdraw our opposition to the English ladies, and state that we had so informed the woman who asserts her own claim and calls herself a countess in Sicily; and we should let the Italian woman know that we had done so. In such case, for aught any body can say here, she might come forward with her own case. She would find men here who would take it up on speculation readily enough. There would be a variety of complications, and no doubt very great delay. In such an event we should question very closely the nature of the property; as, for aught I have seen as yet, a portion of it might revert to you as real estate. It is very various, and it is not always easy to declare at once what is real and what personal. Hitherto you have appeared as contesting the right of the English widow to her rank, and not necessarily as a claimant of the estate. The Italian widow, if a widow, would be the heir, and not your lordship. For that, among other reasons, the marriage would be most expedient. If the Italian Countess were to succeed in proving that the Earl had a wife living when he married Miss Murray—which I feel sure he had not—then we should come forward again with our endeavors to show that that first wife had died since—as the Earl himself undoubtedly declared more than once. It would be a long time before the tailor got his money with his wife. The feeling of the court would be against him."

"Could we buy the tailor, Sir William?"

The Solicitor-General nursed his leg before he answered.

"Mr. Flick could answer that question better than I can do. In fact, Mr. Flick should know it all. The matter is too heavy for secrets, Lord Lovel."

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WHERE are now the prophets that a few months ago predicted to us that the polonaise was to be abandoned? Where are now those that foretold the return of plain long dresses without over-skirts? Folds, poufs, and drapings continue to prevail, and no one can foresee the time when they will be thrown aside.

We must mention, however, an attempt that is made in the direction of doing away with the over-skirt. This is a simple costume, designed for morning wear and traveling, and is composed of a skirt, more or less trimmed, according to fancy, and a man's coat, made of the same material as the skirt. To form an idea of the shape of this coat it is necessary to go back to the recollections of our childhood, and to call to mind the gentlemen visitors, who wore in the daytime something between a dress and a frock coat—a coat with rounded skirts cut away toward the back, and called, as nearly as I remember, the Bonjour. This is the garment which our ladies have adopted, and which they wear with assurance, rolling collar, metal buttons, and all, over a little vest of white piqué. The skirt which accompanies this coat is, in general (there are exceptions), little trimmed. It resembles the skirt of a riding-habit in cut, and is pleated in front, the pleats being bordered with a flat bias fold, which extends in three rows around the bottom of the side and back breadths. I must not omit to say that the coat is tight-fitting in both the front and the back. The fashion, moreover, is fully fixed as regards the use of figured and plain fabrics. The first are used for trained dresses, for dinner and evening, and for the polonaises of suits worn in the daytime. The plain fabrics are used also for trained dresses, and for the skirts of suits for day wear; these skirts are never made of figured stuffs. Striped fabrics alone, and hardly these, are admissible for such skirts, which are always of plain material, and usually a little darker than the polonaise. It is important to add that fashion permits polonaises of the lightest tints to be worn over dark or even black skirts, but interdicts the wearing of a black or dark polonaise over a skirt of a lighter shade. All these details are doubtless minute, and may seem puerile, but it is their assemblage that constitutes the true air of Parisian fashion, which strangers outside of Paris so rarely possess. For instance, a lady wearing a black or dark polonaise over a light skirt would be at once detected by any little Paris shop-girl, not fifteen years old, as being a foreigner, while if the polonaise was light and the skirt dark, the wearer would escape the least suspicion of her ignorance as regards the fashions. The art of dress here is composed of a host of petty details, almost too small to be discerned, but which, all together, constitute a sort of freemasonry by which one Parisian knows another.

At the sea-side white polonaises will be much worn, of materials varying in thickness, according to the temperature, from fine white flannel embroidered with worsted or silk to canvas guipure and other transparent fabrics, passing through the intermediate sponge tissues of cotton, composed of little flocks resembling the curled moquette used for carpets; the Mouzaia, an Arabian fabric of plush-like cotton and white silk, satiny and brilliant; and challie, with broad or narrow and perpendicular or horizontal stripes. Sometimes the latter is cut on the bias for polonaises, so as to produce the effect of vertical stripes—a fantastic and by no means commendable caprice, which makes the garment look awry, from whatever side it is viewed.

May polonaises, casaques, wrappings, and waists are made to button diagonally—that is, on the side. We must remind the lovers of this style that the choice of these details of fashion should be subordinate to the size and figure, as well as the age, of the wearer. Waists buttoned diagonally, like revers waists, should be sedulously avoided by all women inclined to embonpoint.

Marshal M'Mahon receives twice a week a numerous and elegant assemblage, which as to fashion is quite in accordance with the position of his wife, the daughter of the Duke de Castries. One of the sons of the Duke de Castries, and consequently the brother of Madame De M'Mahon, about twelve years ago married the daughter of the wealthy Greek banker, Sina, one of the richest men in Vienna. Paris, which exists above all through elegance, has complained a little of the respectable simplicity to which Madame Thiers was devoted, and on which her receptions were modeled. These complaints, doubtless, were not based on austere principles; but what then? It was necessary, first of all, to purge France of the Germans, who had lowered war to their standard, and made it a profitable speculation; to rid herself of them, she must have money; to have money, it was necessary to produce; to produce, it was necessary to work; and to work, it was necessary to have a market for articles of luxury, for it was by these alone that her heavy taxes could be paid. And this is why the elegant receptions of M. and Madame De M'Mahon delight the Parisians, lately grieved at the too bourgeois simplicity of M. and Madame Thiers.

I will describe some of the dresses worn at the President's last reception. Trained dress of pale maize faille with watered stripes. Over-skirt of pale maize tulle, trimmed on the bottom with flounces and puffs of the same tulle, mixed with white lace flounces. Low waist. The over-skirt was looped with clusters of pink chestnut blossoms. The same flowers were arranged in a pouf at the bottom of the waist, and were worn, mixed with diamonds, in the hair.

Dress of écru satin, covered with écru gauze, draped here and there with palm branches embroidered in turquoise blue beads. Low waist entirely covered with the same embroidery, forming a cuirass. Turquoise necklace. Wreath of myosotis.

Trained dress of Bengal rose faille. Very long over-skirt of white Chambéry gauze, with broad rose-colored stripes. This over-skirt, which was draped very far back, had broad revers of rose-colored faille. Low waist of white Chambéry gauze, with a plastron of rose-colored faille. No trimming on either the skirt or over-skirt. Wreath of Bengal roses with diamond centres.

I have seen for young girls from eight to fourteen years old very simple and elegant and, above all, practical dresses; some composed of a percale skirt, with stripes alternately white and colored, such as pale blue, pink, rouille, prune, etc.; and a polonaise of white piqué, scalloped on the edge and bordered with white braid. Other suits for girls of the same age had a dress with high neck and half-tight sleeves, of striped percale, like those just described. Over-skirt of white dotted nansook, scalloped on the edge, or bordered with a flat band of English embroidery. Bretelles of nansook, like the over-skirt, pleated crosswise their whole length, and trimmed like the over-skirt, crossed each other over the front and back of the waist, and were finished at the belt, behind, by a large nansook bow, with rounded ends trimmed like the over-skirt, which was draped under the arms by similar bows. These bows are sometimes of ribbon of the same color as the stripes of the dress. For more elegant toilettes the dress is of striped foulard, and the over-skirt and bretelles of white muslin, with ribbons to match the dress. No other wrapping is worn. The over-skirt is sometimes trimmed with a pleated flounce, scalloped on the edge.

Fans have assumed formidable dimensions. They are designed not only to cool the atmosphere, but also as a protection from the rays of the sun. If they grow much larger, they can be used to keep off the rain as well, and will serve the purpose of an umbrella or a roof.

Stockings—for Fashion deigns also to occupy herself with them—summer stockings are écru, for the most part, embroidered either with white or with a color to match the dress.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

FROM "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS."

PEOPLE who live at a distance are naturally less faulty than those immediately under our own eyes; and it seems superfluous, when we consider the remote geographical position of the Ethiopians, and how very little the Greeks had to do with them, to inquire further why Homer calls them "blameless."

The happiest women, like the happiest nations, have no history.

We are all apt to believe what the world believes about us.

There are possibilities which our minds shrink from too completely for us to fear them.

A suppressed resolve will betray itself in the eyes.

A boy's sheepishness is by no means a sign of overmastering reverence; and while you are making encouraging advances to him under the idea that he is overwhelmed by a sense of your age and wisdom, ten to one he is thinking you extremely queer. The only consolation I can suggest to you is, that the Greek boys probably thought the same of Aristotle. It is only when you have mastered a restive horse, or thrashed a drayman, or have got a gun in your hand, that these shy juniors feel you to be a truly admirable and enviable character.

The responsibility of tolerance lies with those who have the wider vision.

ALESSANDRO MANZONI—THE FUNERAL PROCESSION AT MILAN.

ALESSANDRO MANZONI.

ALESSANDRO MANZONI died in Milan on May 23 and as he was born March 7, 1785, he had completed his eighty-eighth year. With him Italy has lost her greatest poet and novelist of the century, Milan its greatest citizen, the world a great and good man. His early days were unmarked by any wonderful scholastic achievement. His mother, Donna Julia Beccaria, daughter of the celebrated reformer of the penal system in Italy, had sent him to a collegiate school in Brianza, and soon had to remove him, for the good friars who conducted the school had found that he was too ignorant to be able to profit by their lessons. Manzoni, however, pursued his studies in Milan and Pavia, and in the year 1805 went to Paris to join his illustrious mother, who was living there among the best scientific and artistic society.

The Urania, a mythological poem, was his first important poetical work, and was published in Milan in 1809, one year after he had been married to Louisa Henrietta Blondel, a Protestant, daughter to a banker of Geneva. In the mean time Manzoni's religious opinions had undergone a change. The Voltairian philosopher had become an ardent Roman Catholic. Possibly the conversion of his wife to the Roman Catholic faith was the cause of this great change, but Manzoni would never answer inquiries on his inner life. While in Paris he became acquainted with the apostle of negro emancipation, the famous Abbé Grégoire, who with his enthusiastic eloquence had not a little shaken his philosophical faith. But whatever the reason was, it is certain that young Manzoni acquired so firm a conviction of the goodness of his new creed that he remained true to it the whole of his life.

His Inni Sacri were the fruits of this change, and noble fruits they were, for they soon became, and will long be, most popular throughout Italy.

The famous tragedy, by which were abolished the two unities of time and place, the Conte di Carmagnola, was published in 1819. Goethe, the great German poet, answering the unjust criticisms published in Italy upon it, wrote a long eulogy of the work, by which Manzoni felt, perhaps, somewhat encouraged, and published his other tragedy, the Adelchi. Upon the death of Napoleon, in 1821, he wrote the Fifth of May ("Il Cinque Maggio"), an ode, which is the most lyrical and the most perfectly poetical composition that has been written in Italy during the present century.

But his grandest work appeared in 1827. I Promessi Sposi is a novel which has been translated into every European language. The hardest battles have been and are still being fought on this admirable work. Some people, in their patriotic enthusiasm, which, however, seems to us much mistaken, assert that it is too religious, and that the faith in God, which breathes from every page, would never create a band of patriot soldiers like those of the five days of Milan in 1848; others, on the contrary, affirm that it is precisely the teachings of Manzoni that made those patriot soldiers. Manzoni's subsequent works would have met with better success had they been published before his novel. It is, however, asserted that numerous and valuable manuscripts have been left behind, a complete history of the French Revolution among others, which will soon be published.

Not a distinguished personage went to Milan and departed without having visited Manzoni. He was a monument to be seen. Not curiosity, but admiration and respect were the chief attractions. When the Emperor of Brazil, on his late European tour, called on him, Manzoni was going to thank his Majesty for the honor of his visit, but his Majesty, interrupting him, said, "I must thank you for having received me. Before long nobody will know who Dom Pedro d'Alcantara was, while Manzoni will be known to future ages."

One of his last thoughts was to beg pardon of his servants if in his moments of delirium he had uttered any word that might have been offensive or disrespectful to them.

Manzoni was not a count or a nobleman. When the Austrians, in 1815, took possession of Milan, they called upon the ancient nobility to send their names and petition them for preserving their titles. Manzoni took no notice of the extraordinary injunction, and thereby lost his feudal nobility and title before the world.

Universally respected and beloved as Manzoni was, all Italy flocked to his funeral, and special trains brought crowds of mourners to Milan, eager to pay the last honors to their poet-patriot. The funeral itself was one of the grandest ever witnessed even in Italy. King Victor Emanuel sent representatives, and Prince Humbert and the Duke of Aosta attended, together with countless others of the best-known names of the Italian kingdom. The body lay for two days in state at the Municipal Palace, and on the day of the funeral the streets, lined throughout with a dense crowd, kept in order by detachments of cavalry, were hung with black, all the balconies and windows being draped with sombre hangings and forests of veiled flags. Regimental bands playing funeral marches, and a body of nuns with lighted tapers, and singing portions of a very beautiful Messe Solennelle, accompanied the procession, which must have been full a mile in length. Behind the hearse followed the Duke of Aosta and his suite. Above the entrance to the cathedral was the simple inscription, "To Alessandro Manzoni." The interior was hung with black and silver facings, the coffin being deposited on the top of a sarcophagus during the ceremony. The Archbishop of Milan officiated, the service lasting over an hour. After this the procession moved on to the cemetery, where, according to Continental custom, a few warm and touching speeches were made on the career of the dead poet.

An accompanying illustration gives a fine picture of Manzoni, and the illustration on page 460 shows the funeral procession, with the celebrated Duomo of Milan in the background.

ALESSANDRO MANZONI.

HAIR FAIR IN A FRENCH VILLAGE.

THE illustration presents a curious study of life in the interior of France. The demand for false hair is so great that the French hair merchants are compelled to scour the country to satisfy their needs. The fair hair comes from the northern provinces, especially from Picardy. The south and west furnish the dark and black hair. The Picardy lasses exchange their blonde locks for pictures or jewels (false, of course); but those of the south are more material, and will only part with their tresses for dry-goods or money. At stated seasons hair fairs are held in the principal towns of the district, to which the damsels repair to dispose of their flowing locks to an assembled crowd of French and English buyers. A platform is erected in the middle of the market-place, which the young girls mount in turn, and the auctioneer extols his merchandise, and calls for bids. One offers a couple of silk handkerchiefs, another a dozen yards of calico, a third a magnificent pair of high-heeled boots, and so on. At last the hair is knocked down to the highest bidder, and the girl seats herself in a chair, and is shorn on the spot. Sometimes the parents themselves make the bargain over a bottle of wine or a mug of cider. The girls console themselves for their lost tresses with a jute chignon, which pleases them better than their own hair, seeing that it is the fashion.

CHINESE MOURNING.

WHITE, not black, is the mourning color in China, and mourners wear white clothes, white girdles, white shoes, and even braid white cotton into their queues or pigtails.

The Chinese coffin is generally very solid in its construction, and is broader and deeper at the head than at the foot, sloping straight from one end to the other; the lid is not flat, but raised all down the centre; the seams are always well caulked, and the whole is carefully oiled several times, and finally covered with a black varnish. Well-to-do people repeat these processes once a week for a long period. A common price to pay for a good, ordinarily strong coffin is from ten to fifteen dollars, but the price varies according to the nature of the material employed and its ornamentation, and we have heard of fifty and even a hundred times as much as this sum having been paid for a single coffin. Of course among the very poor classes a much cheaper and slighter one is used, though even they do their utmost to bury their dead in such coffins as we have described. The charitable societies for rescuing life, which exist at nearly all towns on the sea-coast and on the large rivers, provide coffins gratis when their boats bring in dead bodies, but they are made very slightly, and of the commonest wood.

On the death of a father, slips of mourning (that is, white) paper are affixed to each side of the door of the house, and in the higher ranks a board is exhibited there, giving the name, age, dignities, etc., of the departed one. Notice of the death is at once sent to the descendants of the deceased, who all forthwith assemble at the house, and range themselves on the floor round the body, weeping and wailing, and attired in funeral garb; the immediate relatives, too, come and condole with the afflicted family. In some parts it is customary for the friends and intimate acquaintances of the deceased, who have been notified of his death, to bring pieces of white cloth or silk to place over the dead body.

The full term of mourning for parents is nominally three years, but practically twenty-seven months, and for the first month after their decease the mourners are not allowed to shave their heads; they consequently soon assume a wild and unkempt appearance. The very strict place offerings of food, etc., twice a year at their parents' graves, but our own experience goes to show that the customs of the Chinese in this respect are occasionally, at any rate, more exact in theory than in practice. Some five or six years ago we knew an educated Chinaman who would discourse at great length on filial piety and such-like virtues, but who nevertheless confessed to us that he had not been to visit his mother's grave for ten years, although she was buried at a place only fifteen miles distant from where he had been living for a long period.

Etiquette requires that a widow should mourn the death of her husband for three whole years, and even after that period she is somewhat restricted in her choice of colors, red being forbidden her. Should a widow marry again, which is not very frequently the case, for the practice is looked down upon, she, of course, divests herself of all marks and symbols of woe and mourning. Men, however, are not expected to be quite so self-denying and particular in mourning the death of their wives, for they sometimes marry again before they have been widowers for a full year. Should a man's wife be unlucky enough to present him with a "pledge of affection" during the term of mourning for his parent, it is looked upon as highly improper and disrespectful to the deceased.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. L. M. P.—We sell only patterns of entire suits, and do not separate the polonaise from the skirt. The whole suit pattern costs but 25 cents.

MRS. L. C. W.—The Blouse-polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is an excellent model for black grenadine. Trim with a bias puff. See full directions in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI.

MRS. J. R. A.—Make the girl's Victoria lawn suit with a loose belted polonaise, and put ruffles on the polonaise and on skirt, edged with Hamburg embroidery.

ROY LEWIS.—A black poplin or else cashmere over silk would be suitable for a bride's traveling dress in the fall. Your suggestions are very good. Soft light camel's-hair cloth costs from $3 50 to $6; but there are many mohair imitations of it that cost far less. It would be right to send your card in your new name to friends whom you wish to call upon you.

MRS. M. C.—We do not recommend any firm in this column. You must consult our advertising columns for the information you want.

W. D. O.—We can furnish you Bazars containing the "Ugly Girl" papers. There are fifteen, at ten cents each.

A. E.—The Blouse-polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is precisely what you want for your barred muslin suit. Trim with gathered ruffles of the material.

GRACE S.—Do not attempt to make the silk dresses that you will not wear until October. Put them off until September at least. It is impossible for us to advise you positively about them, as there are rumors of marked changes in fashions. It is said that round waists and princesse dresses will supersede basques and polonaises, but it is entirely too soon to speak positively. Pleated waists will be in fashion for a long time to come. There is nothing prettier than Irish poplin for your traveling dress, unless you get cashmere or camel's-hair. Get heavy blue English water-proof, and bind the cape without scalloping it. We have given several directions for graduating dresses. A waist made up of lengthwise box-pleats with Valenciennes insertion between is pretty for a young girl.

E. M. D.—Make a tight châtelaine polonaise of your striped silk, or else have a vest-polonaise, with vest and revers of black silk. Pockets, fraise, and sash, as well as inch-wide facings in the gathered flounces, should also be black.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—Only very small bustles are worn. Grenadine basques are edged with merely a piping of silk; over-skirts of grenadine have usually a puff or side pleating, or else a gathered ruffle. Sleeves are coat-shaped without cuff, but with a puff and ruffle falling toward the wrist.

MRS. W. R. F.—Trim your dress with bias bands of the same. Make kilt suits of linen, piqué, and muslin for your little boy.

MISS M. A.—We have no pamphlet catalogue of patterns. A list of patterns is advertised in most numbers of the Bazar. Pleated blouses are more worn than plain ones.

MRS. J. M. Y.—You will need a new basque to your grenadine suit. Do not line the over-skirt. The loose double-breasted polonaise pattern is the simplest of all the stylish models.

ETTA.—Old ladies wear large-sized straw bonnets with gros grain ribbon trimming. Black and gray straws are more used than white.

M. E. L.—A Swiss muslin polonaise made by the Blouse-polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is what you want with your poplin. Trim it with side pleatings and black velvet bows, and put puffs lengthwise on the front and pleated ruffles on the back of your skirt. Wear a black velvet belt and sash. The same pattern is suitable for your percale polonaise.

MRS. H.—We have not the water-proof duster pattern that you want. Our water-proof cloak pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. III., is the best of its kind.

MRS. O.—An entire set of the patterns coming under the head of Girl's Wardrobe is put up in an envelope, and the package containing all is sold for 25 cents. The double-breasted polonaise, fitted more snugly than for thin goods, is stylish for piqué suits.

PERPLEXED SUBSCRIBER.—The white Swiss, or else a Victoria lawn dress, with black sash and corsage bow, will be suitable for you.

JENNY DEANS.—Use the Single-breasted Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., for your cashmere. Get a black or white chip English walking hat, and trim with turquoise silk the color of your dress, and add gay flowers and ostrich tips.

MRS. C. A. M.—The polonaise pattern sent you is the best model for grenadine. If your skirt is not long enough to cut the entire garment, you can piece it at the waist beneath the belt. Trim with a bias puff of grenadine.

MRS. J. J. M.—The double-breasted polonaise is fastened by buttons and regular button-holes. Instead of the button-holes being too large to be neat, it is now quite a feature to have these large button-holes, and they are considered ornamental. They are now bound with the material in the Louis XIV. style instead of being overcast.

CARA.—Your grenadine is wool and cotton mixed, of very good quality. The white sample is thick Victoria lawn, too heavy for a suit. You should buy a thinner quality.

ALICE.—Velvet buttons, sash, and collar are handsomer than silk on piqué polonaises, yet each is used. A habit shirt is a muslin box-pleated waist; the collarettes attached now to collars are also called habit shirts. A cashmere or light cloth double-breasted sacque of the English jacket shape, trimmed with bias silk, is suitable for a wrap for cool summer days. Satin jean would make a pretty polonaise, but it is difficult to give it a good gloss after washing, hence it has not become a popular fabric.

INQUIRER.—Make a vest-polonaise suit of your two kinds of silk. The darkest blue should make the skirt, vest, sleeves, pockets, cuffs, and sash. Put alternate ruffles of light and dark on the skirt; use the light silk for polonaise, and edge it with a bias band of the darker blue. Have a dark blue fraise lined with light. Consult articles to "Ugly Girls" for treatment of the eyelashes.

ELLA.—A sleeveless jacket would be more stylish with a polonaise than a cape.

C. G.—Take deeper seams under the arms, but not in the darts.

MAY.—Capes are not now worn as parts of suits. The redingote, polonaise, and basque are worn without extra wraps.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.—The Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine combines in a more perfect degree than any other the requirements of a first-class machine. This is the unanimous verdict of the thousands of families who are using them, and its success is unprecedented in the history of sewing-machines. Although it costs fully as much to make as any other, the manufacturer sells direct to the people, but as the company belongs to no "Ring" or combination to keep up prices, they can afford to sell at a much less price. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Repository of Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

FACETIÆ.

SURELY the most practical man of our day has been discovered. A young man down East writing to his sweetheart the other day, said: "I wish, my darling, that you would not write me such long letters. If you were to bring an action for breach of promise against me, the lawyers would copy the correspondence between us, and charge ten cents for every folio of seventy-two words. The shorter the letters the more we save from the lawyers." Strange to say, the young man never received a reply!

WESTERN LANGUAGE.—The Boston Globe fears that foreigners sometimes find it difficult to read our newspaper language, even with a tolerably fair knowledge of its intricacies. What, for instance, could they make of the following from a Western paper: "The mayor galooted up the church aisle, swashaying and gyrating like a Chinese Joss with the jim-jams?"

HYPOTHESIS.—At a late examination of civil-service candidates, a question was put to them as to the meaning of "hypothesis." One candidate answered that it was "a machine for raising water." Another said he didn't remember of ever hearing the word before, but it sounded to him "as though it meant the twist which the head of a department puts on his subordinates when he wants them to 'come down' for election expenses."

A KNOWING ELDER.—A canny Scot who had accepted the office of elder because some wag had made him believe that the remuneration was sixpence each Sunday and a boll of meal on New-Year's Day, officially carried round the ladle each Sunday after service. When the year had elapsed he claimed the meal, but was told he had been hoaxed. "It may be sae with the meal," he replied, coolly, "but I took care o' the saxpence mysel'."

A little beggar-girl in New York has got hold of the wrong paper, which certifies that "the bearer is a widow with five children, in destitute circumstances."

We have cut the following from a daily paper: "The morning dress of the Shah is quiet, but dazzling. He wears a blue frock-coat, braced, buttoned, and frogged with diamonds, back and front. The handle of his sword is a vast ruby, while to the peak of his caloosh, or Persian hat, are fastened thirteen emeralds as big as tea-cups, which continually dangle in his eyes and impede his vision. He has several priceless precious stones in each of his boots, a shirt collar lined with pearls, and an umbrella cut out of a single onyx. He looks nice in the sun."

No doubt he does; and Jones wants to read him this at the railway station. What do you think?

"Twinkle, twinkle, blazing Shah!
No one wonders who you are!
No one cares! so off you fly,
Like a diamond down the High!"

"Are" doesn't rhyme well with "Shah," does it? But barring that, the sentiment seems all right, so do what you like with it.

CYNICAL THOUGHT.—A man is never so old in the outside world as he is made to feel when in the bosom of his family.

SLANDER.—An old Cavalier poet speaks of "Fishes that tipple in the deep." Do the researches of modern ichthyologists confirm this imputation on the moral character of animals which are generally supposed to be of necessity habitual water-drinkers?

SMART.—A paper says, "Massachusetts is noted for two things—intelligence and patent medicines." We presume the intelligence is displayed in selling, not taking, the physic.

DELICATE CONSIDERATION.

MAMMA. "What a Din you're making, Chicks! What are you Playing at?"
TRIXY. "Oh, Mamma, we're Playing at Railroad Trains. I'm the Engine, and Guy's a Palace Car, and Sylvia's a Passenger Car, and May's a Baggage Car, and Gerald, he's a Baggage Car too—that is, he's really only a Truck, you know, only you mustn't Tell him so, as it would Offend him!"

DISINTERESTED ATTACHMENT.

I met a little maiden;
Her age was barely ten;
Her spirit was not laden
With deep distrust of men.
I asked her would she be my mate;
She graciously declined,
Because she had of dolls so great
A family to mind.

I met a widow later,
And sought her for my bride;
Her family was greater
Than hers who erst denied.
She answered, "Yes." I married her.
The brats all have their follies,
For which I pay. I should prefer
My ten-year-old and dollies.

The French have been much afflicted, but have at last wiped away their tears (Thiers).

INCONCEIVABLE ENORMITY.—If the throne of Persia were now filled by an Irishman, who, having left it behind him, was about to visit England, who would possibly commit the offense of declaring the illustrious Oriental to be at once the Shah and the Sultan? Breathes there the buffoon who would venture to call his Persian Majesty the Padisha?

THE BIGGEST SCORE—Twenty, of course.

A rising caricaturist writes to us, and mentions, among other recommendations, that he can take off his own boots.

A PLEDGE OF LOVE—The "engagement-ring" at our uncle's.

Lord Eskgrove was a very "wordy" judge. Lord Cockburn, in his Memorials, says he heard him, in condemning a man to death for stabbing a soldier, aggravate the offense thus: "And not only did you murder him, whereby he was bereaved of his life, but you did thrust, or push, or pierce, or project, or propel the lethal weapon through the belly-band of his regimental breeches, which were his Majesty's!"

FORMS OF SALUTATION.

TO PATERFAMILIAS (at present market prices). "How on earth do you 'find yourself' and family?"
TO A SWELL. "How haw you? Haw."
TO A TOPER. "How do you carry yourself?"
TO A WELSHER. "How d'ye do?"
TO A RED TAPIST. "How don't you?"
TO A CHRISTY MINSTREL. "Hoop-d'ye-d'how-d'ye-do?"

A CORRECTOR OF THE PRESS—A policeman at a crowded crossing.

A LITTLE KNOWLEDGE.

OBLIGING WAITER. "Sausages—oh yes, Sir, I can recommend the sausages. I know the man as makes 'em."
PATRON. "H'm, it would have been better if you had known the pig!"

SOMETHING THAT SHOULD ALWAYS STAND CORRECTED—The barometer.

AMBITION.

GRANDMAMMA (encouragingly). "And what will you be, Harry, when you grow up?"
HARRY. "Please, gran'ma, I'd like to be an organ-grinder with a monkey."

COMPREHENSION.

"Madam," said a certain nameless one to Mrs. Brown the other day, "you are talking simple rubbish."
"Yes, Sir," replied the ever-crushing lady, "because I wish you to comprehend me."

L—— has burned his fingers with a traveling opera company. They say he has now become a co-opera-hater.

TO YOUNG AUTHORS.—Your punctuation may be faultless, yet you may write without point.

A BAD LOOK-OUT.—After reading a prophecy by Dr. Trall, of Philadelphia, we are inclined to hope that Dr. Cumming may be right for once, and that the world may not survive till 1880. In 1880 and for five long years afterward the earth is to be nearer to Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune than it has been for eighteen years past, and the result of this disastrous proximity may be more easily imagined than described. Plague, famine, scorching heat, piercing cold, are among the least of the evils to be expected. These calamities are to fall chiefly upon gluttons, tobacco chewers and smokers, and tight-lacing young ladies. As this provides for the survival of none but drunkards and loosely clad old ladies, we would rather die.

A Richmond lady advertises, under the head of "Strayed or Stolen," for a "long, lank, lean husband, six feet high, broad shoulders, thin beard, light hair and complexion, blue eyes, and about forty-five years of age, being about twenty years younger than myself."

CROWDING.

"Pray, Sir," said a person at the back end of a crowd to another who had just joined it, "pray don't press upon me; there's no one behind you."

"But there may be presently," said the other; "besides, Sir, what's the use of being in a crowd if one mayn't shove?"

PROFESSIONAL.—A Parisian recounts that he met recently, in a railway carriage, en route to Toulouse, a very agreeable and well-instructed person, who said he was a professional man. He parted with this compagnon de voyage with some regret, and with an exchange of cards; the agreeable person adding, as he gave his, "It would afford him great pleasure at any time to be useful to him professionally." Politeness forbade him looking at the card till he had got out of sight, when he found it was that of a public executioner of Paris. There was no mistake. Underneath the name was the statement of the professional pursuit.

PREPARED FOR ANY THING.

CITY FRIEND. "Up in town all by yourself, eh? Where's the missus?"
GOOD OLD SOUL. "Oh, she be mortal bad abed, poor thing!"
FRIEND. "That 'll spoil your holiday, eh?"
GOOD OLD SOUL. "Well, no, Sir; if she pops off sudden, they're to write up and let me know."

A PATRONIZING DAMSEL.

MISS MARGARET (aged nine, to mamma, who is a widow and has no sons). "I'm very glad uncle has come to stop with us, mamma. It's nice to have a man about the house!"

"Here we are now, within a quarter of a mile of land," was the joyful announcement made by the captain of an ocean steamer to his grumbling passengers.
"Where? Which way is it?" were the eager exclamations which followed.
"Any where down below there," said the captain, pointing toward the bottom of the sea. "The lead gives us just two hundred and twenty fathoms of water, and the land comes slap up against the brine."

Parties who "round" on you very often try to make you think they mean "square."

Can a tailor's child be said to die of sheer neglect?

NEGLECTED GENIUS.

MISTRESS. "No Opportunity of Improving yourself here, Parker? Why not?"
MAID. "Well, Ma'am, I've arranged this Hair differently every Day for a Week; but as you have never put it on, and have taken to Wearing your Own, I feel as my Feelin's is hurt, and my Eddication is wasted!"

"'Oh, come into my parlor,'
Said the Spider to the Fly."

BENEDICK. "Yes, but Twenty Dollars, hang it! Why, the Bonnets in the Window are ticketed only Eight!"
MADAME AMARANTHE (née Robinson). "Yes, my dear Gentleman; but, candidly, would a Cheap Article be suitable to such a singularly beautiful Person as your dear Lady?"
[MORAL.—Husbands, don't accompany your wives on such expeditions as this.

A QUARREL.

You call me a "girl of the period,"
But why should I care
If you don't like the bobs on my dresses,
Or kinks in my hair?
I think they are perfectly splendid;
Eugene thinks so too;
Then why should I heed the dull wishes
Of prim folks like you?

You say that I'm loud, but I'm sure
I've lovers enough
Who like all my ways and my manners,
And don't think me rough:
Yet you I have promised to marry—
I must have been wild;
But how could I guess you would treat me
So much like a child?

There's Mary—you always are saying
She's sweet and serene;
But I shouldn't want to look like her,
Not fit to be seen;
No gewgaws, no jewels, no flounces,
No friz to her hair:
When we go to a social or party,
Is she any where?

You know she steals off to a corner
And sits there alone,
Looks the veriest poke in creation,
A stick or a stone;
While I—ah, you know it, you know it—
I dance and I flirt
With lots of the jolliest fellows,
And where is the hurt?

Now, Robert, let's settle the matter:
I'm tired to death
Of reproaches and carpings and scoldings
At every breath.
If you think my serene cousin Mary
Is more to your mind—
You, who hardly will treat her politely—
Why, I am resigned.

Just take her: she's ready and willing,
That's plain to be seen—
Just as plain as that I, when I'm minded,
Can marry Eugene!
She'll cook you most beautiful dinners,
She'll sweep and she'll dust,
And obey you in every trifle
When she finds that she must.

She'll go to church with you, and sit there
Precise and demure,
And tell you the text and the sermon
Distinctly, I'm sure;
While I'm free to acknowledge I study
Very often when there
The fashions of dresses and bonnets,
And people's back hair.

It's strange, when a man finds a woman
Ready-made in his style,
With a calm, sweet, and modest demeanor
And ghost of a smile,
With hair lying smooth on her forehead,
Dress straight to her feet,
With no outward adornings to make her
More primly complete,

That he passes this excellent creature
Most thoroughly by,
And allows his faint heart to be smitten
By a girl such as I.
Falls in love spite of slate-pencil crimpings,
Spite of trinkets and bows—
Falls in love for the droop of an eyelid
Or turn of a nose;

Then tries with what might he possesses
To force her to be
The model who suits him precisely,
Most wonderful she.
Now, Robert, one way or another
We'll settle this sham:
Take your model, who sha'n't be my model,
Or me—as I am!

Ladies' and Misses' Bathing or Gymnastic Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pretty bathing or gymnastic suit, of which the illustration on the first page gives front and side views, arranged on a lady and a young girl, consists of the favorite yoke blouse and knickerbocker trowsers. The trowsers may be made loose at the bottom, without a band, if preferred. The pattern of the suit is graded from 24 to 46 inches bust measure, to fit any size from girls seven years old up to adults. The pattern of the trowsers may also be used for drawers closed at the side. The sleeve given with the pattern is the shirt sleeve with a ruffle seen on the second figure of the illustration. The suit may be made of flannel, moreen, serge, bed-ticking, or any other material, and trimmed to suit the fancy.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two articles—yoke blouse and knickerbocker trowsers.

YOKE BLOUSE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front and back of yoke, front and back of body, sleeve, and sailor collar. This garment has a deep yoke at the back and front. The body is joined to the yoke in front with a large box-pleat on each side of the hem, and three box-pleats in the back, which are only confined as far as the waist line. A belt of the material is tacked at the waist line of the back, adjusting the garment to the figure. The sleeves are gathered in at the armhole, and at the wrist to a band of the material, which is made large enough to slip over the hand, and edged with a straight ruffle three inches deep. The neck is finished with a deep sailor collar. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together, and notches show where to turn back the hem in front, and to lay the pleats at the top of the body before joining to the yoke. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3½ yards.

KNICKERBOCKER TROWSERS.—This pattern is in two pieces—front and back. The notches show where to lay the pleats at the top. The front is laid in two side pleats at each side, turning toward the front. The back has three side pleats at each side, turning toward the middle, and is joined to a band which closes on the left side with a button and button-hole. Leave the side seam open down to the notch, and face it. The bottom is pleated in a band, which is closed at the inside seam with a button and button-hole; the bands are edged with a two-inch-wide ruffle. A quarter of an inch is allowed for all seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 2¾ yards.

FAMILY FEELING.

THERE is an old saying that blood is thicker than water, and most of us devoutly believe it—or believe, rather, the statement that it conveys—and will do so probably to the end of time, in spite of all we may see to persuade us to the contrary.

In reality, we like to believe what pleases us, since it is only through a struggle that we ever embrace faith in any scheme that had no special attraction for us in the first place; and the idea that natural affection is not—next to the great bond of a perfect marriage, which makes two beings one—the strongest bond between human beings totally revolts us, revolts us partly through reflection, and partly through that inevitable selfishness without which we should fail to preserve our identity. The mother who looks at the baby on her breast, and traces on the small face here a trait of an ancestor and there a trait of herself, and sees the father smiling in its smile, and yearns above its sweetness and tenderness with an ineffable sensation, finds it impossible to believe the time can ever come when that baby who lives through her, who covers her face with its little wet kisses, to whom she is heaven and sunshine itself, shall cease to regard her as the central point of its existence, shall dispute her opinions, rebel against her authority, and perhaps be severed from her at last by a gulf of hate—hate all the more bitter for the old love, as the sweetest wine becomes the sharpest vinegar. The young sisters whom she sees playing together, sharing together, studying together, shielding each other from censure, strolling with their arms about each other, and their bright heads bent together in innocent conspiracy—she can not believe that at some day the attraction which these sisters have for each other shall be changed into repulsion, or, at best, into quiet indifference; nor can she any more easily believe that the brothers who now hunt birds' nests together, go berrying, and play truant together, sleep in the same bed, and read from the same book, shall by-and-by foster jealousy and envy, shall quarrel about a homestead or a sweetheart, and build between them an ugly barrier of lawsuit or love-suit. Nor could the child, on his side, understand how the globe would continue to roll on if the parent no longer loved him; and brother or sister would deride equally the idea that any cuckoo of a stranger should ever push the other out of place.

Still instances of this perversion of feeling are every day to be met with, but we all of us refuse to regard them as any thing but abnormal and isolated cases of malformation or of cankered growth, like the fungus that usurps the flower. And though we may doubt just so long as we reason about it whether in the natural state natural affection be a thing any more permanent with the human animal than with the brute, with the mother and child than with the lioness and whelp, yet instinct and intuition fly to the rescue and reiterate the cry that blood is thicker than water, and that our own blood in other veins calls to us as deep calls to deep, or as the moon calls to all the deeps.

We often hear people declaring of a beautiful baby that they could take the child and love it as their own; but if they reflected upon the matter they would know they were declaring an impossibility, for though they love the changeling never so dearly, they can never see themselves reproduced in it. Their hearts were never set beating together, and they can never feel for it the wild, deep passion of devotion that rises in the real parents to meet the responsibility of having placed it here.

Man is, after all, but a sort of polyp whose buds are never entirely detached from it, and the race of to-day builds its coral, on which perhaps the race of to-morrow emerges into clearer water. This girl is so stately and gentle because her great-grandmother a hundred years ago respected herself and reduced her passions. This youth is so strong and heroic because a sire, long since a handful of ashes, fortified his own youth and health, and eradicated the leprosy of fear. When we look askance on some cousin twice removed, and, if the old portrait on the wall speaks true, see our common ancestress, to whom the bloom of the earth has many a year been dust, gaze wistfully through her eyes at it again, we feel a new and nearer relationship with her. And the child playing at our feet becomes the more precious still when we recognize that he is the last point and expression of our race, a bond from the past, a pledge with the future. Certainly blood always tells; not alone in the race for life as in the race for plate, where it becomes evident that what we have made ourselves, that, by the force of natural laws, will our children approach—one degree higher if our lives went up, perhaps one degree lower if our lives went down—but in the occult tides of relationship that swing constant to one great law of cohesion.

Love, they say, is in the line of descent, not of ascent—according to which, if a child loves a parent, it is an act of grace, not of nature. But we place this with all the other heresies on the subject. It is true that the parent must regard the child as one who shall carry on his own work to completion, his character to perfection, through whom his name and his stock shall still have part in the warm and noisy world when he himself is silent and cold; and he accentuates all the intrinsic dearness of the child by an unconscious love of self and love of life, while the child must correspondingly look at the parent as one who has lived his day, and whose work is done. Yet that very thing gives the parent a new claim on the child's affections; for not only is the parent dear to him from habit and association, from ability to remember nothing from which the parent is absent, as much a part of his universe as the stars and the sky; but the fact that the world is so sweet to youth, and age is about to lose it, that the old eyes are soon to close on its beauty and gladness, and all the sunshine the dear old form shall know will be that which falls upon the grave, gives a fresh emotion as strong with love and regret as the parent's emotion is strong with love and hope; and over and above all there is that mystical tie of the flesh and blood which never can words explain, and seldom can endeavor destroy—a tie before which the fidelity of the loadstar to its pole dwindles into nothingness.

It is this same mystical tie that we find in the family relation elsewhere. Brother and sister may be uncongenial society each to the other, even disagreeable; may vex each other by the mutual sight of their own worse traits exaggerated into prominence by the cheapening of their better ones through rivalry; may meet from each other criticism and plain-speaking that are blistering; may choose the merest alien for friend and confidant in preference; may quarrel because they love, but will love in spite of their quarrel; and let a question of interest, or health, or happiness, or safety arise, and the blood tells again without more ado.

There is no savant who has yet told us what this mystical tie is. Philosophers can not illuminate it; physiologists can not catch it. One must analyze the current of the veins as it bounds across the heart, must seize the intelligence that thrills along the nerve as it leaves the brain, and then one has not laid hold of it. The sympathy of mated snails for one another, of which POE told us, by which, though separated by oceans, one will respond to the other's hurt, bears trivial comparison with the human sympathy in families; for the searcher into the springs of natural affection must find it something to be weighed only in that fine balance where the very star-dust has been weighed, and the magnetism of the earth measured out to its meridians—a part of the awful secrets of creation, of the great mystery of marriage, of the connection between heaven and earth, in the face of which, and such as which, the fool has said there is no God. It is an attraction, indeed, exceeding any in the material cosmos; for though the NEWTONS and LAPLACES should moon on with their vast schemes of gravitation and cohesion till time shall be no more, yet here is something, the people of the world believe, that if those mighty powers were dead and done away with, could yet hold their world together!

GIVING AND TAKING.

HOW many there are in the world who, if they envy any one any thing, it is the power of giving liberally, of sowing beside all waters! And perhaps there are those who, having the power, yet may envy, in turn, the disposition; for who has not observed the glow of satisfaction lighting up the faces of those who, in the teeth of natural avarice, have obliged themselves to give somewhat to the aid of another? They experience a novel sensation, and are permitted to understand, in a measure, how much more blessed it is to give than to receive, while with many a one it would seem as though the opposite opinion prevails. There is something in the manner of giving belonging to some of those we meet which reminds us of the little boy who, while listening to the eloquent appeals of a missionary preacher, was so moved that he whispered to his mother, "I shall give him five cents;" the preacher, drawing the picture more finely as he proceeded from secondly to thirdly, prevailed upon the boy to declare again, "I shall give him ten cents, mother;" and by the time he had wound up graphically with his fourthly, the child was ready to say, "I'll give him a whole handful, if any body'll make it up to me!"

So it is feared that not a few give with the view of having it made up to them in a reputation for generosity and unselfishness, while, like the child, many more would give if they could be positively assured of a reward. The very beggar in the street, to whom we have given sixpence, reflects this anticipation when he asserts that "God will reward you;" and it is a question if some of us do not expect to buy the kingdom of heaven with our superfluities. No doubt but God will reward us, in an enlarged capacity for enjoying the ability to promote the welfare of others, and an increased disposition to do so; and is not this enough, that we need look for other net profits than the occasion provides? Don't we get our sixpence-worth of happiness on the spot? It seems to us that giving to the poor is much like correct spelling—nothing to speak of when done, but something of a disgrace when omitted; and if this should appear discouraging to those who give habitually, is not the remembrance of worthy actions a sufficient reward? One can not truly enjoy one's warm fireside and well-spread table if some other human being is perishing with cold and hunger outside. If misery loves company, it is no less a fact that happiness finds its true flavor only among the happy. Thus we are virtually doing ourselves a good turn when we assist another; the joy of others, which we have produced, is reflected upon ourselves. Thus it is no Quixotism in a shipwrecked man to share his last morsel with a fellow-sufferer; he would despise himself if he refused to do so, and self-respect is more necessary than bread.

Perhaps we are too much inclined to give in our own way, without greatly regarding the wishes of the recipient. We give food and raiment, and withhold courtesy and good-fellowship and comfortable words; we give with the tips of the fingers, and an air of patronage. We give, too, from a variety of motives: because our neighbors give; because "No" is a disagreeable word to utter; because we shall be thought miserly or poor. We give grudgingly and of necessity; and sometimes from a heavenly pity and a divine assurance that whatsoever is ours may not be withheld from our needy brother without hurt to ourselves, be it spiritual or material aid. But that gift is accounted almost idle that costs us no effort, which requires no sacrifice, which is merely the overflow from the cup of prosperity; and the effort may be as great to the rich as the middle classes, according to temperament and natural inclination. If my neighbor has inherited a niggardly spirit, and lives in dread of the almshouse in spite of his thousands, his gift, or even his hesitation in turning away from a suppliant, is a greater or less victory over weakness and selfishness. EMERSON advises us never to give unwillingly; but how many of us would never give at all if we waited to give willingly—how many would be left portionless! Yet, taking it in a wider sense, perhaps he meant that we should so school ourselves that our wills should coincide with our opportunities for doing service.

In the mean time the receivers do not always manifest that graciousness of manner which is becoming under the circumstance. They are apt to take what they can catch as if it belonged to them, and then to grumble that it is no better, ignorant of the superstition that beggars shouldn't be choosers. A woman to whom a charitable lady was in the habit of sending a daily steak or roast became so incensed at the lack of variety in the supply that she returned the joint one day, saying that, "for her part, she didn't want any thing if it must be mutton." Of a somewhat different order is the woman to whom one has given a basket of provisions, and who yet demands "a little dish of tea," or the small boys who devour the pie that charity offers, and toss the bread into the gutter; while still to another class belong those who are too proud to acknowledge a gift, but not proud enough to refuse one. But do any of these ungracious recipients exonerate us from giving to those who ask?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BATHING AND GYMNASTIC SUITS.

AN illustration on our first page shows a combination bathing and gymnastic suit, of which a cut paper pattern is published. Experience teaches that the least drapery consistent with modesty is best for such suits, as wide skirts are very heavy when wet, and are in the way in the gymnasium. Two yards and a quarter is a good width for such skirts around the bottom. Many are also gored and sloped narrower toward the hips. Twilled flannels, bed-ticking, and the coarser summer Cheviots imported for gentlemen are the best materials. All-wool fabrics are desirable, but they must be of coarse, light quality. The single-width flannels, costing from 50 to 75 cents a yard, are purchased in white, navy blue, or gray. Trim white with bright blue or red worsted braid; for blue suits use white braid, or else paler blue bands of flannel; and for gray any gay color, or else a vivid Scotch plaid, should be chosen to enliven it. The pattern of a sailor collar is given; but many ladies prefer a standing pleated frill around the neck, with the same about the wrists and ankles.

Bathing mantles of Turkish toweling, to put on when leaving the sea, are imported in various styles. The handsomest are long loose sacques, like morning wrappers, with sleeves and a pointed hood. There is but one seam down the middle of the back, and one under each arm. The garment should be long enough to barely escape the ground. The hood is a long straight piece, with the lower edge folded upward, and sewed together in the middle, making a three-cornered bag; a tassel hangs from the point; a cord is tied around the waist, and the garment is buttoned down the entire front. The prettiest one shown is of white Turkish toweling, with scarlet lines through it, scarlet buttons, and a scarlet tassel on the hood. A thick white cable cord, like a rope, is strapped around the waist, and finished with tassels on the end. Price $13 50. Another of the same shape is of shaded gray striped toweling, and costs $15. Cardinal cloaks, with yokes, and simple round circulars, are made of gay striped Algerines of blue and green together, or else red with green. In default of a regular bathing mantle a water-proof cloak will serve the purpose.

WHITE REDINGOTES, ETC.

Among the prettiest summer redingotes for street wear are those made of white Turkish toweling and trimmed with black velvet. They are double-breasted, and without being close-fitting, they outline the figure so closely that a sash is not necessary. The revers and collar are covered with velvet; there are two rows of black velvet buttons down the front, and the button-holes are bound with velvet; three buttons and imitation holes are on each cuff and each square pocket, and the edge of the garment has a wide velvet binding. This redingote is to be worn over a black silk skirt, or else, according to the present fancy, with a black velvet skirt: it costs $35. A garment of similar shape, but dressy enough for dinner wear, is of white silk, with pin-head dots of black, trimmed with black lace and a piped band of silk: price $60.

Black silk polonaises are made very long, with a straight, square, scarf-like front falling open below the waist, and drawn tightly back to the elaborately draped back. Guipure insertion is set in down the front, and the garment is edged with a lace flounce. A lace jabot is on the back of the corsage, a ruff around the neck, and a large bow catches the back of the skirt in a puff that is very full, but is not allowed to stand out prominently. Écru pongee polonaises are made of similar shape, with yak insertion and lace of the same shade. Black grenadine polonaises with wide stripes have large Marie Stuart ruffs, very high behind, and sloping away to the belt. A pretty suit for Saratoga is a plain colored foulard silk skirt, plain surface, and handsomely ruffled, with a polka-spotted foulard made like the black silk ones just described. A morning suit for the country is of dark blue linen lawn sprinkled with tiny white stars. This has a blouse-polonaise and ruffled skirt, with bands of white scalloped cambric set about among the ruffles.

YACHTING DRESSES.

Pretty nautical-looking dresses for yachting and sea-side wear are made of the polka-dotted fabrics, especially those with white dots on plum-color or navy blue grounds. A model made of plum-colored woolen goods has a blouse waist, made with three box-pleats in front and back, and a sailor collar corded with white. There are square cuffs on the coat sleeves, and on these, as well as on the fronts of the collar, are white anchors embroidered with silk. There is no over-skirt. The front breadths are covered with kilt pleating from belt to toe, while on the back are seven bias lapping flounces, with the hem turned up on the outside and piped with white. A sash will be worn loosely around the hips, quite below the waist, and knotted carelessly on the left side.

SUMMER BALL DRESSES.

The low corsages of summer ball dresses are made to cover the shoulders, and point very low in the back and front, displaying the neck to advantage. The conspicuous feature then added is a pleated ruff all around the neck, but much higher behind than in front. The ruff is of the dress silk, with white silk lining and a stiff muslin interlining to hold it erect. Small half-inch box-pleats, scant enough to spread out at top like a fan, are used for these ruffs, or else the same effect is produced by small side pleats. A tasteful dress of white grenadine—not square meshed, but a firm lustrous surface like Chambéry gauze—has the skirt trimmed with five bias lapping flounces edged with narrow blonde lace. The heading for this cluster of flounces is two narrow erect ruffles and two turned-down ruffles, separated by a bias band of grenadine. The over-skirt and low waist are of striped grenadine. Two bias folds and wide blonde lace trim the over-skirt. The neck of the corsage has a ruff with two folds below it.

Similar white dresses, and also black ones, are made with flounced skirts of plain grenadine, and over dresses of damask or clouded gauze. In some imported evening dresses of this thin fabric damask-figured, polka-dotted, striped, and plain gauze are all employed in one dress. If the combination is carefully done it is very effective, but if not, it results in a patched-up, motley-looking garment. This fashion has the advantage of utilizing short patterns, remnants, and partly worn dresses.

VARIETIES.

A tricolor cluster of large pouting rose-buds, pink, yellow, and crimson, worn low down on the back of the bonnet, is a favorite caprice this summer. Only a few leaves are added, and these are usually brown; the long flexible stems of the flowers are tied together, and show at the top of the cluster. Another fancy is to hang downward a single rose, deep red or else very pale pink, just back of the ear, under the brim of upturned hats, or else very far back on the side of those with the Rubens brim.

Veils are of black net, with chenille or else thickly wrought dots, small, round, and quite far apart. They are shaped in handkerchief fashion, square, or else three-cornered, with an appliqué edge of Spanish blonde lace. This is thrown over the hat crown, hangs in a point below the chin, and has tabs behind, caught together by an oblong pin of oxidized silver. The pin is usually a plain block with a chased Greek border or vine for ornament. Many ladies object to these veils, as they are apt to crush and conceal the fresh flowers and ostrich tips of summer hats, and are adopting instead a newer plan of wearing a straight piece of net put on under the hat brim, covering merely the face and sides, and fastened behind the coiffure. This is coquettish, becoming, and not warm. It is now considered de rigueur to wear a veil in the street, and this at least serves the purpose of concealing in a measure the use of cosmetics, now so unfortunately prevalent. Gray grenadine with pink tinges, and crape gauze of the same shade, are used for morning veils. Dark bottle green grenadine is used for traveling and general wear.

Instead of Watteau bows, with long ends hanging from the back of the neck, the favorite streamers now are two long ends of gros grain ribbon pendent from the back of the bonnet or hat. This ribbon is two and a half inches wide, and each streamer is a yard long.

The last additions to châtelaines are pretty little tablets for memoranda, with gold or else chased silver backs, matching the vinaigrette, fan chain, and brooch. A carrier-pigeon is engraved on one side, and the monogram of the wearer on the other.

Ruffs and fraises increase in fullness and in altitude until they are almost Elizabethan. Crêpe lisse is the stylish material for wearing next the skin, but much of its dead whiteness is unbecoming; it is best to put one high side pleating of crêpe lisse, with an over-frill of Valenciennes lace, and outside of this a ruff of the dress material, lined with silk of some becoming shade. A standing linen collar in English shape, with a double ruffle of box-pleated muslin edged with lace placed outside of it, is considered very stylish for morning and for semi-dress afternoon wear. A favorite frill is of Swiss muslin three inches deep, edged with narrow Mechlin lace, and an inch-wide insertion let in; the whole is then laid in shallow side pleats, and basted standing in the neck of the dress, leaving the back its full height, and turning it down narrower about the throat. A simpler ruff is of sheer muslin edged with narrow thread lace, hemmed, and a cluster of tiny tucks below the hem. This would also answer for mourning if the lace were omitted. Ladies with fresh clear complexions wear linen ruffs in their morning dresses. These have an inch-wide hem turned over on the outside and hem-stitched. White crêpe lisse pleating, with an outer pleating of black crêpe lisse, is worn in the deepest mourning; it is even considered suitable for widows' mourning. Neck-ties and cravats are not used with fraises when there is also a fraise of the dress material; cravat bows are, however, necessary just below the throat. The prettiest bows for this purpose are of white organdy edged with lace. They consist of two fan-shaped ends, held in side pleats, and attached to two fluted or puffed loops of the muslin, with two other loops and a cross-strap of some light silk of a becoming shade.

Deep square sailor collars are worn with pleated blouse-waists of linen or cambric by young girls; ladies wear standing pleated frills around the neck and wrists.

PERSONAL.

FEW men have had a more diversified experience of life than had HIRAM POWERS. Born in poverty, he was at first a hotel waiter, then a commercial traveler, next a clock-maker, then assistant of a Cincinnati sculptor, where his merit attracted the notice of Mr. LONGWORTH, who sent him to Florence at the age of thirty-two. One year afterward he produced his "Eve," in the year following "The Greek Slave," and since then his fame has become historical. For many years his orders have far exceeded his power of execution, even at the very high prices demanded for his works.

—Colonel FORNEY is reported to have said that "CALEB CUSHING is anxious to end his career at peace with all the world." This recalls the epigrammatic epitaph on Mr. CUSHING written twenty odd years ago by HANNAH F. GOULD:

"Lie aside all ye dead,
For in the next bed
Reposes the body of CUSHING.
He has crowded his way
Through the world, they say,
And, even though dead, will be pushing."

Mr. CUSHING'S prompt reply is equally clever:

"Here lies one whose wit,
Without wounding, could hit—
And green grows the grass that's above her.
Having sent every beau
To the regions below,
She has gone down herself for a lover."

Mr. CUSHING has been many years a widower. His wife wrote two pleasant volumes, entitled Letters Descriptive of Public Monuments, Scenery, and Manners in France and Spain, during a tour in Europe with her husband. They were printed for private distribution in 1832. The Hon. ALEXANDER H. EVERETT, in reviewing them in the North American Review, said, "This accomplished lady, as is sufficiently evident from these volumes, was equally well fitted to shine in the higher sphere of letters, and to grace the private walks of social and domestic life."

—Mr. PARKER, the publisher, of Oxford, and son of the publisher of the first edition of KEBLE'S Christian Year, mentioned in a recent conversation the origin of that volume, whose beauties are known wherever the English language is spoken. Mr. KEBLE, on entering Mr. PARKER'S bookstore one morning, saw at the top of a small staircase, which led to a little gallery filled with book-shelves, a work entitled L'Année Chrétienne, in twelve volumes, and at once asked Mr. PARKER to be allowed to examine it. A short time afterward The Christian Year appeared, the title, doubtless, suggested by the French work.

—WIENIAWSKI is a good fiddler, and dislikes to do violin-ce to any body's feelings. In San Francisco, where he has just been extending the bow, he found a ten-year-old lad, the son of a jeweler, who played several tunes for him, and afterward repeated a piece after Herr WIENIAWSKI had played it. The Herr consented to teach the boy one hour a day during his stay in San Francisco, and take him to Vienna and place him in the Musical Conservatory under his own tuition, free of charge, until he graduates. We therefore feel inclined to say, deferentially and in a mild way, Hurrah for Mr. WIENIAWSKI!

—ADELINA PATTI'S performance of Desdemona in ROSSINI'S Othello is spoken of by a London critic as "one of the most remarkable impersonations ever witnessed on the lyric or any other stage."

—When Queen VICTORIA saw
That the Shah of Persia wore
Diamonds surpassing the famous Koh-i-noor,
Her Majesty was pleased to think him quite a bore,
And she gently said, "Oh, pshaw!"
Not "Oh, Shah!" as she would
In a more complacent mood.
But the Eastern potentate
Thought the compliment was great:
That the exclamation was ambiguous
Ne'er entered in his pate.
He salamed and he bowed,
To the admiration of the crowd,
Which pressed about his august steps contiguous.

—Madame RISTORI has just reappeared in London after an absence of fifteen years, and played Medea with all her old beauty and tenderness.

—MACREADY'S will has recently been proved, by which it appears that his estate amounted to only about $100,000. His widow (his second wife, and very many years younger than he) gets an annuity of $3500 a year. The residue goes to his children.

—JOHN BRIGHT, who is overwhelmed with all sorts of dainty little presents, says that he values the gold-headed cane bequeathed to him by ABRAHAM LINCOLN for his active defense of the United States during the rebellion beyond any of the presents and testimonials he has received from his numerous admirers and friends.

—Since the income of Viscountess BEACONSFIELD'S fortune passed to the family of her first husband, Mr. WYNDHAM LEWIS, Mr. DISRAELI'S pecuniary resources are materially diminished. He has $10,000 a year as an ex-premier, and about $7000 more, the interest of a cash present made to him some years ago by an eccentric old lady of Devonshire. His desire to retire from the leadership of the opposition may be inferred from a sentence in a letter of his written quite recently: "Although at the request of my friends I am endeavoring to assist in conducting the Parliamentary business of the conservative party, I am otherwise living in seclusion."

—The Countess BENEDETTI, a noted beauty of France, has just died. Her history is a romance. It seems that M. ANASTASI found her when a little girl in an Eastern slave-market, purchased and adopted her, and sent her to Europe to be educated. While M. ANASTASI was Grecian consul at Alexandria she married the vice-consul, M. BENEDETTI, and aided him as he rose from vice-consul to embassador to Prussia. She was only forty-eight, and leaves a son, who is now secretary of legation at Stockholm.

—ADELINA PATTI has essayed a new rôle in London—Leonora, in Il Trovatore—and with brilliant success. Her voice is regarded as purer and richer than ever, and time has dealt very gently with her, beautifying her more and more. Something of Northern endurance seems to fix the Southern bloom and ripeness. It yields to neither time nor fatigue, and the PATTI of 1873 is all that she was ten years ago, with the added culture and experience.

—RALPH WALDO EMERSON will lecture next season on what he saw during his late trip to Europe. He thinks it has added ten years to his life, and the first of the new ten he will devote to telling us about it.

—Miss BAXTER, of Dundee, Scotland, has given $10,000 to fit a vessel to enable missionaries to carry on their labors in New Guinea. It will be a veritable marine "saints' rest."

—MACREADY, the actor, who died recently in England at the advanced age of eighty, became an ardent Methodist after retiring from the stage, and built a chapel, in which he occasionally exhorted with much fervor.

—Bishop HUNTINGTON, of Central New York, has recently taken under his jurisdiction an entire congregation of German Roman Catholics, and provided them with a German Episcopal pastor.

—General VON MOLTKE'S wife is an Englishwoman, the step-daughter of his sister. When he was in Constantinople he wrote letters to his sister which so interested the step-daughter that she entered into correspondence with and finally married him.

—Prince PONIATOWSKI, who has been engaged as conductor by Mr. ULLMAN for a prolonged tour abroad, gave a farewell morning concert recently in London, at which many prominent artists, including Mr. SANTLEY, assisted. This seems to be an innovation on the aristocracy that may lead to high results. The Duke of Edinburgh is understood to be a fair fiddler, and the King of Bavaria a good pianist. Why may not BARNUM make a little engagement as leader of the orchestra with the Duke, and throw in the King for a couple of fantasias or some sort of roundelay for each performance? That would draw.

—Pembroke, Maine, is the banner town for old fogy. JAMES M'CURDY is one hundred and three years old (this is really so), and gay as a bird; Mrs. LEIGHTON is nearly one hundred; and about three years ago Mrs. HOLLAND, grandmother to the wife of Hon. LOT M. MORRILL, died at the age of one hundred and three. It doesn't seem to be any object to die in Pembroke.

—GUSTAVE DORÉ has done a little thing that is sweet in every way. Having promised a drawing for a charitable lottery organized by the Countess de Noé, he sent a magnificent water-color of great value. It represents a Sister of Mercy carrying off a child in her arms during the bombardment of Paris by the Prussians. It is considered one of DORÉ'S most striking pictures.

—Mr. THOMAS ALLEN proposes to give to the Athenæum in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, $50,000 for the erection of a stone building for its uses, provided his associate trustees will see that an equal sum is raised to endow the institution.

—We have great respect for the man who writes with the good old quill pen. Therefore do we venerate the name of PHILEMON HOLLAND, the Warwickshire school-master and physician, who was wont to boast that he had performed his English version of CAMDEN'S Britannica, 1610, with one single pen, on which he wrote the following quatrain:

"With one sole pen I wrote this book,
Made of a gray-goose quill;
A pen it was when it I took,
And a pen I leave it still."

—Miss SARAH SMITH STAFFORD, of Trenton, New Jersey, has in her possession the first Star-spangled Banner ever made, and it is still in good preservation. It was made by the ladies of the old Swedish Church of Philadelphia, assisted by JOHN BROWN, Esq., secretary of the United States Marine Committee. The presentation of the flag was made to JOHN PAUL JONES by Misses MARY and SARAH AUSTIN, the latter of whom afterward became the wife of Commodore BARRY. PAUL JONES hoisted it on the Bonhomme Richard, and on the 23d of September, 1779, the engagement took place between her and the Serapis and Countess of Scarborough. During the fight—one of the fiercest ever known—when the Bonhomme Richard and Serapis were lashed together, the flag was cut down by a British officer. JAMES B. STAFFORD (the father of Miss STAFFORD) caught it up and nailed it to the mast. The officer made a tremendous sweep with his sabre, cutting into the left shoulder of STAFFORD, felling him to the deck. This wound, owing to unskillful treatment, reopened many years afterward, causing Lieutenant STAFFORD the most intense suffering during the latter part of his life. When the Bonhomme Richard was sinking, the flag was seized by one of the sailors, and transferred by PAUL JONES to the American ship of war Alliance, where it remained until the close of the war. The vessel was then sold to ROBERT MORRIS, the financier, and the Alliance was refitted as a merchantman for the East India trade. The secretary of the United States Marine Committee wrote to Lieutenant JAMES B. STAFFORD that the committee, with the advice of Commodore JOHN BARRY, had decided to present him with the flag, medicine chest, and a "tower musket" belonging to the Alliance, in consideration of his bravery in nailing up the flag when it had been cut down by a British officer during the action between the Bonhomme Richard and Serapis. It is proposed to hoist this flag at the opening of the grand centennial celebration at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876.

CROAKS ON CROQUET.

THE croquet season has once more set in, and travel where we will, behind every garden hedge are heard the click of balls, the laughter and earnest adjurations of the players. The almanacs, which are wont to inform gentlemen when salmon-fishing or grouse-shooting begins, might adopt May the 1st as the proper date for the ladies' game—croquet—coming into season. Some enthusiasts, indeed, commence in April, and rumors reach civilization occasionally in February from some parts of the country that the weather has been so mild croquet has commenced. The next letter, however, is sure to bring the conclusion of the story: the players have been laid up ever since with influenza.

With opening summer there are few prettier sights than a croquet party; bright sunshine overhead glorifying the closely shaven lawn with its background of tender green, its glowing clumps of azaleas and rhododendrons, while youth and happiness, the sparkling eyes, gleaming smiles, and neat ankles of the players, would tempt an anchorite from his seclusion. There is a perfect feast of color—flowers, shrubs, and gay jardinières; bright muslins, brighter skirts, and fluttering ribbons.

Unluckily, however, it has another side, and that fraught with intolerable discomforts to those who are beyond the age of heart complaints on the one hand, and, on the other, whose daughters are not yet marriageable. Exactly, says some fair devotee of croquet, at the age of misanthropy, selfishness, and indolence. Granting this, the fact remains that a very large proportion of mankind smart under these croquet woes, and if the enthusiast denies this, in croquet as in politics the minority must surely have its rights, which renders it worth while to recapitulate its wrongs. Ten years ago any one possessed of ordinary skill and strength of wrist could knock painted balls through hoops, and while deep in conversation, even on such a subject as social science, could enjoy croquet. Now the game has become a scientific diversion. A person must go into training for it, and spend many careful hours in learning strokes, manœuvres, and the lore of "Cavendish" or Black, not merely before he can qualify as a croquet athlete, but before he can so much as venture to join in the game. Its very terminology is revolutionized, and he who passed muster a few years ago if he knew a hoop from a peg, must now be competent to enter into the mysterious jargon of roquets, dead balls, breaks, boundaries, and the like.

A plain man, who was deemed a capital player before he made a voyage to Australia, returns to find himself scouted as a partner by the ladies, and stared at by the exquisites. The very spirit of the game, he finds, is altered. Two feelings only actuated the players in old days—love and ill nature. The amiable or susceptible player helped his partner, and never croqueted a lady's ball very far; the bear laid himself out to spoil every one's little game, and to drive all the balls as far into the flower bed as he could. At present both these violent passions are equally out of place on the croquet lawn. Either of them would seriously derange the science of the game. If a man means to make love, he must not be stupid enough to let it interfere with the rigor of the sport; if his malice breaks out in a vulgar knocking about of the balls of the other side, he is regarded as little better than a madman. Indeed, croqueting an adversary at all is now deemed a brusquerie.

Another grievance is that he is now expected to conform in the minutest details of the game to the orders of the head of his side. This is all very well if she be young and pretty, but what if she be an exacting and uninteresting person, whose theories respecting the proper defense or attack differ diametrically from your own?

There will be misanthropic, unreasonable individuals to the end, but however much they deserve the condemnation of all rightly thinking people, it is hardly possible for the greatest devotee of croquet to avoid sympathizing with Paterfamilias, who has just settled himself comfortably in the cool library to examine the last issue of the Early English Text Society, when his better half enters.

"Now, Brown, an odd man is wanted for Miss Sparke's side. Don't keep them waiting."

Perhaps it is as well on such an occasion that the genius of croquet can not hear the muttered malison which he obtains. The best advice that can be given to this class of abstainers on principle is forthwith to set up a malady. If a man is known to be afflicted with heart complaint, he may live many years, but no one could be heartless enough to ask him to stand about and exhaust his system in the sunshine; while if it is evening, or the grass is in the least degree damp, few ailments are so accommodating as rheumatism. It suffers the patient, luckily, to eat, drink, and do much as he likes, but he must on no account expose himself to the risk of a chill on the lawn.

Were we making a general onslaught on the game, it would be easy to bring forward many more articles of attainder against it, as the strong probability of catching at least three more influenzas and colds during the season than would otherwise fall to one's lot; the wretchedness of being coupled with a miserable player when you are making admirable strokes, or of having to entertain a silent partner or (worse still) a talkative one.

We have no desire, however, to turn the tide of popularity which the game at present deservedly enjoys. Consideration is all that its victims ask for. Let persons whose hobby is croquet remember that all ages and tastes may not necessarily agree with them on the attractiveness of the game. Allow those who do not to choose their own way of spending a sunny afternoon; give them the freedom of the shrubbery rather than of the lawn. A clever hostess can not well make a mistake if she sends the young people to croquet; with all over thirty there is need of selection and tact. If a man be a Timon, the perfection of hospitality is to suffer him to enjoy his humor. In these days of croquet tournaments and matches it is cruel kindness for parties to ask an indifferent player to join. All alike are bored, and as from the nature of the case no exception can ever be taken to a lady, however careless or bad a player she be, it is worth notifying to all ladies' colleges and similar institutions that a professor of croquet is as absolute a necessity to such places as a professor of music. The greatest of all nuisances at croquet is the presence at a game of ladies who have not the faintest knowledge of or interest in the amusement.

Having now concluded a tolerably long catalogue of grievances, we commend their due consideration to all croquet players whom they may concern, and retire from the lawn, after hitting our neighbors all round, with the character of the most ill-natured partner who ever handled a mallet.

JOHN JANKIN'S SERMON.

THE minister said last night, says he,
"Don't be afraid of givin';
If your life ain't nothin' to other folks,
Why, what's the use o' livin'?"
And that's what I say to wife, says I,
There's Brown, the mis'rable sinner,
He'd sooner a beggar would starve than give
A cent toward buyin' a dinner.

I tell you our minister's prime, he is,
But I couldn't quite determine,
When I heard him a-givin' it right and left,
Just who was hit by his sermon.
Of course there couldn't be no mistake
When he talked of long-winded prayin',
For Peters and Johnson they sot and scowled
At every word he was sayin'.

And the minister he went on to say,
"There's various kinds o' cheatin',
And religion's as good for every day
As it is to bring to meetin'.
I don't think much of a man that gives
The Lord Amens at my preachin',
And spends his time the followin' week
In cheatin' and overreachin'."

I guess that dose was bitter enough
For a man like Jones to swaller;
But I noticed he didn't open his mouth,
Not once, after that to holler.
Hurrah, says I, for the minister—
Of course I said it quiet—
Give us some more of this open talk;
It's very refreshing diet.

The minister hit 'em every time;
And when he spoke of fashion,
And a-riggin' out in bows and things,
As woman's rulin' passion,
And a-comin' to church to see the styles,
I couldn't help a-winkin'
And a-nudgin' my wife, and, says I, "That's you,"
And I guess it sot her thinkin'.

Says I to myself, That sermon's pat;
But man is a queer creation;
And I'm much afraid that most o' the folks
Won't take the application.
Now if he had said a word about
My personal mode o' sinnin',
I'd have gone to work to right myself,
And not set here a-grinnin'.

Just then the minister says, says he,
"And now I've come to the fellers
Who've lost this shower by usin' their friends
As sort o' moral umbrellas.
Go home," says he, "and find your faults,
Instead of huntin' your brothers';
Go home," he says, "and wear the coats
You've tried to fit for others."

My wife she nudged, and Brown he winked,
And there was lots o' smilin',
And lots o' lookin' at our pew;
It sot my blood a-b'ilin'.
Says I to myself, Our minister
Is gittin' a little bitter;
I'll tell him, when meetin's out, that I
Ain't at all that kind of a critter.

WAITING AT THE STATION.

"WHAT place did you say?" Mary Sage asked the conductor, as he came along with his collected tickets.

"Chelsford station," he replied. "Passengers in the morning train from the Cliffs change cars here."

"Strange, strange!" said Mary Sage to herself, for her traveling companion, Miss Whitlow, would not have understood her. "Years have elapsed since a drama was abruptly closed, the lights extinguished, and again the cur—cars, I mean—roll me back to Chelsford, where it began."

As the conductor repassed, Mary questioned him, and was informed that she would have to wait at the Chelsford station three hours before the Old Province train arrived, by which they were to travel homeward.

"Dear me!" snapped Miss Whitlow, rousing at this announcement, "are we to be detained here to feed the flies? Mary, you need not have so hurried matters. But you would whisk out of bed to see the sun rise. You are too old for sunrises."

"Yes, Cousin Ann," cried Mary, cheerfully; "'tis the sunset of life that should give me all the mystical lore I require. But never mind. There will be one spring in the hair-cloth sofa; you shall have that, with as many cocoa-nut balls as you choose to add to your milk of human kindness. I am sure your netting is in your sachel. I mean to explore the region; and, hey presto! we shall hear the cry, 'All aboard!'"

"Nonsense, Mary. In trying situations you are so absurd! Chelsford," she added, reflectively, "has a familiar sound. Did your mother ever go there? I have some such recollection."

"We passed a summer in the town when you were abroad, during my green and salad days."

"You were a mere child then. It is fifteen years since. Mercy! as we get older the passage of time strikes the mind like a comet."

"I found that I had grown to be a woman before I left," remarked Mary, bitterly.

"Yes," replied Miss Whitlow, complacently; "our family are remarkable for maturing early."

"And the same in fading."

"By no means; not at all." And Miss Whitlow's piebald curls, two to each temple, shook with disdain at the idea. Like Festus, she probably counted years by her heart-throbs; and as she had had small occasion for perturbing that organ, she might consider herself youthful still—younger, in truth, than the pale, tall Mary beside her, about whom no vestige of girlhood lingered.

The train blustered up to the platform, and five or six persons emerged therefrom, hot and frowzy in spite of yellow and brown linen dresses, Japanese fans, and leather bags of comestibles. Several trunks were madly tossed out of the baggage car, and then the train rolled down the cut through a scattering wood, and disappeared. The country wagons in waiting took off the expected passengers with their luggage, the staring schoolgirls strolled home again arm in arm, and the loafers commanding the benches turned over their tobacco quids and silently stole away to their perches along the village stores. The ticket seller slapped down his window, the candy vendor drew a barrier across his den, and silence reigned within the station; draughts of air and solid sunbeams were masters of the situation.

"Ah," said Mary, "behold this dipterous insect. Something to share our solitude."

Miss Whitlow stepped to the window.

"Pooh! a daddy-long-legs," she answered, peevishly, continuing to dabble her mouth and nose with Cologne-water.

"Cousin Ann, try this rocking-chair. I brought away the Bactrian Advertiser for you; there is a dreadful murder in it."

"Give it to me. Where can my spectacles be?"

Mary waited patiently till Miss Whitlow was adjusted satisfactorily, and then went out. From every point of the compass she vainly tried to discover some familiar landmark. Away beyond the trees she saw the spires and roofs of the village, and took at random one of the roads in its direction. It was a mere lane through which she passed, opening from a broad street lined with houses and deep yards; from either side other streets branched, and at the farther end stretched a green; near her, in an angle of the street, stood a square white building. When she read the sign on it she knew her whereabouts—"Grafton, Pitt, & Co."

The years dropped from her mental eyesight like scales, one by one, as she stopped a moment. A feeling of rage took possession of her. The power and durability of an inanimate thing, a sign surviving to suggest so vital, so dead a past! She moved on toward the green, going by houses she could not yet recognize, and trees, shrubs, garden beds, and walks all dream-like and confused.

"I am going to Chelsford Green," she said, "to the Elm Walk."

She saw the arching elms gently bending and mingling their tall thick tops, and the great boles padded with short grass at their base; and then a curious collision took place in her mind between two persons—both of them herself—with a third person added as judge or commentator. The first was a girl of seventeen, carelessly dressed, her shawl down her shoulders, her bonnet half off her head, and her hair flying. She was coming up the Elm Walk with a roll of music in her hand, and her attention was absorbed in some object or person at the limits of the walk. How pretty and bright she looked! Mary's eyes filled with hot, aching tears at the picture. The other was a woman beyond thirty, sober and composed in appearance; she carried a large parasol, and was dressed in gray. Her observations seemed to be confined to the capers of a pair of sparrows who hopped tamely, and cocked up their little round heads at her, while she stood still by one of the trees. To this person Mary gave a pitiful smile and a wave of polite dismissal, and returned to her present self. After a momentary hesitation she crossed the green and went out by the farther gate. "I'll just go by it," she said, "and then return to Cousin Ann."

Presently she came in sight of a lonely little stream, spanned by a handsome stone bridge, newly dated. It was changed there, she found, but still the view down the river must be the same. Yes, there were the high palings, the hedge, the roof, and chimneys of Edward Grafton's place.

"Ay me, ay me, with what another heart,
In days far off, and with what other eyes,
I used to watch—if I be she that watched—"

Mary murmured, her whole soul stirred with some recollection that changed her face wonderfully. She felt drawn by invisible threads toward that place, and walked steadily by the orchard, garden, and carriage drive. The gates were wide open; she heard the stamp of the horses in the stable, and saw the stable groom going to and fro; but the house was silent, its doors and shutters closed. The lawn was terraced, and a piazza ran across the front of the house. Some temptation led her by the terrace. Looking up through the spaces in the shrubbery, she caught a glimpse of a man lying upon a settee. His arms were under his head, his feet were crossed; she thought him sleeping, he was so motionless.

"If that is Edward Grafton," she thought, "why does he not divine that I stand near him? What about that electric chain, I wonder? Here is a test. What a fool I am! Mary Sage, go back to your cousin Ann, and behave as you are expected to behave. The idea of mooning after dead romantic episodes at noonday, because railroad companies will not accommodate each other, is too preposterous. Yes, I'll return; I'll just walk by, and come back on the other side of the street. Who would have thought of my opportunity of seeing old Chelsford again, where I took music-lessons, and had such a gay summer? And now mother is dead, and I am dead—an old maid, I mean—and life is a tiresome falsehood." She was walking swiftly, unaware of her footsteps. A clock struck; the wind brought its slow strokes to her ear; an hour had passed since she left the station, and her heart had counted every happy day she had ever spent in that time. As she passed along on the other side of the way she looked at the settee again. The sleeper had changed his position; he was sitting up, his hat was pulled over his forehead, and his head was bent in a listening attitude. An uncontrollable wish to see this man's face seized Mary, and almost involuntarily she turned again and crossed over below the terrace.

"Suppose I do want to see him!" she argued, crossly. "I am the one to be hurt. I intend to write a book, and call it the Dissection and Analysis of all Human Disappointment through Emotion—and that covers a ground as big as Humboldt's Cosmos." Stepping by the terrace as noiselessly as possible, for fear of being heard, she had come close to the lawn gate, and, with a feeling of forlorn hope, raised her eyes and met those she wished to meet. Their faces were not far apart, hers below, his above—earnest, sad faces now; deep, inquiring gray eyes. For a moment they were speechless, he amazed, she breathless.

"Mary Sage, is it you?"

"Yes, Edward Grafton."

"Come up here! come in!" he urged.

"No."

"Why are you here in this strange way?"

"Because the Old Province train won't come in. Are you a railroad director?"

"Where have you been all these years, and why should I never have seen you, Mary?" he asked, with a rising irritation. She did not reply at once, but looked at him. Indeed, they measured each other with profound wonder and curiosity. How well she still looked, he thought. Her complexion was brilliant yet, her eyes beautiful as of old. And she thought how little he had changed. His hair was a trifle gray under his hat, and he was bigger than ever; his eyes were absolutely the same.

"I wonder," she at length said, in a dreamy voice, "if all these years might have taught us a right understanding of each other."

"Was it a wrong understanding always?"

"On my part, yes."

Quietly unlatching the gate, he held it open.

"Mary I wish you would come in, I am glad to see you."

"It is impossible, for I must return to my cousin, who waits for me at the station. You know what freaks the imagination plays. When I found myself at Chelsford, after so many years' absence, I thought I would test my bump of locality."

"Have you passed the terrace more than once?" he asked, abruptly.

She blushed redder than a rose. "I wasn't quite sure," she stammered.

"Oh, I see: another experiment."

"How curiously things do turn up!" she wisely remarked.

"Very, indeed."

"I suppose I must go now."

"Where did you say you were going?"

"To our town, Walton."

"Your cousin is with you?"

"Yes—Miss Whitlow. Have you lived here ever since?"

"Oh yes, except a few years abroad."

"Well, good-morning."

"Good-morning."

Dizzy and confused, she sprang forward, but at the end of the path looked round, like Lot's wife. He was gazing at her with all his might, and, woman-like, she walked straight back to him, and cried, "You looked so always, Edward Grafton. I know now how few were the words you spoke to me, and yet I thought I had a numberless memory."

"You said as few. I judged you as I supposed you judged me. Our eyes were said to be alike. Was there a language in them for me? Was I dishonest to let mine tell my story? What could I say, then? My circumstances were patent. There came a fine day, and your mother swooped down on you and bore you off. I acquiesced, because you did."

For the first time Mary looked at the windows.

"No one there but my mother," he said.

Questions crowded upon Mary's mind, which she dared not ask—could not bring herself to ask.

"Mary, let me see your left hand." She held it toward him, and he pulled off her glove.

"Ah," was all he said, and kept the glove. Mary wished that it was not a mended one. The longer she staid, the more silenced she felt, and that was the old spell; but somehow she believed that she might now learn to master this man. Why could she not have been thirty-five when she was seventeen!

"Things do come round curiously!" he repeated, with a quiet smile that made her color deepen again. "I never felt more lonely than I did an hour ago when I heard the clock strike its dismal knell. It has been striking my life away hour by hour, and I have not rebelled. Am I not a patient country lout, biding the arrival of the hearse, living alone all these years with an invalid mother, to whom I am tied? Might I have chosen differently?"

"Alone!"

"I never married Helen Banks."

"No?"

"She was wiser than you. She learned what you should have known, and she went to another man's house, did my cousin Helen. Will you call over and help me count her children?"

Once more he opened his gate, and signed to Mary to enter. She shook her head. Not at his mere beck would she go into the house she had left with such sorrow, and left by him also so uselessly.

"May I walk back with you, then?" he asked. She assented. It was time; in fact, the train was nearly due. Miss Whitlow had slept in her chair, and woke with a crick in her neck and in her temper.

"Where upon earth have you been, Mary? What have you been picking up? You must be very weary of my company. Who's that?" she concluded, in a loud whisper.

"The old friend mother and I made years ago. Cousin Ann, let me introduce you to Mr. Grafton."

Mr. Grafton shook hands with the old lady, and expressed deep remorse that they should have suffered so long a detention in such a stupid place, though the detention had been the means of his rediscovery of a valued friend. He learned through her all he wished to learn of Mary Sage. When the train arrived, and they were about to take seats, he coolly asked her if she ever expected to see Chelsford again.

"Not to wait there again. If Cousin Ann made her sea-side resort of the Cliffs, she must, of course, pass through the town."

"Remember, then, that my house is open, if you choose to come to it. If I am there, I will open my gate and welcome you with all my heart."

They shook hands as they parted, and Mary looked back to him as he stood on the platform. He smiled with his old expression, waved his hand, and made the motion of a word with his lips. It was too mad a dream, the last two hours, for her to believe in. She might be sunstruck; it was very hot weather; a good many people were having queer fancies. She examined Miss Whitlow so closely to see if there was any thing strange about her that she asked what the matter was, and Mary said she thought it had been an uncommonly hot day, which Miss Whitlow denied.

"There was a very improbable story in that paper you gave me," she said. "The writers of fiction cram their readers with foolish, impossible lies."

"What was the story?"

"The husband of a young woman, having a quarrel with her, went off. In the course of several years she heard that he lost his life at Vera Cruz as a soldier in Scott's army. She married again, and at the end of fourteen years the first husband returns, with several scars and an intemperate face, and professes great love, anxiety, and a determination to regain her. Second husband willingly restores her to his arms, and finds another love immediately. The original pair are remarried, and he strikes her within a week. What a preposterous story!"

"What explanation did Number One make of the fourteen years' silence?"

"None given."

"Did not the wife require one?"

"The story does not say so."

"I should demand the history of every day," said Mary, with energy. "Has he one to give, though, that would be admissible?"

"Has?" said Miss Whitlow. "It ain't a live character, but a figment of somebody's cracked brain."

"Truth is stranger than fiction," said Mary.

"I have never found life any thing but the plainest kind of sailing, and having got on so far, expect to discover no mysteries. You ought to know better too. What ever has happened to you beyond a picnic?"

"Did you particularly notice Mr. Grafton?"

"Why, yes; I thought him a very good-looking middle-aged man, and quite polite. Where did you come across him?"

"Heaven help me, Cousin Ann, I have loved that man fifteen years, and had to wait at Chelsford station to discover it!"

"Not to him, I hope," said Miss Whitlow, gravely.

"He guesses it well enough."

"It is all nonsense. Of course you refused him years ago, and made a mistake. When I refused Deacon Watkins I never allowed myself to suffer a minute, though he had the best house in Walton. You are flighty in your disposition, Mary, and always will be. You are as red in the face as a turkey-cock this minute."

Mary was thankful when the coach stopped in Sackville Street, at their door. She ran up to her room like a young gell, as Bridget, the servant, declared. In its familiar solitude Mary hoped to recover composure, and be able to judge rightly of this, the most astonishing day she ever passed. Afterward, when retired for the night, she looked in the glass, determined to take a strict account of every indication and vestige of age, to uproot all vanity from her mind, and renounce every romantic anticipation. She was still fair enough for a man of forty, said the glass: a smooth cheek, abundant hair, shapely hands, an erect, well-formed person. As for romance, every woman was entitled by divine right to carry that Scripture on the tablets of her heart. As for anticipation, what right to that? None, her reason told her. Had not that obdurate Edward Grafton shown himself to-day, as he had shown himself years since, determined to be understood in his own way, determined to be sought and won as he pleased? It seemed to her for an instant as if he had been thus long waiting for her to pass his gate, like a spider in his web. But she had refused to go in, that was a comfort; and then she fell to crying bitterly, and longed to have the chance offered her once more. What was the cause of his mysterious conduct? she queried. The summer she had spent beneath his mother's roof together with her own mother had its history. Edward's cousin Helen, adopted by his mother when she became an orphan—

a feeble, eccentric girl—by some hocus-pocus had obtained an unaccountable influence over him, and held him as her promised husband. When Mary appeared, Edward straightway fell in love with her, and in an open way gave evidence of an affection which he believed, when he had reason to suppose Mary returned it, would lead to its proper and inevitable result. Helen herself, his mother, Mary's mother, must see that it was the right thing that they should be united. Love was the be all, end all—the Bible of the soul, teaching a religion before whose mandates every thing must bow. The consequence of this fine theory was that Mary's mother took her home immediately; his own mother was broken-hearted at the failure in choosing happiness for him; and Helen, after playing fast and loose with him, suddenly married a young man in the neighborhood who was devoid of every attraction Edward possessed. Edward went abroad, and only returned, after a long absence, because of his mother's prayers. A rumor reached him that Mary Sage was engaged; then it was contradicted. He thought of her constantly at that time, and could not forgive her for forsaking him. As the years went by he counted them, and finally settled in the conviction that Mary had grown too old to be any longer remembered as a young man's ideal; too old, indeed, for him to seek her with any sentimental object, and so, as he thought, his love ghost was forever laid. After all, reasoning from any ordinary point of view, his conduct was not to be accounted for. Mary concluded as his past had been, so would his future be, unless she should interfere. She ended her speculations here, and very sensibly went to bed.

When Edward Grafton returned to his house that day he entered it with a funereal feeling; a new void was there. The flying joy and hope he had seen fluttering in Mary's eyes had vanished, and left him desolate. He was not satisfied with himself. Not that he blamed his part in to-day, but long ago. He was in fault somewhere. When his cousin Helen jilted him to his content, why did he not follow Mary Sage? Why not, man fashion, ride into Walton town, and sue the woman he loved to be his wife? Simply because he had expected too much of her; the makings of a heroine were not bestowed upon her. He saw to-day that she was just the woman she promised to be, and he had tried to coerce her; opened his gate, like a melodramatic fool, and nodded, like Cæsar, for her to cross his threshold. He had always propped his pride and spirits with the belief that she loved him very deeply; now he doubted it, and the doubt was torture. The doubt increased, and became the torment of his life. Day after day passed, and still he kept at home. Mary grew dearer and dearer to him. He invented all sorts of excuses for seeking her: he was rich; she was poor, the companion of a peevish old woman; it was his duty to give her a home. Perhaps she had remained single for his sake; his honor, then, demanded that he should ask her hand in marriage. And then he knocked his excuses down like nine-pins. So these persons remained apart. A short interview had undone the work of years; for they were both longing and miserable, where they had been cheerful and contented. At last the same fate interfered in their behalf. The medium this time was not a railroad. Sick and idle, Edward went up to the city one autumn day to hear a famous prima donna in her celebrated rôle of Sappho. Miss Whitlow, busy, and interested in every thing under heaven, made a rush to the same city for the same purpose, and carried, as a matter of course, Mary Sage and her best gown with her. Edward and Mary were at the same hotel, the Pelham, without knowing it. No magnetism passed through the murk air of dinner and general fluffiness from one to the other to cause fresh speculation in those gray eyes so like to each other.

The opera-house was crowded. Miss Whitlow had a costly seat in the front row, and was fanning her old self in a gracious style, and entirely happy. Mary sat beside her in a soft white shawl, and a pretty head-dress of trailing flowers in her handsome hair. The glorious voice and the passionate acting of the prima donna, who was neither young nor beautiful, moved her strangely. She bent her face over her for a moment, and, when she looked up, saw the man she wildly prayed to see—Edward Grafton. He was in the parquet, exactly beneath the seat where she was. It was the counterpart of the situation at Chelsford, and it so occurred to them; they smiled with the same thought.

"What do you see, Mary?" asked Miss Whitlow. "Your attention seems to be fixed elsewhere. For my part, that dreadful creature shakes my nerves with her goings on."

"Mr. Grafton is in the parquet," said Mary.

"Oh! he is; he can locomote, then. I thought him a human lichen, and grown to the walls of his house in Chelsford. Does the man want to come up?"

"I dare say," replied Mary, carelessly.

"He looks distinguished, and he may come when the curtain falls."

Mary looked at her gratefully, and again at Mr. Grafton, with invitation in her eyes. He was at their elbow as soon as the act closed, and greeted Miss Whitlow first. A youthful blush mantled in Mary's face as she felt the pressure of his hand. Some one behind them vacated a seat, and he took it; the owner did not return when the curtain rose again, and the moments that followed were the sweetest Mary ever knew. The music, the brilliant company, lent a magic to the dear reality. Edward forgot himself, his pride, his rights, only remembering his present love; and Mary, forgetting nothing, feeling all, was ready to live or die with him, just as he chose. They were young again; the voice of passion from the stage, its song of longing and rejoicing or of grief and despair, sustained by the ever-recurring instruments of the orchestra, intoxicated them. They said very foolish things to each other. If Miss Whitlow had heard them she would have called for two strait-jackets.

"May I go home with you?" he asked, humbly, when the performance was over, and he was so carefully adjusting Mary's shawl that Miss Whitlow, to speak the vernacular, smelled an animal of the rodent kind, Latinized as musculus.

"We go to the Pelham Hotel, Sir," she answered.

"That is my hotel also; we go the same way."

Miss Whitlow graciously asked him to take a seat in her carriage, and all the way along, when a street lamp shone in, two pairs of gray eyes were fixed on each other with delight. Edward whispered to Mary to join him a few minutes in the drawing-room after Miss Whitlow was properly disposed of. They met, and sat in the deep embrasure of a window for half an hour. Little was said, but enough; and then Edward left Mary at the door of her room with a kiss which made her recall once more the days of the past. She sighed.

"What is it, my love?" he jealously inquired.

"Nothing, only that my hair is gray."

He groaned.

"Why, Edward, what ails you?"

"My wrinkles are legion."

Miss Whitlow was interviewed the next morning. She expressed no surprise; said, in fact, she had been looking forward to Mary's marriage. She went into a calculation about spoons and sheets, and was in a hurry to return home to get Mary ready. Edward persuaded her to remain in the city a week, and during that week persuaded her to consent to a hotel wedding.

"Whatever you did in the green tree," she said to them, "I never saw any thing but what you do in the dry. You are as silly as geese."

The old lady's eyes filled with tears as she spoke, and Edward and Mary smiled at each other, as only bride and groom can smile who are destined to "Live in peace,

And die in a pot of grease."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHAT so lazily restful—or so restfully lazy—as sitting on bluff or beach and watching the ceaseless incoming and outgoing of the white-crested waves? Newspaper and novel, which we thought to read so comfortably while lingering here, remain unopened in the listless hand, and we fall into dreamy moods. A strange fascination there is in these ever-changing, restless waters. The eye follows one long line of foaming surf till it breaks upon the shore, and then looks outward again to a tiny white spot, that grows and swells under the vision, spreading, leaping, dancing; then, serpent-like, creeping up the beach until, its power spent, it falls back and mingles with the great waters. Another and another follow, all aiming for the same goal, each striving to reach a higher point, each falling back when having done its utmost. What are these wild waves saying? As we dreamily gaze, with the ear sleepily filled with the unceasing roar of the waters, they seem to speak of life with its endless hopes and efforts and failures. Like each sparkling foam-crested breaker is each bright hope inciting to courageous action. But it touches a certain point, and breaks and vanishes. Vanquished, the wave slowly and sadly retires like one disappointed in an eager anticipation. Yet "try again" seems the constant motto of the tide. Though it appears never to reach the point for which it strives, it never gives up. Again and again the waves return with new vigor, with fierce determination. Another voice, not from the rising tide, but far more human, rouses us from unprofitable musings, with, "Do look at my beautiful stones!" and a petition to help some more." Let us be done with idle dreaming. Digging in the sand may not be dignified, but it is delightful, and will give an appetite for dinner. We follow the child to the highest water-mark, and with tiny shovels dig deep for the shining pebbles. We fill our pails slowly, watching meanwhile the rising surf, and darting back from the waves that every moment almost touch our feet. Then, retreating higher on the beach, we sit down to examine our treasures. How beautiful they are! so smooth, so various-shaped, so many-colored. We pick out the choicest with almost as much zest as our little companion, though wondering more than she, perhaps, how long the waves have been wearing them into these fantastic forms, and over what leagues they have traveled. She is only eager to gather many curiosities, which she is likely soon to do, for strange-looking shells and nameless things of the sea are mingled among sand and stones. It is a favorite amusement for children at the sea-side to collect these curiosities, and grown-up people do not disdain the occupation. It is wholesome to leave work and thought a while, and play with the little folks. It makes one a child again, gloomy feelings die away, and heart and spirit grow lighter. Yes! Unless you have, so to speak, been digging in the sand, and gathering pebbles all the year, it will be thoroughly restful to spend a while in some such recreation during these summer months.

A very just criticism has been made in connection with the recent Commencement seasons in seminaries and colleges for young ladies—namely, that the almost universal habit of young ladies is to overdress on Commencement-day. The majority, especially of those who are brought into more particular publicity from the parts they take on the occasion, are very much dressed. But a tasteful plainness would be much more appropriate than the elaborate ornamentation so often seen.

Limestone water is said to have a tendency to induce cholera. In many cases in Memphis and Nashville the disease has been definitely traced to the use of such water—so, at least, physicians assert.

Hiram Powers, the American sculptor, whose recent death is such a great loss to art and art lovers, was long a resident of Florence, having first established himself in the Italian city about the year 1837. His studio was on the Via di Serragh, in a large building once a convent, which he occupied as a residence and for his suite of studios and workshops, wherein were constantly employed a large force of the most skillful workmen of the world. It was not only visited by Americans, but by a vast number of people from all parts of the globe. Visitors were invariably received by him in a warm, cordial, and unaffected manner, and shown about his rooms, where were his various works in different stages of completion. He always cherished the deepest love for and pride in America, but Italy afforded him essential facilities for the enjoyment of his artistic pursuits.

The magnificent organ in the Alexandra Palace was destroyed by the fire which consumed the building, but the costly tapestry, the water-colors of Turner and of other masters, and many valuable oil-paintings, were saved.

Present arrangements make it very convenient for residents of New York to visit Long Branch. One may leave the city as early as seven o'clock and reach Long Branch in time to join the more fashionable guests of the hotels at breakfast. After spending a long day on the beach, the transient visitor may dine, take the cars a little past six o'clock, and after a charming evening sail, reach New York about half past eight. The boats run frequently during the day, and by special trains the distance between Sandy Hook—where the steamers land their passengers—and Long Branch occupies only eighteen minutes. The trip across the bay is delightful; the fresh sea-air is so invigorating that one becomes refreshed before the journey is half ended.

The special mission of the Great Eastern seems to be ocean-cable carrier; and again she has achieved a great success in laying a new trans-atlantic coil between Valentia and Heart's Content. The deep-sea cable extends to within eighty miles of Heart's Content, where it was cut and buoyed, ready for splicement to the shore end of the line. It may be interesting in this connection to note the lengths of each of the Atlantic cables. That of 1865, which has recently broken, is 1896⅓ miles long, and the cable of 1866 is 1868½ miles. The French cable of 1869, from Brest to St. Pierre, is 2557 miles in length; while the line just laid will be about the same length as that of 1865. Since the cable of 1865 broke, the French cable parted 208 miles from Brest in about 500 fathoms of water. The accident was repaired by the Hibernia, a length of 100 miles having been cut out and replaced by a similar length of new cable.

According to Persian etiquette the Shah can eat no meat that is not killed in his presence by his own cooks. It is said that the first night after his arrival in Berlin some of his servants were seen dragging a sheep into the saloon where the Shah was then sitting, and before they could be prevented they had cut the throat of the animal before his eyes, its blood spouting out upon the carpet. Arrangements have been made at Buckingham Palace by which the Shah may see his mutton killed without damage to the carpets.

When Captain Jack was captured he was dressed in tightly fitting clothes, with moccasins easy for running. He asked permission to make a change of garments. He retired behind the rocks, and soon reappeared arrayed in a clean striped shirt and dark pants. His young wife also dressed herself in a clean white gown and red sash, then washed the face of her pretty child, and put on it a neat red and black frock.

One of the most destructive forest conflagrations ever known in New England has devastated the wooded portions of Plymouth County, Massachusetts. The extreme drought rendered all efforts to extinguish the flames unavailing until something like sixty square miles of territory were laid bare.

A little boy about five years old recently died in Brooklyn under circumstances which should prove a warning to parents and attendants. The child was threatened with the measles, and in order to allay the accompanying fever a medicine was prepared which he was to take once in four hours. He had taken four doses, and was apparently doing well. He was left a while, sleeping peacefully, the bottle of medicine being on a table near his bedside. On the return of his father he found the boy in an unnatural slumber, and the bottle empty. Evidently he had awaked thirsty and drank the contents. No efforts availed to save his life.

We see the statement confidently made that there is no under-tow whatever at Long Branch this season. But what has become of it? Has it gone to visit stealthily some other sea-side resort?

Will any thing induce reckless people not to leave their guns and pistols loaded? We suppose there is no hope of bringing about such a result. A young man in Somerset County, Maine, left a loaded gun hanging up in the shed. His brother, eleven years old, took it down, playfully pointed it at three little girls who were playing in the yard, saying he was going to shoot them. The children started to run away, but he did shoot one of them, and she instantly fell dead.

Statistics indicate that the number of pleasure-seekers going to Europe during the present season will be about ten thousand in excess of the number last year.

Baltimore and Chicago are following the example of Eastern cities in giving picnic excursions to poor children.

The ex-Empress Eugénie recently laid the foundation-stone of a chapel to the memory of her august consort, in which his Majesty's remains will be laid for the present, and in which also space is to be reserved for herself. This memorial building adjoins the Catholic church of St. Mary, Chiselhurst. The ceremony was strictly "private." The chapel in which is to be placed the sarcophagus given by the Queen adjoins the church at the southwest end, and is in the Gothic style of architecture. The exterior walls will be of Bath stone, those inside of Caen stone, with a vaulted ceiling and polished marble columns. On the tessellated pavement will be the imperial crown and the letters "N" and "E" alternately. At the top of the chapel will be placed two imperial eagles and a cross. The building will be finished by August, and it is to cost about £1400, the expense being borne entirely by the Empress.

It is said that the late Horace F. Clark fell a victim to his unusual capacity for work. His business hours were practically from nine in the morning until two the next morning. Month after month his routine of work was performed, with little variation or recreation. He accomplished much, but such a rate could not be long sustained.

July brings the camp-meeting season, which continues until September. These meetings seem to have grown in favor with the multitude. The social and moral elements combine with the strictly religious, and help make the vicinity of camp-meetings a favorite summer resort.

Once upon a time a Russian countess living in Paris felt it necessary to try a change of air. The chief companion of her journeys was a little dog, which she carried in her muff, her sleeve, or her pocket. At Milan, "Toto," the pet, died. His mistress invited all the small dogs in Milan to the funeral; 300 mourners appeared, and each was supplied with a pall covered with silver tears. After the ceremony the 300 were invited to partake of the funeral baked meats, but here good conduct and philosophy failed them, and the feast broke up abruptly; the Riot Act had to be enforced, but not until one of the guests had been torn to pieces between the soup and dessert.

USEFUL RECIPES.

STRAWBERRIES, PRESERVED.—The variety known as lady-fingers is the best. They are so hard and firm that they keep their shape nicely; besides, their flavor is very delicious. If possible, preserve them as soon as gathered; they will keep much better. After removing the stems, allow a pound of the best white sugar to every pound of fruit. Put the sugar over the fire, adding a little water, and when it is boiling hot add the berries, keeping them boiling as fast as possible. Strawberries boiled at a "gallop" do not break as much as those that are boiled slowly. Cook them about twenty minutes, and then try and see if done. Bottle and seal them while perfectly hot, and when the jars have cooled place them in a box, the bottom of which has been strewn with clean sand. Pour sand in until the crevices between the jars are filled and they are covered on top with it. Place the box in a cool, dry cellar or closet. The sand absorbs the moisture during the hot damp summer weather, when strawberries generally spoil.

PEA SOUP.—To every quart of unshelled peas allow two quarts of water, in which boil the empty pods half an hour; remove, strain, add one pint cold water, place over the fire, and put in two pounds of beef cut in small pieces; boil slowly one hour, and if not enough water, add some boiling hot; put in the pease, and if the meat is not desired in the soup, remove it; boil half an hour and ten minutes before serving; add two table-spoonfuls of rice flour stirred smoothly in half a tea-cupful of new milk; stir frequently to prevent the flour from scorching.

BOILED PEASE.—They should be fresh when cooked, and boiled in just enough water to cover them, which should be salted, and boiling when the pease are put in. Do not cover the vessel while they are cooking, which ought not to be longer than twenty minutes, unless they are old. Drain off all the water; add a little cream and a small piece of butter.

SPINACH.—It should be cooked so as to retain its bright green color, and not sent to table, as it so often is, of a dull brown or olive color; to retain its fresh appearance, do not cover the vessel while it is cooking, and when done, drain in a colander, chop fine, add a lump of butter, heat through, and serve.

SWEET-BREADS.—Put into the dripping-pan a large piece of butter, let it get hot and thoroughly melted, then put in the sweet-breads. Turn them often, and allow them to cook through; when brown, sprinkle salt over them, remove, and pour a small quantity of water in the pan; boil it with grease left in, and pour over the dish.

BORDER FOR CURTAINS, SURPLICES, ALTAR COVERS, ETC.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Border for Curtains, Surplices, Altar Covers, etc.—Venetian Embroidery.

THIS border is worked on fine linen or batiste. Having transferred the design to the material, baste the latter on a foundation of enameled cloth, and run all the outlines with coarse white embroidery cotton; underlay the broad parts of the design with chain stitches besides. Work, first, the button-hole stitch bars between the design figures and the picot scallops on the bars, button-hole stitch the outlines, and then work the picot rings and picot scallops inside of the figures. The manner of working these scallops is shown by Figs. 2–5, page 172, Harper's Bazar, No. 10, Vol. V. The back stitches and lace stitches inside of the design figures and the scallops on the outer edge of the border are worked with thread. Cut away the material underneath the lace stitches and button-hole stitch bars and on the outer edge. This border is that used on the surplice, page 469.

OPPORTUNITY.

BY KATE HILLARD.

"WOULD but some fairy lend to me her charm!"
Lately I cried, in a despairing hour;
"Some mighty spell to nerve my weary arm,
Some Open Sesame of magic power!

"Or, better still, show but the time and place
Where a brave heart might win itself a name,
And carve a pathway to its lady's grace
Strewn with the blossoms of a deathless fame!"

Then as I mused a beldam crossed my way,
Tottering along with shrouded, earth-bent brow;
She stretched a lean hand from her mantle gray,
And said, in shaking whispers, "Here and now!"

"O poor delusion!" then I cried in scorn;
"Not thus are godlike powers to mortals given;
The helpers come clad in the strength of morn,
Bright with the ling'ring radiance of heaven!

"Nor this the place or hour for mighty deeds,
On this lone way, beneath this tranquil sky;
No foe is here, no hapless victim bleeds;
We are the only passers, thou and I!"

Silent she tottered on, but having passed,
A sudden glory seemed to light her way;
White angel wings sprang from her shoulders vast,
And fair she shone as shines the god of day.

A noble scorn shot lightnings from her eyes,
As fleeing still she turned her lovely head:
"The gods sent me in answer to thy cries,
But once repulsed I am forever fled!

"Learn to know Fortune ere she pass thee by;
Seize on her coming, for she will not wait!
And know by all thy ways divine things lie,
And every place and hour holds thy fate!"

LOST—A PARADISE.

IF any one objects to the following narrative that it is improbable, I retort, newspapers have proved that nothing is improbable. Every week happens what we were sure could never take place, and we read the full, true, and particular account. If that is not sufficient, why, you are no more able to prove that the events did not occur just as I tell them than I can prove that they did occur just as I tell them; so that, if I choose to believe it, why should I not tell my story in peace?

Betsinda was the daughter of old Bobinet, and the wife of young Pygmalion. All American men and women are princes and princesses, as they are all heirs to the throne. Any one of them may be elected President of the United States, or may marry him. Apart from this, she had at first glance no other claim to distinction, having married and reared children in the ordinary way, and lived a common life, only that Fate spins the sober brown thread of those dull lives as well as those of gold or purple, and so, to speak accurately, there are no common lives; and, little as you may have thought it, when you have met Mrs. Pygmalion in black silk, with lines of calculation in her face, this neat, prosaic woman once had her hand on the door of an earthly Paradise, and at times bewails its loss as bitterly, and with just such choking sobs, as does the first-class heroine the tragedy in her romance.

We have all our good and evil destiny, and Betsinda Bobinet was no exception. Her good destiny was young and zealous. Moulded and kneaded and patted, and marked with "Be good," she was proper and correct uniformly. Her motives and impulses all labeled correctly, the right one ready for use at the right time; her whole character well balanced and in the best working order; her world all surveyed, mapped out, graded, grass sown, and roads rolled. There was nothing in it unexplored, irregular, or not according to rule; and according to rule she walked in it, feeling and looking so dainty and delicate that I think that was how she first caught young Pygmalion's fancy. Pygmalion was an honest and modest young fellow, also a rising man of talent. Old Bobinet found nothing to object. All the world approved. Betsinda married him, and the young couple settled themselves in the block opposite the paternal mansion.

By this marriage Pygmalion obtained what is called a model of the domestic virtues by those who hold that such virtues abide in the cook-book, store-closet, and linen-room, and hold high festival on cleaning days. Mrs. Pygmalion possessed decided executive ability, and that peculiar talent of "seeing the statue" in the rough stone before she attempted to hew it, and making no blunders. On only one point might Pygmalion complain that he had been deceived. She was so dainty that she looked poetical. Pygmalion fancied her of finer fibre than himself; whereas the truth is, she was perfectly prosaic—one of those women whom the malicious Saturday Reviewer had in mind when he declared that it was men who were really the creatures of a romance of which women were incapable.

By this marriage Betsinda obtained a man who loved her, and reverenced her purity and her very helplessness as if she had flown down to him from a higher sphere. He had talent and ambition, and she inspired him. He felt that he could win the world's prizes for her.

Betsinda's evil genius was old. In his younger days he had pursued his career with ardor, and was prodigal of wicked inventions; but, like his human prototypes, those terrible voluptuaries of murder and the duel, ordinary wickedness palled upon him in his old age, and new and unusual methods were necessary if he would fully enjoy the fierce rapture of sinning. It was now his hobby to make the temptation insignificant, contemptible, ridiculous, and yet so nicely graduated to the weakness of the victim that it should be irresistible. It suited his malign humor to confound the virtue and discipline of years by a paltry device at which a school-boy might snap his fingers. Thus he simply watched the devices of Betsinda's good genius with a sneer. She was trained, drilled, disciplined, developed, and he never lifted a finger till her marriage, when he made himself over into a set of carpets and the proper furniture for a house; and being tasteful and an undeniable bargain, Betsinda bought him.

Her good genius smiled when he recognized the familiar features of his old enemy grotesquely distributed among chairs, tables, curtains, and carpets, and made the following entry in his note-book:

"Saw Betsinda's E. D. to-day. He has gone into the furniture. Evidently in his dotage—only his sneer retains its accustomed energy. The malice with which he looked out at me from fauteuils and scroll patterns is something indescribable. Poor old fellow!"

The home life began. For the first time Betsinda could look about her and say, All this is mine. For the first time she reigned supreme—she tasted the delights of absolute power. As the bird in its song, the bee in its labor, the artist in his work, she rejoiced in her own efficiency and power: all the more because she had just emerged from girlhood—that is, from a down-trodden, besnubbed, and belectured state of existence. Hitherto the object of her living and her future had been marriage. That was attained. She absorbed herself wholly in her new life.

On the other side, Pygmalion's profession brought him in contact with the problems of the day, and enticed him into the intricacies of that most fascinating study, human nature. First consequence: daily reports to his wife brimful of enthusiasm, discoveries, doubts, inferences. Second consequence: his wife snubbed him. She saw nothing in what he said. It concerned nobody in her set, and had nothing to do with bread, beef, the price of dry-goods, pew rent, or their standing in society. And it did disturb her seriously that he should walk over the new stair carpets before putting on his slippers; that he should pull the chairs out of their studied carelessness; that he left his handkerchief on a chair, and his newspaper on the floor, and smoked the curtains, and let in the sun to fade the carpets, and laid his head on the elegantly embroidered sofa-cushions—not to mention that she was burning to consult him about the shade of the new table-cover or the peculiarities of the cook. She heard him at first with a weak attempt at attention, then with plain indifference, then with impatience.

Third consequence: a chill fell on Pygmalion. His theories and plans were his wings, with which his inner and better self took trips to Paradise. But if Betsinda would not go with him—it was the honeymoon yet—he folded away his wings and resigned himself to listen with patience to chat about the house and the neighbors; and he learned by degrees to be in dread of the carpets, vases, chairs, etc., as things that made trouble between him and a woman over whom he was too magnanimous to tyrannize, and who could be influenced in no other way.

Still, wings are wings, and whoever has them will sooner or later use them, and if it can not be done at home it will be done abroad. But no doubts disturbed Mrs. Pygmalion, unless on one occasion when she received a visit from a certain mother in Israel. The system was in its highest working order, but the "mother in Israel" looked doubtful.

"My dear," she said, gently, "I see that you have conquered the details of housekeeping and reduced them to a system. It is admirable. Only take care that, in its turn, the system does not conquer you, and turn out a Juggernaut on your hands, riding down all that should be dearest to you. It is very desirable that your house should be well managed; but it is more desirable that you should regain that earthly Paradise open to almost every daughter of Eve: only you must be so humble, so watchful, so prudent, so unselfish, my love."

Now what could she mean? Mrs. Pygmalion felt that she was a model wife and woman, and the implied censure puzzled her.

After a time little Pygmalions gathered around the family table. They were fine, healthy, generous, quick-witted children, but marred, one and all, by an unaccountable defect. They had no comprehension of the beauties of Betsinda's system, and no reverence for the furniture. They brought in mud, and spilled molasses, and whittled pencils, and climbed sofas, and broke china, and dragged chairs over the matting, and a hundred and twenty-five times a day came in contact with the system, with a jar that was felt throughout the household. An irrepressible conflict waged between the children and their mother on the subject of china and furniture. The system had conquered Betsinda. The whole world was running wrong if the tidies were askew. She had invested all her energy, mental powers, and interest in these details, and it was no longer chairs and carpets, but herself, that was pulled about or defaced; and these objects built up an impassable barrier between herself and her household. When her children brimmed over with confidences and questions, the impulse with her was, not to seize the auspicious moment to read a lesson unsuspected, to urge on a growing intellectual impulse, or nip some evil principle, but to get the chairs back in place, to stop the wagon wheels that were being dragged over the oil-cloth, to prevent the bits of paper or crumbs from being scattered on the carpet, to shut out the obtruding sunlight, to order out some booted or muddy offender. When Pygmalion absorbed himself more and more in his studies, she congratulated herself that her husband was not like other men, a perpetual nucleus of disorder in the house. It never occurred to her to think that he was growing away from her into a different world and a higher life; that her children were growing into the knowledge of an age that prides itself on its vast yearly advance, and that she learned nothing, and was deliberately condemning herself to be the intellectual inferior of the entire family, as well as their daily stumbling-block. People said how wonderfully Mrs. Pygmalion had preserved every thing in her house. The furniture was almost unworn; the colors in the carpets almost as bright as new. They should have been brighter than new, when one considers the price she paid for them. These were the treasure years of her life; the only time given her in which to get beforehand with the world, in the hearts of her husband and children, and make home so kindly, and herself so gracious, wise, and indispensable, that she should never be dethroned. And she devoted these years to the furniture and the system. Home was a place of restriction. Never a child's company but broke its back over some consideration about washing or baking days. The carpets stopped all dancing and gymnastics. Every article of furniture loomed, in her imagination, like a veritable Malakoff in the way of all fun. Fun, in fact, with her, was an affair of out-of-doors, and instruction the business of a school. At home they were to eat, sleep, and dress in a proper manner, that should not soil or break any thing.

Result of all this, just what might have been expected. The years robbed her of youthful grace, roundness, and coloring. She grew a little hard, a little suspicious; she was faded, dry, and fussy, intellectually contemptible, and attached by a second-best love to her husband and children. Her first love she had given to her housekeeping.

On the part of her household—well, if truth must be told, if Mr. Pygmalion and his sons and daughters had met Mrs. Pygmalion, say, as any body else—Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Jones—they would have passed her by with a smile. They were attached to her from habit and instinct; but if any member of her family had dared be honest with himself, he must have confessed that she was far below the Pygmalion standard, and that he loved her, as far as one could love her, with a wince, and a strong flavoring of "sense of duty" about it.

There came a time when Betsinda awakened to the fact that somebody somewhere had made a great mistake. Pygmalion was now a great man, thanks to his "abstruse speculations that could do no one any good." And to her he was always kind, attentive, and gentle; made the most of her virtues, and passed over her shortcomings in silence; was careful that she wanted for nothing, and was not the least in love with her—and she knew it! Her sons and daughters, young men and women, treated her with deference; but she had no interest, share, or comprehension in their thoughts or pursuits. They were of another order. A fish could as easily sympathize with a quadruped. They could not give her any more love than she was worth; for there is an awful and rigorous justice in the way in which these life accounts are settled, let people say what they will. She felt that she was a lonely old woman, of small account, and, as usual in such cases, blamed every body but herself, and found every reason but the true one. But the fact still remained.

The mother in Israel rarely visits Mrs. Pygmalion; for she is gifted with a spiritual vision, and in that house, at twilight, midnight, or any quiet hour in which the current of life flows with a lazier ripple, there rises before her a vision of a receding Paradise, hovering just out of reach of dry, dusty, fussy little Mrs. Pygmalion, who pursues it with outstretched arms and wailing cries. She is a woman of a tender heart, and the spectacle is too piteous.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Out on Bail.—The License of the Bar.

IT is not often that I go to the play, because our plays are not of the highest class (though their prices are), and their atmosphere is not to be compared with the summer air without-doors, but the other night I made an exception in order to see a great actor: at least he is great in one sense, being over thirty stone in weight, and he is an actor in another, since he does his best to play the part of another man. The opportunity occurred in this way: Passing by the doors of a theatre in a neighborhood more populous than select, I saw inscribed upon them, "The claimant, Sir Roger Tichborne, has been engaged here for to-night and three following nights. There will be no extra charge."

We are accustomed in England to smile at your free-and-easy method of conducting criminal proceedings, yet surely across the water you do not permit those accused of perjury and forgery to exhibit themselves upon the stage during the process of their trial. At all events, it is a novelty with us, and the announcement at once opened both my eyes and my purse-strings—the latter not very wide, for the price of admittance to a private box was but five shillings. The house, a large one, was crowded to the ceiling with the democracy of the town, to whom what was doing on the stage was very literally but a pastime. They had come thither to cheer the butcher, and in all seriousness "wish he might get" his estate. When a wit in the gallery, taking the rôle of Sphinx, asked this riddle of the public generally, "Why should the claimant use Macassar oil?" and answered it himself, "Because it's a heir-restorer," the jeu d'esprit was taken in dudgeon. It was evidently considered a subject too sacred for a pleasantry. And for the first time I perceived the truth of what I had often been told, but had hitherto believed to be incredible, that this fat rogue was absolutely identified with the cause of the people. I will not do the intelligence of these good folks such a wrong as to imagine they believed him to be the veritable Tichborne; they sympathized with him, I incline rather to think, as being of their own order, engaged in contending with a powerful and antagonistic class—not as right, but as something weak, and that has no chance in the contest against irresistible might. When this mountain of fat came wabbling before the curtain, the audience actually rose at it in their misdirected enthusiasm, and cheered for several minutes. How the villain must have despised them in his heart! If he is not a butcher he has reason to complain of Nature, which without doubt has cast him in that mould. His picture in Harper's Weekly is very like him, but it must have been taken at a favorable moment. The trial had on this day gone against him even more than usual, and he looked very chop-fallen. He appealed to the people of England (with an H) to hold out to him their helping hands (without one), and added, what I thought rather significant, considering that he was among his friends, a request that they would reserve their judgment until his trial was over.

This trial, unparalleled in so many features, seems likely to effect some change in the license permitted to counsel in cross-examination. Lord Bellew, as you may remember, was the man who, when his school-fellow at Stoneyhurst, tattooed Sir Roger, and Dr. Kenealy (the claimant's advocate) having admitted that if this were true his client is an impostor, set himself to work to demolish his lordship's credibility. Doubtless he would not have pushed matters so far had he known that the prosecution had half a dozen other witnesses to the same effect, but as it was, his questions were appalling. Whether he knew the antecedents of this unhappy lord, or merely acted upon the general character of the British aristocracy with relation to morals, I know not, but he dragged out of him most terrible domestic revelations. Again and again did the poor witness appeal to the bench with, "Must I answer this question?" always to meet with their lordships' sorrowful reply, "We are afraid you must; it is one of the penalties of being a witness."

This may be very true, but the effect of such a state of things will be that no one will henceforth be found to volunteer his testimony under such conditions. The life of your English correspondent has been a blameless one. "A violet by a mossy stone, half hidden from the eye," is the one line, perhaps, in classic poetry most fitted to express his innocent and unruffled existence. Yet, nevertheless, one or two things have occurred in the course of it, not, indeed, absolutely censurable (I never got a five-pound note in my whole experience for running away with another man's wife, nor any thing like it), but which before I would tell to a special jury and a mixed audience I'd submit to the peine forte et dure. I'd swallow water till I became like the claimant himself rather than reveal these little peccadilloes. I'd prefer to lose my head—that is, to forget every thing that I was asked to remember—rather than remember them. At the same time, such questions—unless they have a bearing on the case in hand, which these had not—are only put by a particular class of barrister, who is not very particular. After Dr. Kenealy had done with this miserable lord, Mr. Hawkins put to him this significant query before he left the witness-box. "During the last trial," in which Ballantyne, it will be remembered (and he is not very particular), filled Kenealy's present place, "you were not asked these questions, I believe?" "No, I was not," said his lordship. But he has been asked them now, and thus these seven-year-old scandals of his life—I don't mean what he did at seven years old, but later—have become public property, the themes of gossip.

In drawing-rooms and smoking-rooms, and quite as much in the former as in the latter, naughty stories of great folks' gallantries are indeed ever welcome; but to hear of a "running-down" case between a market-gardener and a minister of state perched on a bicycle offers good society, it seems, less attraction. Yet there was some humor and not a little pathos (but that you can get any where) in an inquest the other week at Kew, where it came out in evidence that the deceased had died from indirect injuries received by a bicycle driven by the Right Hon. Robert Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer; and that the said Lowe declined to pay the sum of three pounds sixteen shillings for the necessary attendance of the doctor. Mr. Lowe does certainly use a bicycle, and is excessively short-sighted, so that such an accident might easily have occurred; and as to his not having paid the doctor's bill, people say, "Oh, that is just like Lowe." So I suppose the whole story is correct. In the mean time, let us hope the best, and that he has not put the "three sixteen" into "the estimates." The use of bicycles perhaps hardens the heart, for it certainly sharpens the intelligence. A youth who was riding one the other day came up with a gentleman with a horse and gig, the former of which he could not persuade to budge. At last, after hours of the usual combat between man and steed, the creature was induced to move a little, with a groom running by each side of it and dragging at the rein. "It seems to me, Sir," remarked the bicycle youth, who, independent of such means of progression, had been watching the whole transaction, "that your horse is one of those individuals 'who can be led but not drove.'"

I heard also a smart criticism at the Royal Academy this week. Two men were standing opposite to Millais's famous picture of "Old Age"—an old lady of ninety-four, very like, I should say, and upon which some people pass the remark, "How horrible!" and others, "That is equal to Rembrandt." It is, indeed, an admirable picture, but very rough, the paint being laid on as it were in flakes.

"It seems to me," observed No. 1, "that that old lady wants washing."

"Nay," said No. 2, "to my eye she appears still more to require ironing."

If I have not more funny things to tell you, there is a reason for it. It is not decent for even a foreign correspondent to be in good spirits when a calamity is threatening his own community. Upon my honor and word, Sir, our young women (as if any thing were welcome to them if only it is new) have actually taken to part their hair upon one side. It is becoming to about one woman out of fourteen millions, which was about our female population when Miss Eliza Cook adopted this style of head-dress a quarter of a century ago. Chignons, frisettes, Roman falls, and Grecian bends, though idiotic and superfluous, did not outrage the laws of Nature; and, mark me, it was only out of a desire to make their appearance as different as possible, and thereby more attractive to the opposite sex, that men themselves ever parted their hair upon one side. No antique statue, whether male or female, is ever represented thus. Is it, then, think you, an offshoot of the dreadful theory of Woman's Rights that has caused this infringement of man's patent in this respect? I pray you lift up your voice against this innovation. Love, it has been humorously said, is like a wig, inasmuch as the worst part about it is the parting; but now, in literal fact, the worst part about love (or, at least, about the objects of it) will be the parting; nor should I wonder, if this fashion becomes general, that the love itself, like the parting, will all be upon one side.

It is very seldom that I make personal remarks, and those I have now ventured upon only apply to those who have adopted this new device from affectation. Some ladies may have "a feather" in their hair, which will not part. My little boy tells me I should not meddle with people's looks. He had himself a habit of staring in case any body of marked appearance came in his way, until he got rebuked for it as follows: an old gentleman, very much marked with the small-pox, once attracted him, and thus acknowledged his particular attention, "Yes, my lad, you may well admire me; I was very expensively carved."

R. KEMBLE, of London.

THE INDUSTRY OF SOUTHERN WOMEN.

IT subserves no purpose now, either North or South, to overestimate or underestimate any thing that pertains to either section as a characteristic. Our Temple of Janus is razed. We therefore propose to put in a plea for the better appreciation here of Southern women. The notion prevails with us that they are pre-eminently lazy, and lazier than they would have been without slavery. Not very long ago we saw in a morning paper a paragraph that would do them a little exceptional reverence, yet beginning in the usual way, "Notwithstanding the inertness of Southern women," etc. Undoubtedly they have accustomed themselves to less manual exertion than they would if they had not had the negro for some of the bone and sinew of labor. But the facts do not warrant the assumption that we make. The chameleon has been sworn to from the tint it wore in certain positions.

Southern women—we are treating only the labor question—in their own way and manner are not more indolent than others, especially that class that we are in the habit of judging most unrelentingly (to wit, the rich), probably because we have found that most so with ourselves. We base our unjust judgment, however, mainly on the fact that they do what we do not, and omit in a measure the things that we do. They ask, when they make their first visit here, "Why do Northern ladies do such menial work, and hire their sewing done?" and therein is very much of the gist of our opinion. A young lady on her return trip from a summer tour here first put the query to us. She said she had seen ladies—at least they seemed like ladies (the qualifying clause was to lessen the shock the imputation was supposed likely to give)—cleaning paint and washing windows, and yet they hired their dress-making and even plain sewing done. It was a good deal of a question to ask of one who had never thought of the matter before, and was as guiltless as herself as to any skepticism on the manner of her own raising, and we own we kept it in our heart and did not answer. We are estimating things as they were ante bellum. It was a good deal to admit that we did not know; besides, it was a matter complex to explain, even if we had been clear on it, to a young girl made up of only Southern ways and her one visit North. She could hardly have been the wiser for any rendering we could have put upon it, and, as it was, she had one distinct fact. Millinery and dress-making were less universal arts with us then than now, and yet we could not have given any good reason for it except that it was so, and that always indicates a very unknown conjunction of causes. Southern misses commenced early with their sewing, and when ours were scarcely done with their dolls—certainly were not out of their school-days and short dresses—they were quite accomplished dress and shirt makers, and could, perhaps, make coats and pants as well. The same with their housekeeping, though the latter was not so much after the manner of the Northern, the actual doing of the thing, but the knowledge of what orders to give to have it done—knowing how bread, cakes, preserves, pickles, candies, etc., were made and meats cooked; knowing how a table should be spread and company received. They were vastly in advance of Northern girls on all these points, and probably are so still, where the war has left them means enough to live in the same manner as before. The difference with them between bond and free, so far as it is "help," is very little.

It requires knowledge, labor, and experience to manage there as well as here, and no form of wealth ever required more untiring vigilance to retain it and make it a luxury than theirs did, for it consisted mainly in negroes, and they were no easy-going governments, bank stocks, or houses and lands to let. They were a care in what they did as well as in what they did not. Their clothing had all to be cut and made for them, and, except on the largest estates, white labor did it all, especially the cutting, and it was no mean amount of work to do that for fifty or a hundred negroes, even though it was not more than three or four suits per year.

Then, again, there was sickness, dangerous as a thief or a fire among stocks and bonds, and the country was always malarious, as well as subject to yellow fever and the usual catalogue of diseases. And besides the anxiety for their chattels lest there should be loss among them, was the nursing and care, which usually devolved on the mistress. If there was a pulse to be felt, a lotion given, a poultice or a blister to be applied, it was her work. One negro would not even wash and dress another, except under orders. They had a dislike, that was in part a superstition, to doing for each other in sickness, and that, as well as their incompetency, threw the labor on the white people. The sick child that required better treatment than the mother was capable of giving it was brought into the house, if the mistress was unable to go to the cabin and attend to it, and was put in the crib beside her if she, too, were sick, or even in the bed with her. Then, again, their property had to be made sustaining, or it passed speedily into bankruptcy. It was an investment that was never reputed to pay an average interest of more than five per cent., and manifestly it would not bear great loss. Something was always to be planned for their hands to do. We have had much and varied experience of Southern life, but it was never our fortune to meet with the Marie St. Clair of Uncle Tom's Cabin. We don't doubt, though, but there were one or two here and there—but they were never a rule, and must have been very rare exceptions. If they were enough to spice a romance, they were not enough to constitute a historical fact. They were entirely incompatible with the sort of wealth they possessed. Those who came nearest to that class were too poor to own slaves or keep a house. There was no such thing as good or even passable housekeeping unless the mistress knew to order and appoint it, and attended to it. It was indispensable that she should know the minutiæ of cooking, washing, butter making, soap making, or whatever was to be done on "her place" or in her house, whether in the city or country.

They also did what no women here do, they made the gardens—that is, they superintended the work, and made them from one to three times per year, according to the season and distance south. "Have you made your garden yet?" was as common as any other question when ladies met.

They also attended to the poultry raising, except when they bought their supply from their negroes, as they did on some places. A family of average size and standing as planters probably consumed fifteen hundred fowls, of one kind and another, in a year. They were in lieu of much of the fresh meat that we get here as we need from the market or the meat wagon. The stores, too, had always to be under lock and key, and given out when wanted. One might give general orders about household details, and look off for a day or two, but it was not so with the daily supplies, and it was a very trusted servant indeed that ever carried the keys to the store-room, either for a longer or shorter period. However shocking the moral aspect of such a state of things may seem, no Northern woman could undertake the task of locking and unlocking every thing in her house, from thread and needles down, without finding it a great addition to her day's work.

Then, again, the Southern woman marries early, and is the mother of many children. She has from two to four more than the Northern woman, and instead of the one maid-of-all-work, as here, she had six or eight servants, big and little, old and young, sick and well, some more stupid and some less, all to be taken as the day found them and made into a day's work somehow, and it did not show for double the work of one white servant when it was done. A Northern woman, with the vigor of our bracing atmosphere still in her veins, could hardly have acted the part of mother and mistress in such a household, and fancied her situation was without toil. If it was not actual manual labor, it had in it the attrition of cares that were not without that friction that of itself is a fatigue. Then, too, they require far more changes of clothing than we do. Where three or four suits will do for us, they needed at least a dozen, and white labor was the source of supply for it all. Sometimes one of the servants was employed as seamstress, but she wanted constant looking after, and her skill was only equal to a very plain piece of work.

One characteristic that perhaps impresses the superficial Northern observer is that Southern women are always ladies of elegant leisure in the evening. But it is a social custom they provide for early in the day, and one that we could perhaps adopt in a measure and yet accomplish just as much in the twenty-four hours as we do now.

There were causes, too, for the habit as indigenous in their climate and locality as in their "peculiar institution." Northerners, whatever their industrial creed as Northerners, yielded to them the same as the native born.

Their shortest winter days in the latitude of the Gulf cities—and those give fashion to the interior—are nearly an hour longer than here, and they have therefore that much less need to eke them out with the night.

New Orleans put itself in full-dress and went to the theatre or opera, to a hop at the St. Charles or St. Louis, to a soirée or reception, and danced or took a hand at cards—it was not a reading city—and Mobile did the same as far as it could. There is as much of fashion as of principle in the ruling of the world at all times.

Then the evening air of their long summers, wherein they sit with open doors and windows, is loaded with myriads of insects always seeking the lights, and the land or the sea breeze almost as constantly fans them. Evening work was, therefore, labor under difficulties, and it was more agreeable to leave the moths in possession of the lamps, candles, or whatever constituted the glimmers of the night, and spend the evening in social converse out of their reach.

Then, too, they have perhaps been judged for the lack of the active manner that comes of habitually doing and arranging with one's own hands, as we do here. They had more of suavity and repose in their style. They had greater elegance and ease of carriage, and excelled in the pleasant chat and easy small-talk of conversation. They were greatly accomplished in what we are apt to consider a small art. But they were far from inert. The climate is, of course, more enervating than ours, and indisposes for as vigorous exercise as we take; but Southern women have energies that can accomplish as much in the way of manual labor as we can, and the war brought out their full capacity, economic, laborious, and inventive. They wove and wrought many waifs and straws into the support of those days, and proved, what the whole struggle did, that we were of one blood, one will.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XV.

HOW lusty and delicate the young leaves grow on their stems in their nook of sunshine! What could be lovelier in its way than the three geranium leaves starting from the mould in the window-box where the sun strikes across the corner of the sill? They are so firmly poised, yet glancing; each waved, and full of green juice that the sun turns to jewel-light, with spots of darker tint where the feathered edges overlap—a subtle piece of color wrought by sun and soil for no eye to see but by chance, yet ecstatic in its delight, as if formed for the centre trefoil of a great altar window. So the sun does all his work. So leaves grow by myriads in the garden and the forest. So the forces of nature bring forth every thing, left free to their impulses.

There is something in our frames, like the leaves, that would grow springy and strong, soft-colored and brilliant, upright and joyous, if it were suffered to. It appeals for sunshine and gayety, for abundant food and ease, for copious watering, tendance, and freedom. Give it these, and the body in its natural state, under present conditions, is as far beyond its common dullness and weakness as it is below that of the saints in light; for heavenly bodies can not be very different from ours unless they cease to be bodies. The mortal frame is noble enough as it is. No harp ever vibrates as it can with emotion and pleasure; no star shines so fair or wise as the face of man. God made it, and God loves it, which is the reason it wins so closely upon us, and is so dear. There is no wisdom in despising it or its sensations. It is crudity to uphold that the mental part of us should absorb all other. Brain and heart are dependent on the body, and it was meant, not for the slave, as men seem never weary of preaching, but for the interpreter and companion of both. Honor is due the body, and thanks for its pleasures, which are to be enjoyed with intelligence and leisure. They are no more low or debasing than mental pursuits when pursued to the exclusion of all others. The sensualist is no more intolerable in the order of nature than the pedant or pretender in literature, and does little more harm in the long-run. The former ruins himself; the latter, by a false philosophy, may lead thousands astray. Give the body its thirds with the mind and the soul—it is its due; and neither is the better for having more than its share.

The need of physical culture grows more urgent. The most unlike races mix mercurial with sullen blood in the most variable of climates, and mix habits as well, the only one peculiar to Americans as such being a tolerable contempt for the conditions of health inherited through half a dozen generations. The climate is not in fault, but the people are. How much easier it is to be magnificent than to be clean in this country! At any hotel there is enough of useless upholstery, as a matter of course, but a bath is an extra, often not to be had on any terms. This is the case even in the metropolis, where, at least, a better idea of civilization ought to prevail. There is not much to be said for the intelligent culture of any family who have carpets before their bath-room is perfectly fitted up. When refinement has reached another step beside faucets and pipes for providing water, each house will have its distilling apparatus to provide the purest water for drinking and bathing, and nobody will any more think of drinking undistilled water than they do now of eating brown sugar when they can get white. Her Majesty the Queen of England uses nothing but distilled water for her toilette, and the luxury and softness of such a bath are so great that no one will consent to forego it when once used to its indulgence. A small still costs five dollars, and would provide all the water that is needed for family use. It should be kept in action all the time, and fill a close reservoir for bathing, while that for cooking and drinking should be freshly distilled each day. A simple substitute, where a still can not be had, is a tea-kettle, with close cover and a gutta-percha or lead pipe fastened to the spout, and leading through a pail of cold water into a jar for holding the distilled water. The steam from the boiling water goes off through the tube, and cools under the cold water, and runs off pure into the receiver. Where houses are heated by steam they may be amply provided with distilled water, I am told, by adding a pipe to one of the tubular heaters, that will carry steam into a cooler, from which the pure water may run day and night. Besides the distilled water baths, there should be facilities in the complete household for the vapor bath at any time. This is invaluable in colds, rheumatism, congestions, and neuralgia. The readiest substitute is the rush-bottomed chair and lighted saucer of alcohol described in a former number. A sulphur bath requires a shallow pan of coals with a water vessel above it, and an elevated seat over the whole. Sulphur is thrown on the coals, which mingles with the steam, and enters the system by the pores, which are opened by the vapor. The patient, brazier, and chair must be enveloped with a water-proof covering in the closest manner, leaving only the head exposed, so that no sulphurous vapor can possibly be breathed, as that would be suffocation at once. In regular bathing establishments the patient sits in a wooden box, having a cover which fits tight about the neck, leaving the head out, and this box is filled with steam by a pipe, and the vapor impregnated with sulphur from a spoonful of it burning in one corner of the box. It is difficult, if not impossible, to administer a sulphur bath without proper and special appliances, and this allusion to its method is only made at the instance of curious correspondents.

The bran bath, recommended before, is taken with a peck of common bran, such as is used to stuff pincushions with, stirred into a tub of warm water. The rubbing of the scaly particles of the bran cleanses the skin, while the gluten in it at the same time softens and strengthens the tissues. Oatmeal has the same effect, and is even better, as it contains a small amount of oil that is good for the skin. To make the hands soft and white one of the best things is to wear at night large mittens of cloth filled with wet bran or oatmeal, and tied closely at the wrist. A lady who had the whitest, softest hands in the country confessed that she had a great deal of house-work to do, and kept them white as any idler's by wearing bran mittens every night. The pastes and poultices for the face owe most of their efficacy to their moisture, which dissolves the old coarse skin, and to their protection from the air, which allows the new skin to come tender and delicate. Oatmeal paste is efficacious as any thing, though less agreeable than the pastes made with white of egg, alum, and rose-water. The alum astringes the flesh and makes it firm, while the egg keeps it sufficiently soft, and the rose-water perfumes the mixture and makes the curd not so hard. Before leaving the subject of bran baths it should be said that for susceptible persons the tepid bran bath is better than a cold shower-bath. The friction of the loose bran calls the circulation to the surface. Although in France the bran is tied in a bag for the bath, this plan gives only the benefit of the gluten, not that of the irritation.

The frequency of the bath should be determined after a week or two by feeling. As often as the refreshment is desired, take it. The harm is done by staying in the water long at a time, not so much by bathing often. A hot soap-suds bath once a week in winter is beneficial to persons with moist and oily skins. Bay-rum and camphor may be used to advantage by such persons each time after washing the face. The hot suds bath should be taken thrice a week by all those who wish to remove moth patches.

These, called indiscriminately moth, mask, morphew, and by physicians hepatic spots, are the sign of deep-seated disease of the liver. Taraxacum, the extract of dandelion root, is the standing remedy for this, and the usual prescription is a large pill, or what amounts to a large pill in mass, every night, sometimes for months. To this may be added the free use of tomatoes, figs, mustard-seed, and all seedy fruits and vegetables, with light broiled meats, and no bread but that of coarse flour. Pastry, puddings of most sorts, and fried food of all kinds must be dispensed with forever by persons having a tendency to this disease. It may take six weeks, or even three months, to make any visible impression on the health or the moth patches, but success will come at last. One-third of a tea-spoonful of chlorate of soda in a wine-glass of water, taken in three doses, before meals, will aid the recovery by neutralizing morbid matters in the stomach. There is no cosmetic that will reach the moth patches. Such treatment as described, exercise such as is tempting in itself, and gay society, are the conditions under which its extinction is certain.

THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

THE accompanying admirable illustration will enable our readers to form an excellent idea of the personal appearance of the modern Haroun-al-Raschid, who is now abroad on his travels, and is creating a marked sensation in Europe. He is the first successor of Xerxes who has ever had enterprise or curiosity enough to visit the Western barbarians; but it seems that he could not resist the contagious example of the Sultan of Turkey and the Khedive of Egypt, and his visit will probably result in opening Persia to European influence. Personally Nasr-ed-din, the Shah-in-Shah, whose name proves such an irresistible temptation to punsters, and is freely translated by English gamins as Mr. Shaw, of Persia, is not altogether as kingly as might be expected. He is described as being a little more than forty, of middle stature, and rather stout, with a waddling gait. His large black eyes are very fine, but are usually concealed by gold spectacles. His complexion is of the cinnamon brown peculiar to the Persians, and not at all displeasing; his features are good, but rather coarse, and a heavy black mustache extends across his face. His suite is a small army of itself, consisting of fifty-five Persians of rank, together with two physicians, who have in turn thirty-three persons to wait on them. His first visit was paid to Russia, where he was received with signal courtesy by the Czar. He next proceeded to Berlin, where he remained a week, and thence journeyed through Germany to Belgium, whence he crossed over to England, and landed, June 19, at Dover, where great preparations had been made to receive him. Buckingham Palace had been prepared for his residence while in London.

He is accompanied by Baron Reuter, who has undertaken to develop the internal resources of Persia, and to connect it by railroads with the rest of the world, and has obtained grants which give him almost absolute control for this purpose of the whole kingdom. From England he will proceed to France, and thence to Vienna to visit the Exposition.

Thus far the Shah does not seem to have won golden opinions. He is arrogant, impatient, unrefined in his habits, discourteous, and wholly wanting in respect to ladies, rudely turning his back even upon those of the highest rank whose appearance does not chance to please him. In this respect he differs widely from the Orientals who have hitherto visited the West, and whose politeness has been almost ideal. But his manners and habits must be judged from a different stand-point than ours, and we should at least give him credit for the force of character which has led him to take a journey in the interest of progress of which none of his ancestors ever dreamed, and which doubtless seems as adventurous to Persian eyes as are the wanderings of Livingstone or Du Chaillu in the sight of the Occidentals.

GHOSTS AND GOBLINS.

IT would be easy to fill page after page with the details of the various ideas entertained about ghosts, goblins, and demons. Such ideas extend not only to the appearance of such beings, their apparel, appurtenances, and so on, but to the noises which they make either of themselves or by means of various supernatural objects which they are supposed to carry about with them. Thus,

"The sheeted dead
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets
A little ere the mightiest Julius fell."

And it is to be noted that as ghosts commonly show no face, so few have been known to speak with full voice. This may be because the noises heard at the hours when ghosts are seen are not such as can be by any possibility mistaken for the human voice in its ordinary tones, while, nevertheless, an excited imagination can frame spoken words out of the strange sounds which can be heard in almost every house in the stillness of night. This also serves to account for the notion that ghosts can clank chains, or make other dismal noises. Sounds heard at night are highly deceptive; a small noise close by is taken for a loud noise at a distance (not necessarily a very great distance); and a noise made by objects of one kind will be mistaken for noises made by objects of a different kind altogether. A friend of mine told me he had been disturbed two nights running by a sound as of an army tramping down a road which passed some two hundred yards from his house: he found the third night (I had suggested an experimental test as to the place whence the sound came) that the noise was produced by a clock in the next house, the clock having been newly placed against the party-wall.

We all know Carlyle's story of the ghostly voice heard each evening by a low-spirited man—a voice as of one in like doleful dumps, proclaiming, "Once I was hap-hap-happy, but now I am meeserable"—and how the ghost resolved itself into a rusty kitchen-jack. There is a case of a lady who began to think herself the victim of some delusion, and perhaps threatened by approaching illness, because each night, about a quarter of an hour after she had gone to bed, she heard a hideous din in the neighborhood of her house, or else (she was uncertain which) in some distant room. The noise was in reality the slightest possible creak (within a few feet of her pillow, however), and produced by the door of a wardrobe which she closed every night just before getting into bed. The door, about a quarter of an hour after being closed, recovered its position of rest, slightly beyond which it had been pushed in closing. In another case, the crawling of a snail across a window produced sounds which were mistaken for the strains of loud but distant music.

It is, perhaps, not going too far to say that our modern spirits, who deal in noise-making as well as in furniture-tilting (of yet more marvelous feats we say nothing), are not unacquainted with the means by which the ear may be deceived as in the cases just considered. Some sounds said to be heard during dark séances suggest the suspicion. It will be seen that the opinion to which I incline—as the best and perhaps only natural interpretation of events supposed to be supernatural—is that real sights and sounds are modified by the imagination, either excited or diseased, into seemingly supernatural occurrences. It does not seem to me likely that in any large proportion of recorded (and presumably veracious) ghost stories there has been an actual phantom of the brain. Such phantoms are sometimes seen, no doubt, and unreal voices are sometimes heard; but the condition of the brain which leads to such effects must be regarded as altogether exceptional. Certainly it is not common. On the contrary, the play of fancy by which images are formed from objects in no way connected with the picture raised in the mind is a common phenomenon. Although some minds possess the faculty more fully than others, few actually want it. I suppose there is not one person in a thousand who can not see "faces in the fire," for instance, though to some the pictures so produced are much more vivid than to others.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. J. L.—We have not the pattern you wish.

CARRIE J.—Piping is merely a narrow bias fold sewed on the edge of hems, bands, etc., with blind stitches.

MRS. S. D. A.—Make the suit of gray linen by Double-breasted Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI., and trim with side pleating on the skirt and a bias band on the polonaise. Make the girl's white dress with box-pleated blouse and two skirts. The medium heavy white dress should have a single-breasted loose polonaise made by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI.

MAUD.—Bathe your lip two or three times a day with weak lye or diluted ammonia, putting oil on afterward to heal the smart.

MAUDE AND MADGE.—The sulphur vapor is never applied to the face. It clears the skin by acting on the rest of the body. Use common sailor's tar with enough oil to make a salve of it.

GERALDINE.—Though you seem anxious to poison yourself for the sake of your complexion, it is fortunate that Fowler's solution can not be had without a physician's prescription. Fresh buttermilk is not unhealthy unless the cream stands too long beforehand, so as to become acrid. Then it is deleterious.

KANSAS.—Try boiling your ingredients to the desired thickness. Tar is of different consistencies.

KATIE B. H.—Take a thorough course of taraxacum for the liver, and consult a physician.

LOUISE AND OTHERS.—The recipe for the alum and egg paste has been so often repeated that we can hereafter only refer to No. 13, Vol. VI., of the Bazar, containing it.

LILLIE M.—Use enough oil to thin the tar to a salve. Try boiling the two together in a tin vessel set in hot water.

M. A. S.—Sleep with your hands in cloth mittens large enough to admit bran and water poultices. Your other question will be answered in a coming number of "Ugly Girl" papers.

FREEDOM.—Antimony is injurious if often used to darken the eyes. A few applications do no harm.

MRS. S.—Rub walnut oil on your child's forehead to keep the hair from growing too low, and brush it back daily, keeping it back with a round comb. Do not use the flannel band.

ROWENA.—Rub white specks on the nails with fine wood ashes and water; repeat a few times if they do not at once disappear. Or try pitch and myrrh melted together.

W. R. J.—Your bishop's lawn suit would look well trimmed with a puff and ruffle.

ECONOMY.—Consult back numbers of the Bazar for descriptions and illustrations of fichus, collarettes, fraises, etc.

SUBSCRIBER.—Get white or palest Nile green ribbons and gloves to wear with your green silk. Slippers of white or light-colored silk or kid are suitable at receptions, but white buttoned boots are preferred usually.

COUNTRY GRETCHEN.—The Blouse-Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is the model for your white polonaises. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 29, Vol. VI.

CLARA G.—Make a white alpaca over-skirt, and wear with a black velvet sash. For the garnet silk get a white organdy polonaise. Make your boy's white dresses with kilt skirts and a loose jacket. Of course he should wear white drawers with all dresses; they must not be long enough to show below the skirt.

STUPID.—The Bazar Book of Decorum, price $1, sent by mail by Harper & Brothers, will tell you all you want to know about etiquette.

EMILY T. P.—We have no cut paper patterns of the demi-polonaise, but may publish one by-and-by.

MRS. S.—Instead of a regular suit of your brocaded pearl-colored silk you should get a white organdy polonaise, and have an afternoon and semi-dress suit for evenings.

SUSANNE.—Get light yellowish-brown silk to go with your dark leaf brown, and make by directions given to "Inquirer" in Bazar for July 19. You will require about fourteen yards. Wear white muslin or China crape ties and palest buff gloves. Get a brown chip hat of Rubens or Rabagas shape, and trim with the two shades of silk, ostrich tips, and tea-roses.

MRS. F. S.—Striped goods still remain in fashion. The loose Blouse-Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is the best model for your dress if you use a polonaise; if not, you should have a simple jockey basque and round over-skirt. Trim with bias puffs and ruffles of the material.—Your Bazars were lost in the mail, and we are not responsible for them. Subscribers' Bazars are sent from this office faithfully, and we can not do more than that.

LIZZIE B.—Light-colored grenadine is not made over black silk, but over silk or muslin of the same color. Your piqué suit would look well made as you suggest.

E. J.—Two skirts, with a box-pleated blouse-waist, is the best model for a young girl's dress. If it is made of fine white linen cambric, put bands of Valenciennes insertion between the box-pleats, and trim a flounce for the lower skirt with Valenciennes lace; edge the upper skirt with lace, also the sleeves. If it is merely linen lawn, omit the lace and insertion, and use simple gathered ruffles.

L.—A Victoria lawn will look well trimmed with velvet pockets, etc., and worn with a sash of black velvet.

JENNIE B.—A gray silk or Irish poplin skirt, with a redingote of cashmere or camel's-hair of the same color, will be suitable for a bride's wedding and traveling dress in September. Such a dress will be appropriate for a morning church wedding. Have a Rabagas bonnet of the dress silk, with a rose cluster and ostrich tips for trimming. Any simple suit, or else a morning wrapper of foulard, checked silk, or cashmere, will answer for breakfast at hotels.

MRS. E. J. C.—We can not furnish addresses in this column, nor do we make purchases for our readers. Consult our advertising columns.

MRS. JUDGE R.—Get a straw sailor hat for your little girl to travel in. A light striped cloth sacque, or else one of white Turkish toweling, or of corduroy trimmed with black velvet binding, collar, cuffs, and pockets, will be suitable for her. Striped gray and white mohair is used for summer balmorals, also the seersucker gingham that washes so nicely. Consult Bazar No. 27, Vol. VI., for fraise patterns. That on the reception dress illustrated on page 428 will be a stylish model. Of course you could not wear a silk ruffle about your neck without white inside of it. A white muslin, lace, or crêpe lisse pleating slightly wider than the fraise is placed inside.

ELLEN.—Trim your black alpaca with deep kilt pleating on the skirt, and merely a bias fold around the over-skirt. Get English lisle-thread gloves for children to wear when traveling.

MRS. J. L.—It is impossible to speak definitely about next winter's fashions. The tendency at present is to do away with the bouffant drapery produced by puffing and looping. It is not necessary to have the front trimming on a skirt different from the back, but it is usual on rich and elaborate dresses. Two or three straight gathered ruffles extending plainly around the dress are stylish for simple dresses.—We can not repeat the recipe in this column.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

THE GREAT ATTRACTION.—The great attraction of this week is the magnificent new rooms of the Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, at the corner of Superior and Bond Streets. Crowds of people may be seen in and about the place at any hour of the day or evening, gazing at the superb carpets, the frescoing, the gilt chandeliers, the wonderfully carved counters, and the general elegance of every thing about. A prominent business man of this city remarked after going the rounds of the place, that "This is up to the style of the Erie Railway offices in New York." The lady visitors, almost without exception, sit down and try one of the machines, and always conclude that the Wilson Underfeed Sewing-Machine is the nicest feature of the admirable concern. And they are not mistaken. In beauty of form and finish, in ease and precision of work, and in perfect capacity for any kind of sewing, the Wilson machine is unsurpassed. Call at the new rooms and see it work.—Cleveland Daily Leader.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

BIDDY (to Pat, in charge about a difficulty). "Never fear, Pat! Shure y'ave got an upright Jidge to Thry ye!"
PAT. "Ah, Biddy Darlin', the Divil an Upright Jidge I want! 'Tis wan that 'll lane a little!"

FACETIÆ.

ONE of the most effectual ways of taking the poetry out of a good-looking girl is to stuff her ears with cotton-wool and put her respirator on.

RATHER NICE.

ALGERNON ETHELRED. "What do you think of my new portrait? They have made me precious ugly, haven't they?"
CONSTANTIA LAVINIA. "Yes, they have, very; but it is a splendid likeness."

A SKY-LIGHT—The moon.

CHEAP AND LIGHT EDUCATION.

BOY. "Box of lights, Sir?"
GENT. "Naw! I don't smoke."
BOY. "You don't! Buy a box, then, and I'll learn you."

A SINGER SEWING-MACHINE—A musical tailor.

What is the difference between King Robert the Bruce and King Alfred?—One gained the battle of Bannockburn, and the other lost the battle of burned bannocks.

A SLIP OF SHAMROCK.

Speaking of a middle-aged gentleman who had married a very young lady, "That man," said Mr. Murphy, "is old enough to be her father."
"Not quite," replied Mr. O'Rourke. "There's only seventeen years difference between them. But he's quite old enough to be her mother."

A gay Spiritualist may be called a happy medium.

ABSURD IDEA—That only men of standing should sit as grand jurors.

PSHAH!—A correspondent writing from Unter den Linden says that owing to the festivities in honor of the Shah, Berlin was (more than ever) on the Spree. As the august monarch went next to Wiesbaden, there is no doubt that Frankfort was lively (on the Main).

ONE TO HIM!

WASHER-WOMAN (to small boy, who has brought a very dilapidated shirt). "Tell yer mother if she sends this 'ere again, I shall wash it in two."
SMALL BOY (equal to the occasion). "Very sorry, mum, I'm sure, but I don't think mother would mind if you washed it into half a dozen."

A fond mother in Norwich gave her five-year-old hopeful an outfit of fish-tackle. Soon she heard a shout from Willie, and, running out, found one of her best hens fast winding up the line in her crop, whither the hook had already preceded it. Willie, observing the troubled look of his mother, quietly remarked, "Don't worry, mother; I guess she'll stop when she gets to the pole."

"Child," said a Sunday-school teacher, "who made your vile body?"
"Well, ma'am," said the little girl, "it's not a good one, but isn't it rather hard to call it vile? It was mother made it, and sister made the skirt."

THE AGE MEN LOVE—Marri-age.

An obituary notice in a New England paper concludes with the information that the deceased "leaves two infant daughters, both girls."

THE MOST USEFUL THING IN THE LONG-RUN—Breath.

"Doctor, what will cure the fever of love?" "The chill of wedlock, miss."

SUCH IS LIFE!

I have a cat that begs,
And sits on her hind-legs,
But she never catches mice.
I have two bantams nice,
But they never lay any eggs!

And I have a splendid vine,
Of a sort that's superfine;
But if I should ever wish
To have of grapes a dish,
The market's they'll be—not mine!

And of melons and cucumbers too
I plant every year a few;
But just at the very time
When I find they reach their prime
They're hawked cheap the city through!

I've camellias enough, I presume,
To fill up a decent-sized room;
I get buds, it is true, on them all,
But untimely they always fall,
And I never have gathered a bloom.

Well! "A part," said some worthy old soul,
"Is very much more than the whole."
So be it, my worthy old hearty:
Then life's all a part of a party,
And the world is a droll with a roll.

PLEASANT FOR JOHNS!

MRS. BLANK. "Oh, Mr. Johns, I was so pleased to meet your sisters the other evening at the Smiths'. Such nice girls! So good-looking!"
Johns makes an indistinct remark. A pause.
MRS. B. (anxious to be still more polite). "I should never have guessed that they were your sisters, you know."

"It is very sickly here," said one of the sons of the Emerald Isle the other day to another.
"Yes," replied his companion, "a great many have died this year that never died before."

A THING TO BE DONE BY INSTALLMENTS.

AUNT EMILY. "You're surely not going to Shoot Me, Malcolm?"
MALCOLM. "Well, No! Anyhow, not all at once, you know, cos you're too big!"

XIT ON THINGS IN GENERAL.

ON DRESS.

Dress is fashion's mode of disfiguring nature. All women and many men like to dress well. The accompanying is a recipe for good dressing: Egg, one; mustard, some; pepper, little; salt, more; sugar, less; oil, to palate; vinegar, to taste. This is for salad. Any gentleman may try it on himself if he chooses, but no result is guaranteed. The following are useful words for a lady's toilette: Dress, to attire one's self; Ad-Dress, to put on more clothes; Re-Dress, to dress again.

Somebody said, "Dress makes the man." In Paris a man makes the dresses. A Worth-y man! "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." I can't tell you any more.

ON BOOK-KEEPING.

This is a useful art, which should be assiduously cultivated by the young. It is very simple, and has only one rule.

Rule I.

Borrow a book and don't return it.
Bless you, my chee-yil-dren!

ON FATHERS.

Fathers are accidents that only happen to us once in our lives, and then they come without our consent. Fathers take a mean advantage in always being born beforehand. If sons came into the world first, they might father themselves. This may sound confusing, but will well repay the most serious investigation. Watch this frame, and keep your eye on your paternal relative.

ON UMBRELLAS.

An umbrella is one of those things to be put by for a rainy day. It's a wise umbrella that knows its own proprietor (see Book-keeping). I could tell you a great deal about umbrellas if I liked; but I don't; it's a sore subject. Fare thee well! and if forever, my umbrella, fare thee well!—BY-BY-RON TA-TA.

ADVICE TO BOYS.

To throw Stones.—Fold each one carefully in a feather-bed, and give good notice to all in the neighborhood when you are going to pitch.

To carry Gunpowder in the Pocket.—Soak it well in cold water, then wrap it up in a cover of oiled silk.

To slide down the Baluster.—Let a surgeon sit upon the lowest stair. Also carry a pailful of poultice in each of your hands, as you may need it.

To get rid of studying your Lessons.—Eat a hot mince-pie every night, for one week, before going to bed.

To cure creaky Boots.—Wear them always in going to the cake pantry.

To be polite to Sisters.—Get their big brother to introduce you to them.

TO A LONG-WINDED ORATOR.

On some far distant Northern shore, we're told,
The winter wind is so intensely cold
That, when one speaks (it is a strange affair!),
The words, congealing, harden in the air,
And there, undreamed of and unheard, they stay
Till spring, revolving, melts their chains away,
When forth in joyous liberty they burst,
Each to the ear that it was meant for first.
Oh! what a boon would Heaven to us assign,
If thus 'twould manage with that voice of thine!
If, when thou speak'st, the words that from thee hie
Would hang concreted midway in the sky!
But, joy ecstatic! bliss beyond compare!
If spring, revolving, would but leave them there!

A correspondent says: "I have recently heard two stories about Israelites, which I know will be amusing, and which I hope will be new to your readers. The first is of Sir Moses Montefiore. When negotiating a loan on the Bourse, on which he was very 'keen,' a small knot of capitalists approached him. 'Oh dear,' says one, 'he is going to swallow us all.' 'No, my dear Sir,' said Sir Moses, with a caustic smile, 'my religion forbids me that.' The second is of a German Jew, who was eating a pork-chop in a thunder-storm. On hearing an unusually loud clap, he laid down his knife and fork, and observed, 'Vell, did any poty efer hear such a fuss apout a liddle pid o' bork!'"

A farmer and his wife called at a Detroit photograph gallery last week to order some photographs of her, and while the operator was getting ready the husband gave his wife a little advice as to how she must act: "Fasten your mind on something," he said, "or else you will laugh and spile the job. Think about early days, how your father got in jail, and your mother was an old scolder, and what you'd have been if I hadn't pitied you! Jest fasten your mind on to that!" She didn't have any photographs taken.

"Pretty well," remarked the doctor's daughter, who took an interest in her father's purse and profession, when some one asked her how "things were going." "Plenty of colds, some bronchitis, and a little typhus fever; but, as father said yesterday, what we want to make things lively is a nice little epidemic!"

There's an old lady with false teeth out West who wants to know if the Yankees can't invent some new way of putting on pillow-cases; meanwhile she nails the cases against the wall and drops the pillows in.

DANGEROUS DOGS—Modocs.

BRILLIANT.—An exchange says: "The Nebraska Indians are allowed to ride free on all the trains they can jump on while the latter are in motion. The tribe is being reduced very rapidly." This is by all odds the most effective and economical system of dead-heading on record.

A FIX.

HOSPITABLE LADY (with interesting daughters). "Ah! how do you do, Captain Lovell? What an Age since we met! Are you Engaged this evening?"
SOFT-HEARTED CAPTAIN (who likes all interesting daughters). "Er—No!"
HOSPITABLE LADY. "Then come and Dine with us!"
SOFT-HEARTED CAPTAIN. "You're very kind! Most happy! At what o'clock?"
HOSPITABLE LADY. "A quarter to eight. Au revoir!"
SOFT-HEARTED CAPTAIN (suddenly recollecting that he has completely forgotten who the Hospitable Lady is, and not liking to say so). "Oh—er—hum! Ah!—by-the-bye—er—where are you Staying now?"
HOSPITABLE LADY. "Oh, the same old Place—No. 16. Au revoir!"

[Exit Hospitable Lady.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 31.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

PHOTOGRAPHS.

PHOTOGRAPHS have been in fashion for several years. They are younger than daguerreotypes and older than pastels. They are desirable for many reasons. In the first place, they are comparatively inexpensive, if you except the torture you endure in having one "taken." I would rather be compelled to "memorize" Pollock's Course of Time or Milton's Paradise Lost than "sit" for a photograph. You endure all the torments without any of the glory of the ancient martyrs. A photographic gallery is virtually a temple of horrors. In the apparently trifling ordeal of having your image transferred to paper there are many important phases. To begin with, you consider what you shall put on, and wherewithal you shall be clothed. If you have a pretty neck and handsome arms, of course you must wear one dress, and carry another to put on at your journey's end. Then you spend some time in deciding how to arrange your hair, so that two years hence, when the fashions change, your picture may not be ridiculous and outré. I know ever so many albums that are filled up with the most aggravating visions of women with water-falls on the backs of their necks. The best way is to have your hair flowing loose about your shoulders. This is a safe provision against the vicissitudes of style. If you haven't any hair, buy some, or wear a lace mantilla, Spanish fashion, over your head. This is not only convenient, but very becoming. I never have tried it, but think of doing so at no distant day. Then when you are ready, and your primping in the dressing-room has realized your fondest expectations, the climax of your martyrdom begins. First, will you sit or stand? You reflect. If you sit, half the effect of your dress will be lost, and your cousins in Europe will lose the impression of your lovely Parisienne panier. But if you stand, you can not rest your elbow on the arm of the handsome stuffed chair, which position of lazy elegance makes your own pretty arm so irresistible. You resolve to try both. You carefully arrange your over-skirt so as not to crush the pride of your heart, the triumph of a panier; then seat yourself, with your elbow resting in its most becoming attitude. The "artist" stands opposite, and looks at you quizzically. You have in your own mind determined upon a three-quarter view of your face. After having turned your head in every conceivable position, he tells you your profile is the best. This compliment, so unexpected, would overpower you were you not morally certain that it is as absurd as it is agreeable. However, you finally consent to "try." You banish the friend who accompanied you back to the dressing-room, and then look over your shoulder to see whether she is peeping through the curtained doorway. You now compress your lips and endeavor to steady yourself, after throwing as many curls as possible into the future "view." This being done, the artist lifts up the little black curtain of the "camera obscura," or whatever it is, and you become conscious of the horrible suspicion that he is looking at you upside down!

He now tells you your lips are too much compressed. Can't you smile? Certainly. You even laugh; in fact, you can not help laughing. It is so absurd, your sitting still, smiling at a white curtain, and resting your eyes on the suspended red tassel the artist designates. At last your mouth is fixed. Then your eyelids become rebellious. They won't keep still. The artist considerately tells you that this is not a matter of much consequence. In a "profile" picture it is perhaps true, you dismally reflect. Then he comes over, and very gently and unselfishly adjusts and rearranges your flowing curls in a way that would make your sweetheart awfully jealous, and send your big brother after him with a six-shooter.

But artists, like street-car conductors, are privileged characters. If the former touches your curls, or the latter puts an arm around you, it is as a painful duty which the business profession in both cases necessitates. In fact, it is unavoidable.

A few moments of awful suspense, during which time it seems ages to you; you dare not, on peril of your life, move your smallest muscle. Then the artist suddenly slips something under cover of a black cloth, and rushes into the next room. You are morally certain that your second self is being soused into water, alcohol, or some liquid in waiting, but you do not remonstrate. You are too glad to breathe again. When he returns and triumphantly displays the "negative," your discriminating eyes announce the dread discovery that your hands have assumed about double their natural proportions, and your dress skirt was not gracefully arranged. Why didn't he put a mirror opposite. You grow desperate. Must you "sit" again? You see a possible relief. You will take a vignette. You tell him in copying not to print below the shoulders. You are bitterly disappointed; but in photographs, as in ready-made dresses, who was ever suited exactly? You have many sympathizers. You are content.

The pictures are printed and sent home. The trouble is not ended—far from it; in fact, you may say it has just begun. You have dozens and dozens of friends, cousins, brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, etc., to say nothing of tenderer relations, to whom you have promised your photograph "as soon as you have some taken." You sit down and consider. The pictures are much better than you expected. They always look better on paper than in the horrid "negative" state. A careless observer would say the whole dozen are exactly alike. Your loving scrutiny, which practice has made perfect, detects many shades of difference. In one the curls look richer, the nose prettier. In another the eyes have a far-away look. In a third there is the most bewitching expression about the mouth. The prettiest of all must, of course, go to your brother. You still love him "better than any thing on earth." This decided, you dispose of the others according to precedence of promise, or as your heart inclines. So, sending back new orders for additional dozens or half dozens, according to demand, you go forth into the world either as a shining light among the hordes of ugly women in your friends' "collections," or snugly nestled among greenbacks in the pocket-books of young gentlemen. Sometimes you smile up benignly from a paper-weight, or count the passing moments from the back of a watch.

Thank Heaven, nobody ever saw me in such a place as any of the above! It is bad enough to be in an album, fingered by the children of your many friends, and thrown about promiscuously. I hate the idea of a photograph album. I always beg to be put in a dressing-case, a trunk tray, a bandbox—any thing but an album. I prefer the family Bible, because in that safe retreat I know I will not be troubled very often. I am very particular about giving away my photograph. I never do if I can get out of it. Only think, it is the nearest possible thing to giving away myself! I often promise it, just for the sake of peace. It is one promise I never keep. Most of my picture-seekers are young men. But I have brothers, so I am on the "look-out." I know how young men pride themselves upon their assortment of female faces. I sometimes experiment. When a young Lothario exhibits the picture of some stylish young lady, leaning poetically against an ivy-grown rock, or steadying herself against the back of a chair, I flash into his eyes one of my most insinuating glances, and ask, in meaning tone, "Another one of your victims?" He smiles consciously, even remorsefully (much as I have delighted him), and answers, not without stammering, "Now, really—of course not. She is a young lady friend of mine." His looks say, "Poor little thing! I suppose she can't help it; I'm sorry." Now I don't mean to censure young men. They are real nice, I think. If they are not angels, it is your fault as much as theirs. When you have wings, so will they. No, I believe in young men. I will trust them with any thing except a lock of hair or a photograph. Then I am suspicious, for, I repeat, I have brothers. Take my advice, girls, and don't give the boys your photographs.

IN SUN AND SHADE.

We walked together on the sand:
The lazy tide was fretting;
The wind blew sweetly from the land;
The summer sun was setting.

Lonely and long the white beach lay
Beneath the sunset's flushing;
The breakers, near and far away,
All their white tumult hushing.

A cruel wreck upon the shore
Spoke of the storm's wild doing:
We dreamed no tempest evermore
Could blight our summer's wooing.

One star was trembling into light,
In that wide heaven showing;
One thought within our hearts that night
Exceeding sweet was growing.

We walked, and spoke as lovers will,
In voices hushed and tender,
Of hopes the future should fulfill,
Of blessings Heaven would render!

I walk the lonesome beach to-day:
The tide is still returning;
The fishing boats at anchor stay;
The sunset fires are burning.

But tides may ebb and tides may flow,
And breakers flash and thunder;
Unheeding of them all I know
He sleeps their tumult under:

He sleeps—nor sin nor aching age
Shall chill his youth's endeavor:
The years of God his heritage
Forever and forever.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT.

IT seems strange, when one might with a slight effort render the rough way smoother in a degree, that there are those who utterly refuse to make the best of their difficulties, but rather make the most of them. It would almost appear as if they took a sort of pleasure in believing themselves the most injured of all created souls, a pre-eminence in suffering being preferable to mediocrity therein. They harp upon their favorite adversity with a pertinacity which, if applied in an effort toward cheerfulness, would insure them against an attack of the blues, and, by the subtle chemistry of affinities, would transform them into sunbeams, gilding the sphere in which they move. In truth, we have encountered people who were positively offended if it were suggested that another had passed through a more fiery ordeal than they. Whether, in their opinion, trouble invests one with a melancholy dignity, is an index of a mental strength that could survive such odds undiminished, or whether so much discomfiture in this vale of tears is an insurance securing a balance of happiness in the next world—whether, like MOHAMMED, satisfied that they can enjoy but one heaven, they are determined that it shall not be a heaven on earth—we are not prepared to decide. But certain it is that there are not a few who are jealous of their prerogatives in this respect, and would fain be called the unhappiest men or women that the rain rains upon or the frost nips. To some of these people a nightmare is equivalent to another's brain-fever; they possess the most wonderful facility for transforming a mole-hill into a mountain—a facility almost amounting to genius. Instead of accepting the first gray hairs as a matter of course, and wisely reasoning that gray hairs, when they become prominent, will more agreeably harmonize with the complexion of advancing years, they are so appalled that unseasonably every particular hair hastens to follow suit; the first crow's-foot so excites their apprehensions that it straightway invites a companion. They are totally unlike the man in the anecdote, who was so glad to find that there was any weather at all when he awoke in the morning that it never occurred to him to complain of the kind. If a caller catches them with an odor of cookery clinging to their garments; if they are forgotten in an invitation, or remembered where they would prefer forgetfulness; if Mrs. Chitchat is present when the grocer calls with his bill, when the plumber declines to do that little job unless he is paid for the last; if Mr. Bachelor drops in to have "that game of whist" the very night when the gas has been shut off (why can't some one invent a method of bottling up enough sunshine in the daytime to use at night? or is this, in effect, what the gas company are doing—bottling up the sunshine of vanished days thousands of years old, and dealing it out to us at so much per foot?)—if Cousin Simple reveals the fact that the piano was taken for a bad debt, and not such a very bad one, after all, one might think; that the cream jug is plated; that the carpet can't be shaken this season because it will not hold together; that they don't lay in the winter's coal, nor kindle a fire in the furnace till every body is blue; that the Parian vases were bought with old clothes; the salver has just come home from the pawnbroker's; and the lounging chair is second-hand—instead of grinning and bearing these disagreeables with a philosophic grace, they fight against them as if they were things in which opposition and grumbling could effect a miracle, when already they are foregone conclusions.

"What can wringing of the hands do, that which is ordained to alter?"

Though you fret your soul away, will Mrs. Chitchat the sooner forget the grocer and his bill or the saucy plumber, or forbear to repeat the story to her next listener? The more reason for fretting, you may think. Exactly, if fretting could affect her memory or annul the facts—in short, if it could do any thing but harm. Perhaps we imagine we are put here to find fault when things seem to go wrong; to shape affairs after our own models, and interfere with events, and dictate to fate. But when the trouble is not vital, why not accept it without a wry face, as a physic for our vanity or pride—a wholesome mortification of the flesh; why not make the best of it? And if it seems to admit of no degree of improvement, why not let it alone, put it out of sight, hide it behind the remembrance of our blessings? What object is attained by lying awake nights and making the days wretched because the mortgage is falling due; because Bridget will tell her next mistress fibs; because you or your books have been criticised; because your sermon is voted heretical? If the mortgage could be paid off by sleepless nights, it might be worth while to think about it—even then it would be a bad bargain; but as things stand, the only result is that you have the wretchedness and the mortgage too. It sometimes seems that if our hearts and heads were not so deeply concerned with trifles, if we did not so much mind what others thought of us, provided our own approval was secure, if Mrs. Grundy was not such a tyrant, nor we so hopelessly smitten with her, we should lead lives of more tranquillity and happiness, we should cease to agitate ourselves about affairs that have already passed beyond our control, we should learn to enjoy the sunshine of to-day, untarnished by yesterday's shower or the threatening possibilities of to-morrow.

DOING OUR OWN WORK.

THERE are many self-complacent folk who take credit for doing what they are pleased to term their own work, but who in fact are only interfering with the functions of other people. There is, undoubtedly, work in this world for all its inhabitants, male and female, and no one with the necessary capacity can claim exemption from the performance of his or her share of it. It is, however, essential to recognize the varieties of labor, and to consider the suitableness of each laborer for his vocation.

With the present organization of society it is impossible, however desirable it might seem, always to adapt the work to the essential character of the worker. There are the accidents of wealth and social position, which constantly interpose to disturb the harmonious arrangements of nature, and the cynic does not fail to remark with scorn the jangling irregularities which ensue. The low are undoubtedly often in high and the high in low places. Parlor and kitchen might occasionally exchange occupants, certainly without lowering the dignity of the former, though the utility of the latter might be hazarded. We can not, however, calculate upon the sorting of man and womankind according to the rigid classification of nature. The world we have to deal with is more or less an artificial one, and the people in it must perform the duties of the positions in which they find themselves, though they may perchance be misplaced. The prosperous and needy, the master and man, the mistress and maid, have their separate functions, and can not confound them without loss to themselves and injury to others. They are, however, often confounded, but never without mischief. LOUIS XVI. was a fair lock-smith but a very poor king. Nature might have intended him for the one, but the accident of birth had made him the other. Kingcraft was evidently his duty, and not that of a smith; and if he had devoted himself as much to the reform of the state as he did to the mending of old locks, he might perhaps have kept his head upon his shoulders, and, better still, saved his people from much dire suffering. We have heard a "dame of quality" exulting in the fact that half of her day had been dabbled away in the soap-suds, and a well-provided spinster invoking praise for a month's work in shirt-making. Wretched washer and needle women were in the mean time begging in vain for a day's work and wages to keep the wolf of famine from the door, and save themselves and little ones from destruction.

Noblesse oblige, and wealth has its obligations too, and assuredly it is not one of these to take the bread out of the mouths of the famishing by doing other people's work on the self-complacent plea of doing our own. Women especially are apt to think that there is no kind of work but that with the hands, and that if they are not plying the needle, shaking the duster, and stirring the pot, they must be, forsooth, idlers. With, however, the opportunities that are given to the prosperous of cultivating their minds and tastes, there should come both a higher sense of duty and an increased power to perform it. With the noble purpose and assured capacity, women of means could find occupations befitting their social positions, and such as would be at least negatively beneficial, inasmuch as they would not interfere, by an ungenerous competition, with the labor of the needy.

We must not be understood, however, as deprecating a knowledge and share of the humbler duties of the household by our prosperous dames. So far, moreover, do the higher culture and aims in life for which we are contending render women not indifferent to or incapable of household duty that those who shine so brilliantly on the world with all the fire of genius brighten their homes no less with the radiance of domestic virtue. In fact, the capacity for the greater implies that for the less; and the woman of cultivated intelligence can take within her widened scope the lowly as well as the lofty. She, too, will have that sense of order which recognizes the particular duty of each, and that discreet reserve which studiously refrains from interfering with the special vocation of others.

We would have our prosperous women something more than dabblers in soap-suds, stickers of needles, and turners of the spit. The supervision, more or less, of such work as these imply must necessarily devolve upon the female heads of all households, however fortified by wealth, and they should diligently acquire the knowledge requisite for the performance of so essential a duty. They should never forget, however, to discriminate the distinctive shares of the labor, and apportion them accordingly. The work of the mistress should touch, in fact, at times that of the servant, but oftener rise above it; and if she fails to give it this elevation, she will be sure not only to degrade herself, but injure others. Some of the best-intentioned women are doing a great deal of mischief by thus thoughtlessly confusing the duties of life. There are many among the ranks of the wealthy who do nothing, but still not a few who do much, but unfortunately with no other than an ill effect, since they are doing other people's while they presume they are doing their own work.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

COSTUMES.

EACH year finds dark costumes more in favor at the summer resorts. We have already spoken of the various ways in which velvet forms part of the promenade costume, and we now add that dark silks are also worn in the streets and drives. These silks are not necessarily heavy, but it is true that sombre shades of plum-color, blue-gray, réséda, leaf brown, grisaille, and blue-black have entirely superseded the medium light blue, gray, pearl, and green silks formerly worn at midsummer. Ladies in the extreme South should bear this in mind when preparing wardrobes for the sea-side and Northern watering-places. Costumes of plum or smoke colored silks, so dark that they are scarcely distinguishable from black, are made with two simple gathered flounces on the skirt, and a tight-fitting polonaise with plain edge or fringed, coat sleeves, and high ruff. With such a dress there should be a sash of the same, or else a unique belt of some kind, either of Russia leather with silver joints, clasps, and châtelaine, or a velvet belt fastened behind by a pearl or antique silver buckle, or else a canvas belt with binding of blue or red Russia. If all black is preferred, glossy taffeta silk is selected, or else summer gros grain woven in small reps, with high lustre. This is also made simply with a tight polonaise and deep kilt pleating on the skirt, or else a jockey basque and shawl-shaped upper skirt plainly piped, or perhaps edged with jet fringe. The kilt pleating in the skirt is nearly a yard deep, and is held in clusters—three pleats in each group, and a space between. More elaborate black costumes have the whole polonaise made up of lengthwise bands of silk two or three inches wide, and yak or guipure insertion of half this width set in between the silk bands. Another very elegant black silk costume to be worn at Saratoga has white duchesse point insertion and lace on the polonaise, and as trimming for the Spanish flounce on the skirt.

There is a fancy also for black and white checked silks this summer. A French caprice shown among late importations is that of using checks of three or four sizes—from pin-heads to half-inch blocks—in a single dress. Simple and tasteful afternoon suits are made of pin-head checks alone; the skirt has two clusters of three narrow lapping gathered flounces, piped with black, and each cluster headed by a puff; the apron over-skirt is edged by a puff and ruffle, and the basque is a jockey piped with black, and finished with a ruff and cuffs.

BREAKFAST DRESSES.

White suits are not universally worn, as they formerly were, but are still preferred to all others for summer breakfast dresses. Fine, soft, yellow-white French nansook is now chosen for these instead of the heavy piqués and stiff blue-white Victoria lawns of last year. The design is invariably a belted polonaise and skirt. For trimming, the front breadth is formed of length-wise clusters of narrow tucks, with a row of Hamburg or needle-work insertion between each cluster; two gathered flounces, with a row of tucks and insertion above a hem, surround the skirt; the coat sleeves are made of tucks and bands of insertion. Cross-barred nansook is used for plainer suits. Two kilt-pleated flounces of plain nansook trim the skirt, and a narrower kilt pleating edges the polonaise.

DINNER DRESSES.

Light silks and Chambéry gauzes abundantly trimmed with lace are reserved for dinner dresses. A mastic gray silk half covered with Valenciennes insertion and lace has just been sent to Newport. The skirt has three gathered scant flounces each three-sixteenths of a yard deep, and the middle flounce is entirely covered by a flounce of Valenciennes; the shawl over-skirt, with pointed apron front shaped by a seam down the middle, on which bows are placed, has many rows of Valenciennes insertion placed length-wise on each breadth, and a lace flounce on the edge; the basque is merely piped on the edge to show its graceful outline, but it is also striped downward with insertion, and similar trimming extends the whole length of the coat sleeves. Very narrow lace edging is placed each side of the insertion bands; two deep frills of lace, with an inner pleating of crêpe lisse, surround the neck and wrists.

One of the most perfect dresses of the summer—a dinner dress for a distinguished-looking blonde—is of pale mauve silk and deepest violet Chambéry gauze. The mauve skirt has two violet gauze flounces across the front breadths, each flounce with mauve piping in the hem and a puffed heading, while between these is a flounce of finest Valenciennes; the back breadths are trimmed to the waist with five straight flounces edged with the puffed ruffles just described. The over-skirt, open in front, falling in a deep point on each side, and rounding short behind, is edged with puffing and a flounce of lace. The basque is of mauve silk, covered plainly with the dark gauze except in front, where a Pompadour square-necked vest of the silk is shown, with its outline finished by ruffles of Valenciennes. The sleeves are plain to the elbow with full flowing lace below, and high frills are in the square neck. A third tasteful costume is a skirt of blue-gray silk, worn with a white striped grenadine polonaise edged with crimped fringe. This skirt is also worn with a polonaise of black Spanish sprigged net trimmed with Spanish lace, a high lace fraise, lace jabots down front and back, gray silk bows fastening the skirt in front, and an elaborate sash of gray silk.

Light airy puffs and ruffles of grenadine or gauze should not be gathered on cords, as this gives a clumsy look. For these wiry trimmings French modistes use effectively a sort of gauging made by putting two rows of gathers quite close together. For instance, the bias puff with narrow ruffle on each side, so much used for trimming grenadine polonaises, should be cut six inches wide; the edge need not be hemmed, but merely turned down the width of the tiny ruffle, thus making it double, and gathered by two rows of small stitches set scarcely a seam's width apart, and this will leave a pretty puff between.

DARK BLUE LINEN.

Dark blue linen grows in favor, and can now be purchased for 50 cents a yard. These blue suits are most stylish when made without any white except the large pearl buttons that are placed down the front of the polonaise. The skirt has a kilt-pleated flounce about three-fourths of a yard deep, and the long belted polonaise has merely a hem, with revers, collar, cuffs, and pocket. A morocco belt and bag usually take the place of a sash with linen suits.

A WIDOW'S DRESS.

The dresses worn by widows appear at the first glance to be made entirely of English crape, but upon inspection prove to be bombazine covered with crape. Their design is a basque and single skirt without ruffles or folds. A bombazine skirt of ordinary shape is first made; above this there is sewed around the hips a crape skirt made of widths cut precisely like those of the bombazine, a finger-deep hem around the edge, and hanging separately from the bombazine, though naturally falling into the same folds. The basque is long enough to conceal that part of the bombazine not covered with crape. This basque is of heavy English crape, placed smoothly on a thick silk lining. It is of simple shape, with coat sleeves, a piping of crape around the bottom, and a revers collar of doubled crape extending down the front. Around the neck and wrists is a side pleating of black crêpe lisse, with an inner pleating of white lisse. Small button-moulds covered with crape fasten the basque.

WIDOWS' CAPS.

White crêpe lisse and more deeply crinkled crape are used for the caps which form part of a widow's dress in the house. Widows' caps imported from London are preferred here, as, indeed, are all English mourning goods and customs, instead of the fanciful French mourning. These lisse caps are bands, pointed toward the forehead, edged with a small crimped puff, passed back under the coil of hair, and finished with wide hanging ends behind. Simpler caps for morning are Marie Stuart squares of tarlatan or of softest lawn, with folded hem placed on the top of the head, and secured by black ribbon strings, or else by a narrow fillet ribbon passed around the head over the middle of the cap. Old ladies wear the large crowned Martha Washington cap, trimmed with milliners' folds and tiny pleated ruffles.

SILVER AND GOLD.

A mixture of oxidized silver with gold is the latest novelty in jewelry. Necklaces, lockets, crosses, châtelaines, and ball ear-rings are shown in this new combination. The necklaces have long bars joined by links, and prettily engraved. With a pendent locket such necklaces cost $50. There is a fancy for antique-looking chasing on silver and gold jewelry. Slight vines and delicate etching of slender fern leaves, lily bells on long nodding stems, and many flowers of which the merest outline is traced, are the favorites for ornamentation. Heavy chains of pure oxidized silver are sold for neck and fan chains for light mourning and for traveling: price $32. The fashionable gold ball ear-rings, bullet size, and quaintly chased, cost $10. Oxidized silver ball ear-rings and silvered châtelaines are much worn with black dresses, both for mourning and by ladies who wear colors.

A NOTABLE BOOK.

ONE of the choicest records extant of a fervent Christian life is that of the Rev. ALFRED COOKMAN, by HENRY B. RIDGAWAY, D.D., with an introduction by Rev. R. S. FOSTER, LL.D., Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which has just been published by HARPER & BROTHERS. Mr. COOKMAN was the son of the Rev. GEORGE COOKMAN, who came to this country from England in his youth, united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, rose rapidly to leadership in its chief departments, became chaplain to Congress, and was finally lost on the President when on his way to England to bear the salutations of his Church to the British Wesleyan Conference. ALFRED inherited his father's mantle. He was a preacher in his youth, and exhibited that remarkable fervor, spirituality, and gentleness at the beginning which developed in exquisite beauty and harmony. Dr. RIDGAWAY has given us the man and his work in a volume that is in every respect a model of biography. The scope is broad, the figures are sketched with a master-hand, the tone is elevated, and while there is just appreciation there is likewise an absence of all undue adulation. We regard the work an important contribution to our store of religious biography.

PERSONAL.

A LADY, writing from London about JOAQUIN MILLER, says she has lodgings in the same house with him, and is much pleased with his daily labor and way of life. He is very sympathetic with other people's miseries, and no one who comes to him with a tale of sorrow goes from him unrelieved. He denies himself every thing but the mere necessaries of life, bestowing the rest in charity. He is the frequent guest of the nobility, every day bringing invitations for dinners, parties, etc.; but he says that fashionable society is like the Sierras—the higher the colder: impossible to receive from it a single idea. The men meet him with, "Aw, MILLAW, glad to see you. Saw your book; very nice, by Jove! Seen So-and-so's book? No? Beastly trash! Take a run up and see. Ta-ta!" and so on.

—Miss MARIE PORTER, who toiled eighteen hours daily learning high art on skates, and had the honor to slide about on ice with NAPOLEON III., has received her reward by skating into the affections of a Prussian nobleman old enough to be her grandpa.

—Mr. KEASBURY, a missionary at Singapore, is the son of an Indian colonel. For thirty years he has been unconnected with any society, and lives on his own resources. He is the best Malay scholar in the island, and has translated the Bible and other books into that language. His congregation numbers about two hundred, of whom fifty are communicants. He is greatly venerated by the people and by the officials.

—Miss KELLOGG is to warble in English opera this fall, having signed contract to that effect with Mr. HESS, formerly manager of the PAREPA troupe. Mesdames MOULTON and VAN ZANDT are to be of the company.

—Mr. J. A. JACKSON, Boston man, who has been in Italy seven years, "learning the trade" of a sculptor, has returned home to superintend the erection of the soldiers' monument at Lynn.

—Mr. WHITEHURST, in his clever book on the Court and Social Life under Napoleon III., tells this: "Where I was last night we certainly had the 'latest new thing' in dress. At the minister's whose lot it was to entertain us I saw the old empire represented—the old empire, too, carried to the extreme—by a lady whose name I will not mention, but who carries 'fashion,' that mystic symbol, with her. Her head was like a golden glory, no waist to speak of, and, as for crinoline, not a hoop, not a hair, not a spare petticoat. Her clothes clung to her like—what shall I say? Well, like a tight fit. She was very pretty, and would, indeed, have been beautiful quand même; but the transition was sensational. 'We have found at last,' said an old diplomatist, 'the empire pure and simple.' 'But restricted,' added another. There was another dress 'passing show.' A white garment, made of some extraordinarily light combination, girded as to the waist with geranium and black velvet, which fell in short festoons, and was fastened behind by a diamond horseshoe; on the shoulder a diamond bird-of-paradise, around the head a glorious halo of health and youth, and one ornament—which was not excessive here—a great bird-of-paradise, which must have flown from a land of diamonds."

—PETER HINTZ, cigar manufacturer in Hamburg, has done a sweet thing in tobacco, and presented it to Emperor WILLIAM, viz., a model of the Summer Palace of Babelsberg, near Potsdam, made entirely of tobacco, eight feet long and broad, and five feet high. But WILLIAM Emperor abhors tobacco.

—"Mr. Shaw, of Persia," gives gifts with Oriental loftiness and liberality. To the imperial servants at Potsd—m and Berlin he gave $4000 cash, besides abundance of gold watches, shawls, brooches, and such. The Emperor got a costly gold snuff-box set with diamonds, which isn't of much account now, as snuffing has gone out; but he can swap it off for something else. The Empress received a necklace of rich brilliants, while the little great men of the court were given grand crosses of the order of the Sun and Lion. This will enable them to enjoy their little strut with greater self-complacency, and at the same time enable them to turn up their nostrils at beings who have not the Sun and Lion.

—How is this for a custom? When a lady is presented to "Mr. Shaw, of Persia," he first looks on the ground at her feet, then at his own feet, generally on one side and rather over his shoulder, then again at hers, and at last gradually raises his eyes to her face, when he assures her in French that he is extremely happy to have made her acquaintance. It is then the turn of the next lady, and the ceremony is repeated in the same manner; but conversation there is none. One of the gentlemen of the court, who had watched the Shah very closely, explained this peculiarity of manner as arising from his never having been accustomed to see ladies unveiled in society, and thus feeling shy and somewhat shocked. We take this from the record in the London Court Journal, and in doing so make a bow.

—Mrs. COWDEN CLARKE has done the prettiest act of her life, if not the best. Who would suppose that the industrious compiler of the Concordance to Shakspeare should have commenced to write love stories? Yet she has done just that, and the pretty thing is the dedication: "To the Lover-Husband of eighty-five these love stories are dedicated by the Lover-Wife of sixty-seven."

—DAVID FIDLER, of Utica, Illinois, having approached his rifle from the wrong direction, was killed; hence it is suggested that he met his death by "violin"-ce. At all events, "no pent-up Utica" now "contracts his powers," for the whole boundless six feet of continent is his very own.

—Captain TYSON, who was one of the party rescued from the ice raft, after having left the Polaris, is again afloat on the Tigress, having been appointed "ice master" of that ship. Captain TYSON bears upon his face the impress of courage, fortitude, and perseverance, and is of that supple, wiry frame that goes through perils when perils confront. Our readers will at some future period, not far distant we trust, peruse the record of this last expedition, so promptly taken under orders of the Navy Department.

—Have heard a good many things of WORTH—the WORTH, of Paris. This one, though said to have been first listened to when "puffs" came in, comes to us now in this new dress. The "puff" is said to have routed sleep from the couch of oft-recorded WORTH, who labored day and night at its invention. When this truly great man is composing he reclines on a sofa, and one of the young ladies of the establishment plays VERDI to him; he composes chiefly in the evening, and says that the rays of the setting sun gild his conceptions. Like every great genius, he is very modest, and thinks "the very weakest tea" of himself. Last week he told the Duchess de —— that he could give her a dress, but he could not supply style!

—Famous folk have strange appeals made to them. Mrs. SIGOURNEY was a victim to innumerable "requests," and for a time kept a record of quotations from them. The following are specimens: "A funeral hymn for a minister when he should die, he now being well and preaching as usual." "The owner of a canary-bird, which had accidentally been starved to death, wishes some elegiac verses." "To punctuate a manuscript volume of three hundred pages, the author having always had a dislike to the business of punctuation, finding that it brings on a 'pain in the back of the neck.'" "To prepare the memoir of a colored preacher, of whose character and existence I was ignorant." "Desired to assist a servant-man, not very well able to read, in learning the Sunday-school lessons, and to 'write out all the answers for him, clear through the book, to save his time.'" "A monody for the loss of a second wife, fortified by the argument that I had composed one at the death of the first."

—Notwithstanding JOHN STUART MILL'S literary eminence and success as an author, he did not accumulate much property. His estate "sugared off," as they say in Vermont, at about fifty thousand dollars, all of which is inherited by his step-daughter, Miss HELEN TAYLOR. He was a very practical man in the matter of wills, having executed no less than three, providing for three possibilities—first, of Miss TAYLOR dying before he did; second, of their both dying at the same time, in a railway accident or other casualty; and third, in the event of his dying first.

—Queen VICTORIA is becoming a very wealthy woman. Besides her allowance from the national purse of $1,925,000 per annum, $300,000 of which is for her personal expenses, she has $200,000 per annum from the Duchy of Lancaster. The court expenses have been greatly reduced since the death of her husband, as entertaining on a grand scale has nearly ceased with the Queen. But one of her chief sources of private revenue is the following: On the 30th of August, 1852, there died a gentleman, aged seventy-two, of the name of JOHN CAMDEN NEILD. He was son of a JAMES NEILD, who acquired a large fortune as a gold and silver smith. He received every advantage in the way of education, graduated M.A. at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was subsequently called to the bar. He proved, however, the very reverse of his benevolent father. He was a miser born, and hid all his talents in a napkin, making no use of his wealth beyond allowing it to accumulate. From the date of the death of his father, who left him £250,000, besides real estate, he had spent but a small portion of his income, and allowed himself scarcely the necessaries of life. He usually dressed in a blue coat with metal buttons. This he did not allow to be brushed, inasmuch as that process would have worn the nap. He was never known to wear an overcoat. He gladly accepted invitations from his tenantry, and would remain on long visits, because he thus saved board. A few days before his death he told one of his executors that he had made a most singular will, but that he had a right to do what he liked with his own. When the document was opened it was found that, with the exception of a few small legacies, he had left all "to her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen VICTORIA," begging her Majesty's acceptance of the same for the sole use of herself and her heirs. This property is now worth $5,000,000. The total of the Queen's private income is now probably not less than $1,000,000 per annum; but the public will never know the amount, as the wills of kings and queens are never proved, as are the wills of ordinary mortals.

—REUTER, now Baron REUTER, is one of the mysteries as well as one of the great successes of the day. He is a small Hebrew, about fifty-eight, but no one knows any thing of his early history. Some fourteen years ago he haunted newspaper offices. His sole object was to benefit the press. "No, I assure you, upon my vort of honor"—here the hand on the breast, and a low bow—"zat I greatly admire ze London press. It is ze vun great press of ze vorlt. I vant you to zee my leetle telegrams, and use zem as you like. I vant no money. Just put my name. Just zay ze dispatch comes from Mr. REUTER. I sall be entirely zatesfied." The persuasive notes were listened to. They produced their effect. Telegraphing was expensive, and newspaper profits were small. The dispatches were used for probably a month. Then another visit. The post was in, and the shrewd little man was safe. "Were ze leetle dispatches of gute? Zey were! I am delighted. I care for nutting but to please ze press." Should he continue them? He should be happy, and in the mean time it was a waste of good money for the —— or —— to be paying for dispatches from their own correspondents. Why throw money so away? So the special telegrams were stopped. Another month, and this time there is more of confidence in the eye of the little man. He knows his strength. Will the proprietors of the —— like to make an arrangement for one year? They see what his dispatches are worth. They must see what a saving was made. The other papers were all accepting an annual engagement, etc. Ultimately the engagement was made. Then the country papers came into it—not merely the daily papers, but also the weekly papers, who concluded with him for one day's dispatches. The whole press in a short space of time became, as far as its foreign news is concerned, Reuterized. The terms of his full subscription have been raised from £600 to £1200 yearly. Private subscribers, exchanges, town-halls, statesmen, foreign ministers, and a host now subscribe to REUTER. He has coined money. REUTER'S dispatches constitute an accomplished fact. Their originator is now a baron. He is married to a lady of some beauty. He has the best opera-box; his horses are the wonder of the row; he has a town-house, a sea-side house, and a country-house. His manner is that of a bland despot. He smiles with a sort of patronizing smile, as though he were keeping his greatness back.

—Such a droll is that Persian monarch! At St. Petersburg the Princess DAGMAR having said to him, by way of civility, that his diamonds were exceedingly beautiful, he patted her on the shoulder, and with abrupt gallantry replied, "Not nearly so beautiful as your neck."

—Mr. JOHN HOUGHTALING, of Rochester, deserves the good-conduct medal for being the good conductor and oldest railroad conductor in the United States. His ways have always been railways of peace and pleasantness. For thirty-three years consecutively he has been rolling between Rochester and places contiguous, and never been seriously collided with nor smashed. His travels have in length equaled about forty times the circumference of the earth, and he still goes on his railway rejoicing.

—The GLADSTONE family is a pleasant and large one. The eldest son is in Parliament, but has made no notable reputation. It is said that, with the exception of one of the younger sons, none of the family are remarkable for talent. Mrs. GLADSTONE is a person of great kindness of heart and untiring benevolence. She is full of schemes for doing good: hospitals, convalescent institutions, etc., find in her an ever-ready friend, to the neglect, it is whispered, of her domestic duties. There is an amusing story told of how some time ago a few guests arrived at her house in response to an invitation to dinner. They waited in vain for the rest of the party, for whose delay their hostess was at a loss to account. At length she turned aside and opened her blotting-book, which quickly revealed the cause of the guests' non-appearance—the invitations were lying there. They had been written but never sent.

—Mr. HERBERT SPENCER writes in the London Examiner several pleasant things of the late JOHN STUART MILL, illustrating the practical generosity of the man. "Some seven years ago," writes Mr. SPENCER, "after bearing as long as was possible the continued losses entailed on me by the publication of the System of Philosophy, I notified to the subscribers that I should be obliged to cease at the close of the volume then in progress. Shortly after the issue of this announcement I received from Mr. MILL a letter, in which, after expressions of regret, and after naming a plan which he wished to prosecute for reimbursing me, he went on to say: 'In the next place.... what I propose is that you should write the next of your treatises, and that I should guarantee the publisher against loss—i. e., should engage, after such length of time as may be agreed on, to make good any deficiency that may occur, not exceeding a given sum, that sum being such as the publisher may think sufficient to secure him.' Now, though these arrangements were of kinds that I could not bring myself to yield to, they none the less profoundly impressed me with Mr. MILL'S nobility of feeling, and his anxiety to further what he regarded as a beneficial end. Such proposals would have been remarkable even had there been entire agreement of opinion. But they were the more remarkable as being made by him under the consciousness that there existed between us certain fundamental differences, openly avowed."

A LITTLE ETYMOLOGY.

THERE are many words, indicating particular fabrics, which have so passed into familiar language that they no longer necessarily suggest any special significance, except as a trade-mark of quality. But the etymology of the subject is, nevertheless, interesting. Most persons giving a thought to the matter at all would instantly recognize the meaning of Mechlin, Alençon, Brussels, and Chantilly lace; why one shawl is called a Paisley and another a Cashmere; that Holland was originally manufactured by the Dutch; and that a Fez cap carries with it a local significance. The materials known in commerce as Circassian, Cyprus, Coburg, and Damask equally explain themselves; and, though in a totally different manner, such fashions as those of Wellington and Blücher boots, Mackintosh and Chesterfield coats, and Spencers. But why is a shirt front popularly called a dickey? Why are poplins so named? Why blanket, as the covering of a bed? Or silk, or shawl, or jerkin, or maud, or cravat? It is when we fall amidst these shadows of learning that the etymologists enjoy their Walpurgis dance of guesses. Thus with blanket. There are said to have been three brothers of that name at Worcester, who invented the coverlet so called, and, in confirmation, it is pointed out that, not far off from the antique city, is still a locality known as the Blanquets. On the other hand, Bristol claims them among her mediæval citizens, though, for all that, they may have been Worcestershire men as well. The coarse woolens of their fabricating appear to have been eagerly adopted by the peasantry as a substitute for hempen cloth; then soldiers, sportsmen, and travelers found them useful; next they were laid on the stump bedsteads of the time, and a blue blanket became a Masonic banner. This may confidently be reckoned among things not quite universally known.

As to poplin, it was invented in a papal territory, though by a Huguenot, and hence called papaline, which account we may as well credit, seeing that no other is at hand. Silk may be a Greek, a Persian, an Avalic, a Tartar, or a Chinese appellation, since the lexicographers and other eruditionists might be quoted in favor of each language; but concerning shawl there is only a single doubt, between a translation from a Persic word and the town of Shawl, in Beloochistan, whence it may possibly have been derived, and which was formerly famous for the manufacture. This must not be confounded with the celebrated shawl of Leybourne. A maud is a Scotch plaid, christened after a Scottish queen, daughter of Malcolm, and wife of Henry the First. Jer-kin may be from the Anglo-Saxon cyrtellien, which good authorities aver to be the diminutive of cyrtel, a coat, a presumption, at any rate, more rational than that which traces it to the vulgarism Little Jerry, which is also claimed for jacket. But now we reach a formidable mystery. Whence came the name cravat? Was it first worn by a Croat cavalier? Because that is almost the sole suggestion of the learned. Concerning collars, there used to be a sort worn in Germany which were nicknamed Vatermördern, or father-murderers, from the legend of a student who returned from the university with such a stiff pair that, on embracing his parent, they cut his throat. There are many testimonies to suicides—tight-lacing, to wit—caused by vanity in dress, but we think this is the only case of assassination on record. In the general glossary, cardinals, capuchins, and mantillas tell their own story, though the old-fashioned berthas do not, and the renowned chapeau de paille, which so harmonized with the beauty of the Churchills of the last century, would be equally explicit had it been a straw hat at all. There are many varieties of fabrics, besides those already mentioned, which indicate their own birth-places, as the mohair known as Angola or Angora wool, shorn from the full-fleeced goats that feed far in the depths of Asia Minor; the mixture of hair and silk called, in commerce, Bengal; the long-cloths labeled Madapollams; the favorite Merino; the soft weavings of Paramatta, in New South Wales; the yellow cottons of Nankin, corrupted into nankeen; and the tapestries of Bergamo. Less familiar, however, are the silks named Ardessines, after the district producing them in Persia; the lamb's-wool hats—now disused—which were once identified with the Norman town of Caudebec; the figured linen made in and designated after Dornoch, in Scotland; the thick-napped woolens called after Duffel, in Flanders; the cords of Genappe, in the same territory. When you hear of a cambric ruff you will naturally think of Cambray, in French Flanders; behold a gingham umbrella, and Guingamp, in France, rises at once to the mind's eye; and so on with the coarse stuffs called Osnaburgs (Hanoverian manufacture); with their opposite, the delicate open lace-work tulle, which forms a fleecy foundation for so many bonnets, and dresses so many "breathing roses" of the ball-room in raiment light as air.

A DREAM OF A DREAM.

O for a bed of buttercups, to rest
  Therein, and watch the summer swallows pass;
And see the meadow flowers I love the best
  Among the fairy forests of the grass;
    That I might seem,
      Without regret,
    In a fair dream
      Of Margaret:
To hold her white warm hand and read her smile,
And feel her kiss again beside the stile!

O for one hour underneath a hedge,
  With boughs of full-blown May-bloom overhead,
Clear water blowing bubbles in the sedge,
  And waving weeds above its pebble bed;
    To sink down deep,
      With sun above,
    And have, in sleep,
      This dream of love—
Of love that was, and may not be again;
Of dear heart-love before it grew to pain!

If the delusion old delight could bring,
  And let me hear the gentle maiden voice
Speak what was spoken once to me, and sing
  The song that made my soul wake to rejoice,
    Though after sleep
      Came aching truth
    To bid me weep
      In bitter ruth,
Yet would I walk again my shadowed way
Ten years, to dream the dream another day.

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

LADY ANNA RETURNS TO LONDON.

AFTER the Earl was gone, Lady Anna had but a bad time of it at Yoxham. She herself could not so far regain her composure as to live on as though no disruption had taken place. She knew that she was in disgrace, and the feeling was dreadful to her. The two ladies were civil, and tried to make the house pleasant, but they were not cordial as they had been hitherto. For one happy halcyon week—for a day or two before the Earl had come, and for those bright days during which he had been with them—she had found herself to be really admitted into the inner circle as one of the family. Mrs. Lovel had been altogether gracious with her. Minnie had been her darling little friend. Aunt Julia had been so far won as to be quite alive to the necessity of winning. The rector himself had never quite given way—had never been so sure of his footing as to feel himself safe in abandoning all power of receding; but the effect of this had been to put the rector himself, rather than his guest, into the background. The servants had believed in her, and even Mrs. Grimes had spoken in her praise, expressing an opinion that she was almost good enough for the young Earl. All Yoxham had known that the two young people were to be married, and all Yoxham had been satisfied. But now every thing was wrong. The Earl had fled, and all Yoxham knew that every thing was wrong. It was impossible that her position should be as it had been.

There were consultations behind her back as to what should be done, of which, though she heard no word of them, she was aware. She went out daily in the carriage with Mrs. Lovel, but Aunt Julia did not go with them. Aunt Julia on these occasions remained at home discussing the momentous affair with her brother. What should be done? There was a great dinner-party, specially convened to do honor to the Earl's return, and not among them a single guest who had not heard that there was to be a marriage. The guests came to see not only the Earl, but the Earl's bride. When they arrived the Earl had flown. Mrs. Lovel expressed her deep sorrow that business of great importance had made it necessary that the Earl should go to London. Lady Anna was of course introduced to the strangers; but it was evident to the merest tyro in such matters that she was not introduced as would have been a bride expectant. They had heard how charming she was, how all the Lovels had accepted her, how deeply was the Earl in love—and lo! she sat in the house silent and almost unregarded. Of course the story of the lawsuit, with such variations as rumor might give it, was known to them all. A twelvemonth ago—nay, at a period less remote than that—the two female claimants in Cumberland had always been spoken of in those parts as wretched, wicked, vulgar impostors. Then came the reaction. Lady Anna was the heiress, and Lady Anna was to be the Countess. It had flown about the country during the last ten days that there was no one like the Lady Anna. Now they came to see her, and another reaction had set in. She was the Lady Anna, they must suppose. All the Lovels, even the rector, so called her. Mrs. Lovel introduced her as Lady Anna Lovel, and the rector—hating himself as he did so—led her out to dinner, though there was a baronet's wife in the room—the wife of a baronet who dated back from James I. She was the Lady Anna, and therefore the heiress; but it was clear to them all that there was to be no marriage.

"Then poor Lord Lovel will absolutely not have enough to starve upon," said the baronet's wife to the baronet, as soon as the carriage door had been shut upon them.

What were they to do with her? The dinner-party had taken place on a Wednesday, the day after the Earl's departure; and on the Thursday Aunt Julia wrote to her nephew thus:

"YOXHAM RECTORY, September 3.

"MY DEAR FREDERIC,—My brother wishes me to write to you and say that we are all here very uneasy about Lady Anna. We have only heard from her that the match which was contemplated is not to take place. Whether that be so from unwillingness on her part or yours, we have never yet been told; but both to your aunt Jane and myself she speaks of it as though the decision were irrevocable. What had we better do? Of course it is our most anxious desire—as it is our pleasure and our duty—to arrange every thing according to your wishes and welfare. Nothing can be of so much importance to any of us in this world as your position in it. If it is your wish that Lady Anna should remain here, of course she shall remain. But if, in truth, there is no longer any prospect of a marriage, will not her longer sojourn beneath your uncle's roof be a trouble to all of us, and especially to her?

"Your aunt Jane thinks that it may be only a lovers' quarrel. For myself, I feel sure that you would not have left us as you did, had it not been more than that. I think that you owe it to your uncle to write to me, or to him, if you like it better, and to give us some clew to the state of things.

"I must not conceal from you the fact that my brother has never felt convinced, as you do, that Lady Anna's mother was, in truth, the Countess Lovel. At your request, and in compliance with the advice of the Solicitor-General, he has been willing to receive her here; and as she has been here, he has given her the rank which she claims. He took her out to dinner yesterday before Lady Fitzwarren, which will never be forgiven should it turn out ultimately that the first wife was alive when the Earl married Anna's mother. Of course, while here, she must be treated as Lady Anna Lovel; but my brother does not wish to be forced so to do, if it be intended that any further doubt should be raised. In such case he desires to be free to hold his former opinion; therefore, pray write to us, and tell us what you wish to have done. I can assure you that we are at present very uncomfortable.

"Believe me to be,
"My dear Frederic,
"Your most affectionate aunt,
"JULIA LOVEL."

The Earl received this before his interview with Sir William, but left it unanswered till after he had seen that gentleman. Then he wrote as follows:

"CARLTON CLUB, September 5, 183—.

"MY DEAR AUNT JULIA,—Will you tell my uncle that I think you had better get Lady Anna to stay at the rectory as long as possible. I'll let you know all about it very soon. Best love to Aunt Jane.

"I am, your affectionate nephew,
"LOVEL."

This very short epistle was most unsatisfactory to the rector, but it was felt by them all that nothing could be done. With such an injunction before them, they could not give the girl a hint that they wished her to go. What uncle or what aunt, with such a nephew as Lord Lovel, so noble and so poor, could turn out an heiress with twenty thousand a year, as long as there was the slightest chance of a marriage? Not a doubt would have rankled in their mind had they been quite sure that she was the heiress. But, as it was, the Earl ought to have said more than he did say.

"I can not keep myself from feeling, sometimes, that Frederic does take liberties with me," he said to his sister.

But he submitted. It was a part of the religion of the family—and no little part—that they should cling to their head and chief. What would the world have been to them, if they could not talk with comfortable ease and grace of their nephew Frederic?

During this time Anna spoke more than once to Mrs. Lovel as to her going.

"I have been a long time here," she said, "and I'm sure that I am in Mr. Lovel's way."

"Not in the least, my dear. If you are happy, pray stay with us."

This was before the arrival of the brief epistle, when they were waiting to know whether they were to dismiss their guest from Yoxham or to retain her.

"As for being happy, nobody can be happy, I think, till all this is settled. I will write to mamma, and tell her that I had better return to her. Mamma is all alone."

"I don't know that I can advise, my dear; but as far as we are concerned, we shall be very glad if you can stay."

The brief epistle had not then arrived, and they were, in truth, anxious that she should go; but one can not tell one's visitor to depart from one's house without a downright rupture. Now not even the rector himself dared to make such a rupture, without express sanction from the Earl.

Then Lady Anna, feeling that she must ask advice, wrote to her mother. The Countess had answered her last letter with great severity—that letter in which the daughter had declared that people ought not to be asked to marry for money. The Countess, whose whole life had made her stern and unbending, said very hard things to her child; had told her that she was ungrateful and disobedient, unmindful of her family, neglectful of her duty, and willing to sacrifice the prosperity and happiness of all belonging to her for some girlish feeling of mere romance. The Countess was sure that her daughter would never forgive herself in after-years if she now allowed to pass by this golden opportunity of remedying all the evil that her father had done.

"You are simply asked to do that which every well-bred girl in England would be delighted to do," wrote the Countess.

"Ah! she does not know," said Lady Anna.

But there had come upon her now a fear heavier and more awful than that which she entertained for her mother. Earl Lovel knew her secret, and Earl Lovel was to tell it to the Solicitor-General. She hardly doubted that it might as well be told to all the judges on the bench at once. Would it not be better that she should be married to Daniel Thwaite out of hand, and so be freed from the burden of any secret? The young lord had been thoroughly ashamed of her when she told it. Those aunts at Yoxham would hardly speak to her if they knew it. That lady before whom she had been made to walk out to dinner would disdain to sit in the same room with her if she knew it. It must be known—must be known to them all. But she need not remain there, beneath their eyes, while they learned it. Her mother must know it, and it would be better that she should tell her mother. She would tell her mother, and request that she might have permission to return at once to the lodgings in Wyndham Street. So she wrote the following letter, in which, as the reader will perceive, she could not even yet bring herself to tell her secret.

"YOXHAM RECTORY, Monday.

"MY DEAR MAMMA,—I want you to let me come home, because I think I have been here long enough. Lord Lovel has gone away, and though you are so very angry, it is better I should tell you that we are not any longer friends. Dear, dear, dearest mamma, I am so very unhappy that you should not be pleased with me. I would die to-morrow if I could make you happy. But it is all over now, and he would not do it even if I could say that it should be so. He has gone away, and is in London, and would tell you so himself if you would ask him. He despises me, as I always knew he would—and so he has gone away. I don't think any thing of myself, because I knew it must be so; but I am so very unhappy because you will be unhappy.

"I don't think they want to have me here any longer, and of course there is no reason why they should. They were very nice to me before all this happened, and they never say any thing ill-natured to me now. But it is very different, and there can not be any good in remaining. You are all alone, and I think you would be glad to see your poor Anna, even though you are so angry with her. Pray let me come home. I could start very well on Friday, and I think I will do so, unless I hear from you to the contrary. I can take my place by the coach, and go away at twelve o'clock from York, and be at that place in London on Saturday at eleven. I must take my place on Thursday. I have plenty of money, as I have not spent any since I have been here. Of course Sarah will come with me. She is not nearly so nice since she knew that Lord Lovel was to go away.

"Dear mamma, I do love you so much.
"Your most affectionate daughter,
"ANNA."

It was not willfully that the poor girl gave her mother no opportunity of answering her before she had taken her place by the coach. On Thursday morning the place had to be taken, and on Thursday evening she got her mother's letter. By the same post came the Earl's letter to his aunt, desiring that Lady Anna might, if possible, be kept at Yoxham. The places were taken, and it was impossible. "I don't see why you should go," said Aunt Julia, who clearly perceived that her nephew had been instigated to pursue the marriage scheme since he had been in town. Lady Anna urged that the money had been paid for two places by the coach. "My brother could arrange that, I do not doubt," said Aunt Julia. But the Countess now expected her daughter, and Lady Anna stuck to her resolve. Her mother's letter had not been propitious to the movement. If the places were taken, of course she must come. So said the Countess. It was not simply that the money should not be lost, but that the people at Yoxham must not be allowed to think that her daughter was overanxious to stay. "Does your mamma want to have you back?" asked Aunt Julia. Lady Anna would not say that her mother wanted her back, but simply pleaded again that the places had been taken.

When the morning came for her departure, the carriage was ordered to take her into York, and the question arose as to who should go with her. It was incumbent on the rector, who held an honorary stall in the cathedral, to be with the dean and his brother prebendaries on that day, and the use of his own carriage would be convenient to him.

"I think I'll have the gig," said the rector.

"My dear Charles," pleaded his sister, "surely that will be foolish. She can't hurt you."

"I don't know that," said the rector; "I think she has hurt me very much already. I shouldn't know how to talk to her."

"You may be sure that Frederic means to go on with it," said Mrs. Lovel.

"It would have been better for Frederic if he had never seen her," said the rector; "and I'm sure it would have been better for me."

But he consented at last, and he himself handed Lady Anna into the carriage. Mrs. Lovel accompanied them, but Aunt Julia made her farewells in the rectory drawing-room. She managed to get the girl to herself for a moment or two, and thus she spoke to her: "I need not tell you that, for yourself, my dear, I like you very much."

"Oh, thank you, Miss Lovel."

"I have heartily wished that you might be our Frederic's wife."

"It can never be," said Lady Anna.

"I won't give up all hope. I don't pretend to understand what there is amiss between you and Frederic, but I won't give it up. If it is to be so, I hope that you and I may be loving friends till I die. Give me a kiss, my dear." Lady Anna, whose eyes were suffused with tears, threw herself into the arms of the elder lady and embraced her.

Mrs. Lovel also kissed her and bade God bless her as she parted from her at the coach door; but the rector was less demonstrative. "I hope you will have a pleasant journey," he said, taking off his clerical hat.

"Let it go as it may," said Mrs. Lovel, as she walked into the close with her husband, "you may take my word, she's a good girl."

"I'm afraid she's sly," said the rector.

"She's no more sly than I am," said Mrs. Lovel, who was by no means sly.

CHAPTER XX.

LADY ANNA'S RECEPTION.

THE Countess went into the City to meet her daughter at the Saracen's Head, whither the York coach used to run, and received her almost in silence. "Oh, mamma, dear mamma," said Lady Anna, "I am so glad to be back with you again!" Sarah, the lady's-maid, was there, useless, officious, and long-eared. The Countess said almost nothing; she submitted to be kissed, and she asked after the luggage. At that time she had heard the whole story about Daniel Thwaite.

The Solicitor-General had disregarded altogether his client's injunctions as to secrecy. He had felt that in a matter of so great importance it behooved him to look to his client's interests rather than his client's instructions. This promise of a marriage with the tailor's son must be annihilated. On behalf of the whole Lovel family it was his duty, as he thought, to see that this should be effected, if possible, and as quickly as possible. This was his duty, not only as a lawyer employed in a particular case, but as a man who would be bound to prevent any great evil which he saw looming in the future. In his view of the case the marriage of Lady Anna Lovel, with a colossal fortune, to Daniel Thwaite the tailor, would be a grievous injury to the social world of his country, and it was one of those evils which may probably be intercepted by due and discreet precautions. No doubt the tailor wanted money. The man was entitled to some considerable reward for all that he had done and all that he had suffered in the cause. But Sir William could not himself propose the reward. He could not chaffer for terms with the tailor. He could not be seen in that matter. But having heard the secret from the Earl, he thought that he could get the work done. So he sent for Mr. Flick, the attorney, and told Mr. Flick all that he knew. "Gone and engaged herself to the tailor!" said Mr. Flick, holding up both his hands. Then Sir William took Lady Anna's part. After all, such an engagement was not, as he thought, unnatural. It had been made while she was very young, when she knew no other man of her own age in life, when she was greatly indebted to this man, when she had had no opportunity of measuring a young tailor against a young lord. She had done it probably in gratitude: so said Sir William, and now clung to it from good faith rather than affection. Neither was he severe upon the tailor. He was a man especially given to make excuses for poor, weak, erring, unlearned mortals, ignorant of the law, unless when a witness attempted to be impervious; and now he made excuses for Daniel Thwaite. The man might have done so much worse than he was doing. There seemed already to be a noble reliance on himself in his conduct. Lord Lovel thought that there had been no correspondence while the young lady had been at Yoxham. There might have been, but had not been, a clandestine marriage. Other reasons he gave why Daniel Thwaite should not be regarded as altogether villainous. But nevertheless the tailor must not be allowed to carry off the prize. The prize was too great for him. What must be done? Sir William condescended to ask Mr. Flick what he thought ought to be done. "No doubt we should be very much guided by you, Mr. Solicitor," said Mr. Flick.

"One thing is, I think, plain, Mr. Flick. You must see the Countess and tell her, or get Mr. Goffe to do so. It is clear that she has been kept in the dark between them. At present they are all living together in the same house. She had better leave the place and go elsewhere. They should be kept apart, and the girl, if necessary, should be carried abroad."

"I take it there is a difficulty about money, Mr. Solicitor."

"There ought to be none, and I will take it upon myself to say that there need be none. It is a case in which the court will willingly allow money out of the income of the property. The thing is so large that there should be no grudging of money for needful purposes. Seeing what primâ facie claims these ladies have, they are bound to allow them to her, decently, in accordance with their alleged rank, till the case is settled. No doubt she is the heiress."

"You feel quite sure, Sir William?"

"I do; though, as I have said before, it is a case of feeling sure, and not being sure. Had that Italian woman been really the widow, somebody would have brought her case forward more loudly."

"But if the other Italian woman who died was the wife?"

"You would have found it out when you were there. Somebody from the country would have come to us with evidence, knowing how much we could afford to pay for it. Mind you, the matter has been tried before, in another shape. The old Earl was indicted for bigamy and acquitted. We are bound to regard that young woman as Lady Anna Lovel, and we are bound to regard her and her mother conjointly as coheiresses, in different degrees, to all the personal property which the old Earl left behind him. We can't with safety take any other view. There will still be difficulties in their way—and very serious difficulties, were she to marry this tailor; but, between you and me, he would eventually get the money. Perhaps, Mr. Flick, you had better see him. You would know how to get at his views without compromising any body. But, in the first place, let the Countess know every thing. After what has been done, you won't have any difficulty in meeting Mr. Goffe."

Mr. Flick had no difficulty in seeing Mr. Goffe—though he felt that there would be very much difficulty in seeing Mr. Daniel Thwaite. He did tell Mr. Goffe the story of the wicked tailor—by no means making those excuses which the Solicitor-General had made for the man's presumptuous covetousness. "I knew the trouble we should have with that man," said Mr. Goffe, who had always disliked the Thwaites. Then Mr. Flick went on to say that Mr. Goffe had better tell the Countess—and Mr. Goffe on this point agreed with his adversary. Two or three days after that, but subsequently to the date of the last letter which the mother had written to her daughter, Lady Lovel was told that Lady Anna was engaged to marry Mr. Daniel Thwaite.

She had suspected how it might be; her heart had for the last month been heavy with the dread of this great calamity; she had made her plans with the view of keeping the two apart; she had asked her daughter questions founded on this very fear; and yet she could not for a while be brought to believe it. How did Mr. Goffe know? Mr. Goffe had heard it from Mr. Flick, who had heard it from Sir William Patterson, to whom the tale had been told by Lord Lovel. "And who told Lord Lovel?" said the Countess, flashing up in anger.

"No doubt Lady Anna did so," said the attorney.

But in spite of her indignation she could retain her doubts. "Oh yes; there could be no hope that it was not so." She still pretended not to believe it, though meaning that she would take all due precautions in the matter. Since Mr. Goffe thought that it would be prudent, she would remove to other lodgings. She would think of that plan of going abroad. She would be on her guard, she said. But she would not admit it to be possible that Lady Anna Lovel, the daughter of Earl Lovel, her daughter, should have so far disgraced herself.

But she did believe it. Her heart had in truth told her that it was true at the first word the lawyer had spoken to her. How blind she must have been not to have known it! How grossly stupid not to have understood those asseverations from the girl that the marriage with her cousin was impossible! Her child had not only deceived her, but had possessed cunning enough to maintain her deception. It must have been going on for at least the last twelvemonth, and she, the while, had been kept in the dark by the manœuvres of a simple girl! And then she thought of the depth of the degradation which was prepared for her. Had she passed twenty years of unintermittent combat for this—that when all had been done, when at last success was won, when the rank and wealth of her child had been made positively secure before the world, when she was about to see the unquestioned coronet of a countess placed upon her child's brow—all should be destroyed through a passion so mean as this! Would it not have been better to have died in poverty and obscurity—while there were yet doubts—before any assured disgrace had rested on her? But, oh! to have proved that she was a Countess, and her child the heiress of an Earl, in order that the Lady Anna Lovel might become the wife of Daniel Thwaite, the tailor!

She made many resolutions; but the first was this, that she would never smile upon the girl again till this baseness should have been abandoned. She loved her girl as only mothers do love. More devoted than the pelican, she would have given her heart's blood—had given all her life—not only to nurture, but to aggrandize her child. The establishment of her own position, her own honor, her own name, was to her but the incidental result of her daughter's emblazonment in the world. The child which she had borne to Earl Lovel, and which the father had stigmatized as a bastard, should by her means be known as the Lady Anna, the heiress of that father's wealth—the wealthiest, the fairest, the most noble of England's daughters. Then there had come the sweet idea that this high-born heiress of the Lovels should herself become Countess Lovel, and the mother had risen higher in her delighted pride. It had all been for her child! Had she not loved as a mother, and with all a mother's tenderness? And for what?

She would love still, but she would never again be tender till her daughter should have repudiated her base, her monstrous engagement. She bound up all her faculties to harshness and a stern resolution. Her daughter had been deceitful, and she would now be ruthless. There might be suffering, but had not she suffered? There might be sorrow, but had not she sorrowed? There might be a contest, but had not she ever been contesting? Sooner than that the tailor should reap the fruit of her labors—labors which had been commenced when she first gave herself in marriage to that dark, dreadful man—sooner than that her child should make ignoble the blood which it had cost her so much to ennoble—she would do deeds which should make even the wickedness of her husband child's play in the world's esteem. It was in this mood of mind that she went to meet her daughter at the Saracen's Head.

She had taken fresh lodgings very suddenly—in Keppel Street, near Russell Square, a long way from Wyndham Street. She had asked Mr. Goffe to recommend her a place, and he had sent her to an old lady with whom he himself had lodged in his bachelor days. Keppel Street can not be called fashionable, and Russell Square is not much affected by the nobility. Nevertheless the house was superior in all qualifications to that which she was now leaving, and the rent was considerably higher. But the affairs of the Countess in regard to money were in the ascendant; and Mr. Goffe did not scruple to take for her a "genteel" suite of drawing-rooms—two rooms with folding-doors, that is—with the bedrooms above, first-class lodging-house attendance, and a garret for the lady's-maid. "And then it will be quite close to Mrs. Bluestone," said Mr. Goffe, who knew of that intimacy.

The drive in a glass coach home from the coach-yard to Keppel Street was horrible to Lady Anna; not a word was spoken, as Sarah, the lady's-maid, sat with them in the carriage. Once or twice the poor girl tried to get hold of her mother's hand, in order that she might entice something of a caress. But the Countess would admit of no such softness, and at last withdrew her hand roughly.

"Oh, mamma!" said Lady Anna, unable to suppress her dismay. But the Countess said never a word. Sarah, the lady's-maid, began to think that there must be a second lover. "Is this Wyndham Street?" said Lady Anna when the coach stopped.

"No, my dear; this is not Wyndham Street. I have taken another abode. This is where we are to live. If you will get out, I will follow you, and Sarah will look to the luggage." Then the daughter entered the house, and met the old woman courtesying to her. She at once felt that she had been removed from contact with Daniel Thwaite, and was sure that her mother knew her story. "That is your room," said her mother. "You had better get your things off. Are you tired?"

"Oh! so tired!" and Lady Anna burst into tears.

"What will you have?"

"Oh, nothing! I think I will go to bed, mamma. Why are you unkind to me? Do tell me; any thing is better than that you should be unkind."

"Anna—have not you been unkind to me?"

"Never, mamma; never. I have never meant to be unkind. I love you better than all the world. I have never been unkind. But you—Oh, mamma, if you look at me like that, I shall die."

"Is it true that you have promised that you would be the wife of Mr. Daniel Thwaite?"

"Mamma!"

"Is it true? I will be open with you. Mr. Goffe tells me that you have refused Lord Lovel, telling him that you must do so because you were engaged to Mr. Daniel Thwaite. Is that true?"

"Yes, mamma; it is true."

"And you have given your word to that man?"

"I have, mamma."

"And yet you told me that there was no one else when I spoke to you of Lord Lovel? You lied to me?" The girl sat confounded, astounded, without power of utterance. She had traveled from York to London inside one of those awful vehicles of which we used to be so proud when we talked of our stage-coaches. She was thoroughly weary and worn out. She had not breakfasted that morning, and was sick and ill at ease, not only in heart, but in body also. Of course it was so. Her mother knew that it was so. But this was no time for fond compassion. It would be better, far better, that she should die than that she should not be compelled to abandon the groveling abasement. "Then you lied to me?" repeated the Countess, still standing over her.

"Oh, mamma, you mean to kill me."

"I would sooner die here, at your feet, this moment, and know that you must follow me within an hour, than see you married to such a one as that. You shall never marry him. Though I went into court myself and swore that I was that lord's mistress, that I knew it when I went to him, that you were born a brat beyond the law, that I had lived a life of perjury—I would prevent such greater disgrace as this. It shall never be. I will take you away where he shall never hear of you. As to the money, it shall go to the winds, so that he shall never touch it. Do you think that it is you that he cares for? He has heard of all this wealth, and you are but the bait upon his hook to catch it."

"You do not know him, mamma."

"Will you tell me of him, that I do not know him; impudent slut! Did I not know him before you were born? Have I not known him all through? Will you give me your word of honor that you will never see him again?" Lady Anna tried to think, but her mind would not act for her. Every thing was turning round, and she became giddy and threw herself on the bed. "Answer me, Anna. Will you give me your word of honor that you will never see him again?"

She might still have said yes. She felt that enough of speech was left to her for so small an effort, and she knew that if she did so the agony of the moment would pass away from her. With that one word spoken, her mother would be kind to her, and would wait upon her; would bring her tea, and would sit by her bedside, and caress her. But she too was a Lovel, and she was, moreover, the daughter of her who once had been Josephine Murray.

"I can not say that, mamma," she said, "because I have promised."

Her mother dashed from the room, and she was left alone upon the bed.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE "Adirondack region," that great wilderness of Northern New York, is estimated to include about 2703 square miles, bounded, in a general way, by Lake Champlain, the St. Lawrence, the Black, and the Mohawk rivers. This vast tract is essentially one grand forest. The eastern portion contains the most elevated land, and the highest mountains in the State; the western section is varied by hill and plain; an immense valley crosses the whole plateau in a northeast direction, and a remarkable chain of lakes and streams extends along this valley, linking together, as it were, Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence River. From the summit of Whiteface, one of the Adirondack peaks, thirty lakes may be seen. The scenery of this region is unsurpassed. All the wild animals of our northern latitude roam through the forests, and fish abound in the waters, thus affording extraordinary attractions to sportsmen.

It has been recently proposed to convert a large portion of the Adirondack region into a public park, under the control of the State, so that game and timber may be preserved from unlawful destruction. For it has become manifest that unless measures are taken to protect the forests, their inevitable annihilation will seriously injure the industrial and commercial interests of the State, and greatly diminish the general healthfulness of the surrounding country. It is still an unsettled question among scientific men whether the presence of great forests actually increases the amount of annual rain-fall, or whether they merely cause a moderate and equal distribution of the rain during the year. But there is no doubt that the destruction of forests produces many calamitous results, particularly when, as in the case of the Adirondack forests, they cover the sources of rivers and streams which irrigate an immense section of country. The Commissioners of State Parks of New York, after careful consideration of the matter, are of opinion that this great woodland must be protected from the wanton destruction which now threatens it; that the timber should be cut under the direction of those who will look to the future interests of the State; that the "Adirondack Park" be made not merely a pleasure-ground for the people, but a source of productive wealth and general healthfulness to the whole community.

The Anderson School of Natural History, on Penikese Island, was formally opened with appropriate exercises on July 8, there being about forty prospective scholars, nearly one-third of whom were women. The method of study to be pursued here must be decidedly agreeable, judging from the remarks made on this occasion by Professor Agassiz. He said Nature was to be the students' text-book—their appliances for study to be only those that Nature afforded. Every morning he should give them some advice, and then during the day they should look over the island, and tell him something of what they saw. "Work," he said, "don't read, and ask questions." In the course of his remarks Professor Agassiz said that he had settled the question of admitting women to the school without consulting any one.

Sensible man is the Shah in one respect. Though he may be very proud of his wonderful aigrette of diamonds, he seldom wears it. The reason is that any thing heavy on his head gives him the headache. The custom of his nation forbids him to have his head uncovered; but he is not in robust health, and seldom burdens himself with any head-dress heavier than a cloth kulah.

M. Tholozan, a Frenchman, is the private physician of the Shah. But on his European tour he has also been accompanied by Dr. Dickson, who belongs to the British legation at Teheran. During the temporary absence of M. Tholozan from Teheran some time ago the Shah was attacked with a dangerous illness, in which Dr. Dickson attended him. When he determined on his journey to Europe he applied to her Majesty's government to permit the English doctor to attach himself to his suite, and the permission was accorded by Lord Granville.

The republican system of arranging matters at Niagara does not contrast favorably with the monarchical. On the Canada side the river-bank between the road and the water is owned by government, and is always freely open to the public. No person is allowed to erect buildings or put up fences between the road and the river, so that one of the finest views of the Falls is always freely accessible. By the progress of improvements recently made it is almost if not quite impossible to view the Falls from any point on the American side of the river without paying for the privilege. Prospect Park is, however, a very good show-place, and the company have made many important improvements. Admission to the Park is twenty-five cents for each individual.

A case of Worcester porcelain attracts much attention at the Vienna Exhibition. One feature is porcelain representing carved ivory in the Japanese style. There are two vases in the style of Limoges enamel, the designs representing the story of the Norman conquest, from the Bayeux tapestry. Two years were spent by an artist in painting these. A dessert service, made for Queen Victoria, is pierced work, with gold and blue; and a breakfast set, in pearls and gold on a dark blue ground, is one of the richest ever seen. The gem of the case is Lord Dudley's cup and saucer, in jeweled porcelain, the ground being gold adorned with turquoises and beautiful little medallions. No wonder this is shown in a morocco and velvet case, like a valuable bracelet or necklace!

A few weeks ago Miss Louisa M. Alcott, who, through her Little Women and Little Men, is known by all the children the country over, received an invitation to a gathering of a "Little Men and Women's Society," in Springfield, Massachusetts. She was absent from home when the invitation came, but on her return sent a letter, in which she says:

"I should dearly like to see them [the children of the society], but have no time to spare from my own two little men who are with me now. They are the Demi and Daisy of the story: Fred and Jack are the real names, and two jolly little lads they are. Fred is a bookworm and philosopher, like Demi, and Jack is a sunshiny, loving rosy-face, like Daisy. He is eight on the 24th, and is to have a party of little girls, as he prefers them to boys. His fourteen dollies are to go to the ball, and he is to have cake rabbits and cockadoodles for refreshments. Jack has plenty of pluck, and is a real worker; but he is so like a girl in his tastes and pretty ways that I call him 'Betsey Jones, my niece,' and he likes it. Ten-year-old Fred reads all the time, and any thing he can lay his hands on, from the dictionary to Emerson's poems. When he goes to Boston for the day he takes a book under each arm to read by the way, and when I say 'Now what shall we do for a lark?' he rolls up his big eyes, and points his chubby finger to the first book-store, and is perfectly happy to poke about there all day, reading and looking at prints. But I don't let him do it, and we go and see printing done, or pictures, or some curious animal, and so he gets some new ideas into his large head. They both send their 'respects,' as little Betsey Jones says; and hoping that the tea-parties and plays went off splendidly, I am very truly yours,

"L. M. ALCOTT."

Hundreds of children who have read of "Demi" and "Daisy" will recognize the portraits.

A California artist has invented a process by which a perfect portrait of a horse may be produced while moving with the greatest speed.

The franking privilege, which recently ceased to exist, has been enjoyed in this country for more than eighty years, the number of those sending free mail matter constantly increasing. In 1792 an act was approved by Congress which allowed letters and packages to or from the President and Vice-President to pass through the mails free, also to or from members of Congress during the session and twenty days afterward, and to or from other government officers. Some additions were made to the free list in 1793. From that time to this, year after year, the franking privilege has been extended in various ways. Of course the burden has been borne by the people, and the system had become so extensive that its results were injurious and oppressive.

If during the hot weather people, after becoming heated and fatigued with work or exercise of any kind, eat freely of cabbage, green pease and beans, melons, cucumbers, green apples, and similar articles, the probability is that in a few hours they will think they are attacked with genuine Asiatic cholera. Unwholesome diet induces cholera morbus; excesses of any kind at this season invite disease and death. The markets constantly abound in unripe or overripe or decayed fruit and vegetables, offered for sale cheap. The purchasers fall easy victims to disease of any kind. Moderation, prudence, and cleanliness in all things are the best safeguards against summer ailments of every kind—the best preventives against the fatality of any pestilence which may invade the great city. Caution, not fear, is what the public should exercise, as the mortality increases with midsummer heat.

Is there any thing in the celebration of our "glorious Fourth" which more quickly arouses a righteous indignation than to see a large boy in passing your house point a pistol to some little girls gathered on the sidewalk or sitting on the door-step? This we saw done twice on the Fourth of July—probably a similar thing was done hundreds of times on that day in different parts of the city. The excuse given to a remonstrance, that "the pistol was not loaded," amounts to nothing. None of the pistols are loaded that go off under such circumstances—at least so it is constantly affirmed by those who hold the weapons. Such reckless conduct deserves more than rebuke. A summary punishment should be inflicted upon all who are so utterly regardless of the comfort and security of the public.

The yearly tragedy has been enacted early in the season at Niagara. On the Fourth of July a young couple who were engaged to be married, accompanied by a brother of the girl, went out in a boat at Chippewa, on the Canada side, for a sail on the Niagara River. They have not been seen since; but pieces of their boat have been picked up, and there is no doubt but they were drawn into the deadly current.

Mr. J. W. Schermerhorn proposes to do a good thing for Rutger's College, New Jersey, viz., to give one-half of the net proceeds of his mines in Morris County for three or four years, until $45,000 shall be accumulated, when the money will be used to found a professorship of English Literature and Journalism.

Perhaps one of the most extraordinary plants known is a native of the island of Sumatra, and was discovered in 1818 by Sir Stamford Raffles. It has never been cultivated in any European or American garden, perhaps for the simple reason that it would need a pretty good-sized garden to itself. Each flower measured a full yard across, the petals being of a roundish shape, growing wider in the middle, and rounding off toward the top; the base of each petal where it joined the centre part was about a foot across. The hollow nectarium held about twelve pints, and the weight of this prodigy was fifteen pounds! Before the flowers open they look like a very hard cabbage. These enormous flowers are what is called parasitical, like the mistletoe, growing on another plant, which is a trailing vine, so they cover the ground and show no leaves or stem at all.

SHAKSPEARE'S TOAD.

"Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head."

"UGLY and venomous!" Ugly, therefore venomous; for that seems to be the chain of argument applied to the unhappy toad. "Nature," says Lord Brougham of Robespierre, "had imprinted on his face a perpetual warning of the man's disposition"—rather a singular argument, by-the-way, for the noble lord in question to have hit upon.

As touching the toad, however, the poets appear to be wrong. Pope pictures his enemy, the beautiful Lord Hervey—"Hervey the handsome"—under the figure of that ill-used reptile, as whispering into good Queen Caroline's ear:

"Who at the ear of Eve, familiar toad,
Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad."

But in fact there is no venom. There is, indeed, an acrid secretion in the follicles of the skin of the neck and partly over the whole body, which exudes, and even spurts out, on pressure, and is sufficiently offensive to cause a dog, on seizing a toad, to drop it somewhat hastily from its mouth. It is potent enough sometimes to redden the skin of the hand; but it is perfectly innocuous in the blood, as has been proved by injecting it into the circulation of a chicken. And this exudation is, of course, the "sweltered venom" of the poetical toad in poetry.

But the Rev. J. G. Wood, that excellent naturalist and charming writer, assures us that his children have a trough full of tame toads, each of which answers to its own particular name, and comes when called. The children, he says, carry them round the garden, and hold them up to any insect which they may chance to fancy, to enable them to swallow it, which they do by a lightning flash of their glutinous tongues. Nay, more, their tender care for their unlovely pets is so great that they bathe and kiss them daily, he declares, just as they themselves are treated by their nurse. Upon one occasion one of the children, who had received an orange, was seen, with her own especial toad seated on her hand, partaking with his mistress of the orange in alternate sucks or bites. Well, de gustibus is an old axiom, and, it seems, a true one.

From the experience so gained Mr. Wood declares the toad to be more quickly and easily tamed than most other animals: so that its disposition seems to be as devoid of venom as its physique.

The "precious jewel" in the toad's head was also an article of general belief in Shakspeare's time, and is explained by Halliwell to have been a stone of potent effect in medicine. Any book of folk-lore will show how much the medicine of the mediæval period dealt with all kinds of reptiles, and other such "uncanny" animals as hedgehogs, bats, owls, and other weird and darkness-loving things. Serpents, we know, were sacred to Æsculapius, not on account of their supposed wisdom or subtlety, but by reason of their yearly renovation in a change of skin; and it would seem that all the reptiles of the lizard and frog classes, which inherit some share of the enmity sown in Eden between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, inherit also some part of this affinity between snakes and the practice of physic. I find that the homeopathists of the present day retain at least one drug derived from snakehood—"lachesis"—which is said to be the poison of the lance-headed viper, though it may perhaps be doubted whether their chemists have really supplied their vials from the poison-bags of that interesting reptile. They use also the sepia of the cuttle-fish: and I have often been struck by the appropriateness of sepia as a medical emblem. I observe that doctors, when hard pressed in argument, always escape in a flood of hard words—like the cuttle-fish, protected and concealed by the blinding inky trail it leaves behind it.

I am not sure that the existence of the jewel in the toad's head has not been supported, if not suggested, by the extraordinarily brilliant eye of the reptile, which appears to flash and scintillate with some inward light, thrown into stronger relief as it is by the dark, dull, hideous skin in which it is set. I find this corroborated by the fact that in classical times the toad was supposed to partake somewhat of the power of the fabulous basilisk in the ability to fascinate any person it looked on by the glance of its eye. In the basilisk, indeed, this power was fatal to the life of the person beheld—a gift never claimed for the toad. The notion that a toad can live without material food is, however, both more generally believed and better supported than that touching the jewel in its head. Numerous accounts, apparently well authenticated, relate the finding of toads entombed in the centre of aged trees when cleft open by the woodman's wedge, or inclosed in chambers of chalk or stone until disinterred by the miner, but still alive, and seemingly in good health.

So persistently, indeed, have such stories been repeated that Dr. Buckland, formerly Dean of Westminster, determined to put the matter to the test by inclosing sundry toads in blocks of stone and wood. For this purpose he had twenty-four holes excavated in two blocks of stone, twelve of them in a block of coarse oolitic limestone, and twelve in a block of close-grained silicious sandstone. The holes were circular; those in the limestone were twelve inches deep by five in diameter, and those in the sandstone were of the same diameter, but only half the depth. Each cell had a groove at the top, fitted to receive a circular plate of glass, with a slate over it, and when closed was rendered impervious to air and water by a coating of soft clay. In each of the twenty-four cells an unfortunate toad was placed and sealed down on a given day, having been first carefully weighed; and the blocks of stone were buried in the earth three feet deep. On opening the cells thirteen months after, all the toads in the smaller cells were found dead, and much decayed. The greater part of those in the oolite were still alive, and, stranger still, more than one had actually increased in weight! But in at least one of such cases of increase the cover of the cell was found to be slightly cracked, sufficiently so, perhaps, to admit small insects out of the surrounding earth. All the survivors were then buried again, and at the end of the second year they were also dead.

That the toad does "live upon the vapor of a dungeon" appears, therefore, to be conclusively disproved. And such aerial toads seem to be as much creatures of the poet's brain as the flower-eating serpents of Shakspeare.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Shah, the whole Shah, and nothing but the Shah.

WE are all gone mad about the Shah. To have had a good look at him is to be a distinguished personage; to have interviewed him is to have secured a social reputation. I have seen him very near, and I have also interviewed him very near—in another sense; that is, an intimate friend of mine has done it for me. He had occasion to call upon one of the Shah's European attendants at Buckingham Palace yesterday morning, and not being troubled with false modesty, observed in a by-the-bye-ish sort of manner, "Can you introduce me to his Highness?" and, rather to my sanguine friend's own astonishment, this was done. The great potentate was at breakfast, sitting in a wilderness of flowers, and in a state of complete affability. He showed he could talk French, though with a Persian rather than a Parisian accent, and he had a tendency, not confined to Asiatics, to converse upon the weather. His great delight, however, and favorite topic was the telegraph. An apparatus connected with the wires at Teheran has been placed by the Indo-European Telegraphic Company in the apartment next his bedchamber, and all his spare time (of which, however, to say truth, he has but very little) is given to "clicking" his inquiries to the prince-governor he has left at home. As Persia, however, is rather behind the time—i. e., as respects the sun (for I don't wish for a moment to speak disrespectfully of its political system)—the prince-governor is generally in bed and asleep when these questions are "clicked" to him, and sometimes he is not so quick in reply as it might be wished. When the Shah gets back he will probably see to this, and his deputy will find himself a head shorter some fine morning; but at present our Eastern guest is wholly scientific. His brother-in-law and Grand Vizier is so passionately enamored of telegraphing that he actually went on at it for three hours on Thursday last, and so lost his dinner.

Is not this a curious repetition of that imaginary verse in Morier's Hadji Baba in England, where the Turk amuses himself with pulling the bell, and bringing the servant up, one entire afternoon, believing it to be an ingenious piece of mechanism? Another instance of truth being spoken in jest occurs to me in a report here prevalent that the Shah wanted to put one of his people to death at Berlin—just as, in fun, I supposed him to take a fancy to do in my last Gossip. A lady was at the bottom of it, of course, yet in the end the poor wretch's life was spared. Very likely the whole story is a canard, but it sets one inquiring as to what really would happen should such a mischance take place in England. I learn from an eminent criminal lawyer that nothing would happen—so far as the Shah is concerned—even though he were to kill an Englishman, he being an independent sovereign, and not subject to British law. Still he had better not try. Even in Louis XIV.'s high-handed time, when Queen Christina of Sweden put her secretary to death while she was a guest in France, there was rather a row about it, you remember, and we are much more particular now. I harp upon this subject, because the Shah has a sinister look on his pale though swarthy face, which seems to say quite plainly, "Off with his head!" and the three rows of diamonds on his breast, and the diamonds on his belt, and the diamonds on his cimeter, and the aigrette of diamonds (so heavy that he can not wear it long) that is stuck in his fez cap—I say, none of these expensive ornaments so dazzled me but that I saw his lips utter that direful sentence more than once. He does not utter it aloud, of course, but he has said things as bad. It is currently reported that he asked the Emperor of Germany why he did not get rid of that queer old woman: by which depreciatory term he meant to indicate the august Augusta! In his own country nobody (that is any body) retains a consort after she is twenty years of age. They say William was much shocked, but sighed.

If it was possible for us to be "disillusioned" with respect to this sparkling potentate, the circumstances under which he has come would accomplish it; for he has just farmed out his entire kingdom—the whole empire of Darius—to a German Jew. Baron Reuter, the telegraph man, has proved as attractive to him as the wires themselves, and has bought the whole concern out and out for seventy years (who pulled these wires I do not know, but the fact is certain). He has bought the customs—not the manners and customs, for they are not worth much, but the revenues—and the exclusive right of making railways and of sinking mines; he has bought the forests, the canals, and every thing. This is really an enterprise which should have been undertaken by one of your own fellow-countrymen, it is so thorough and colossal; but there is a certain bathos about it too. Think of the royal Mede being "financed" by a German Barnum! The Shah himself thinks no small-beer—or sherbet—of his own judgment, however, and is said to have complimented the Czar with these farewell words, "Your country pleases me, and your method of governing it has won my approbation"—a remark of "the king of kings," as he calls himself, which I hope he will not reiterate when he leaves the shores of England, because he is not quite the political Sir Hubert Stanley praise from whom "is praise indeed."

I do not believe that with all his contempt for the fair sex he permits his wives to be called in the Persian tongue sheahses (she-asses), as I am informed by a philologist is the case; but this I do know, that he does not use a pocket-handkerchief—except, I suppose, to throw at some favored damsel—and that one of our princesses told a lady of the court that she did not wear her best dresses when she had to sit next to him, because he has a habit of throwing his chicken bones, etc., upon the floor. The laws of the Medes and Persians do not alter, but let us hope that, under the influence of Western civilization, their habits at dinner will.

We have shown the Shah every thing we can think of except a bicycle race, and I dare say they will show him that at the coming fête at the Crystal Palace. I don't know in what appreciation those two-wheeled steeds are held in your country, but certainly they can accomplish not a little. Four members of the London Bicycle Club have just reached John O'Groat's from the metropolis at an average rate of sixty miles a day! The worst of these machines is that they are only adapted for young and lean people. A fat man looks as absurd on one as in a "shell-jacket;" and your own correspondent has had personal experiences of the bicycle which lead him to imagine that even "the prime of life" is rather too late to acquire the mastery over it. One ran away with me, threw me, and bit me in the leg as I was lying on the ground, in a manner I can never forgive nor forget; and I was assured it was not exceptionally vicious, either.

The New Magdalen, now being performed, I believe, at New York, is advertised at the Comédie Française, in Paris, as La Nouvelle Madeleine; at Berlin, as Die Neue Magdalena; at Milan, as La Nuova Maddalena; at the Hague, as De Newe Magdalen; and at Moscow, as Novaia Magdalena. To have a play brought out in seven capital cities of the world at one time is rather unusual, I fancy, for any dramatist, and must please Mr. Wilkie Collins not a little.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

"PLUCKED FROM THE BURNING."

BY FLORENCE MARRYAT.

I AM not dying; Heaven has been merciful to me, and I shall live to be a blessing to him (or so he fondly tells me) whose curse I had so nearly proved. Yet, weak and prostrated as I am, I can not rest until I have written down the details of my sad story; for while there is a chance of their recital deterring such as would tread the paths I well-nigh stumbled in, and that chance remains unheeded, I feel I have not made all the reparation which lies in my power.

I must begin with the beginning of my life. My father was an officer in the Bengal army, but he and my mother dying within a few months of each other, left me early to the care of guardians, who imagined that by keeping me at a respectable boarding-school from the time I could talk plainly until the age of eighteen they amply fulfilled the trust they had undertaken. From my childhood I knew that when my eighteenth birthday arrived I should be sent out again to India, not for the mere object of marriage, but because there is a shrewd condition attached to the enjoyment of the fund provided by the Bengal army for its female orphans, by which, if they are to continue to draw the allowance made for them, and which ceases upon marriage, they must take up a residence in the presidency upon obtaining a marriageable age.

I had no provision to look to except that derived from the fund, and my guardians had neither the wish nor the ability to maintain me; therefore at the time appointed I set sail for India alone.

Arriving in Calcutta, I found myself dependent on the hospitality of friends, to whose care I had been confided, if not for actual support, at least for that protection without which a young woman can not mix in the world.

I was proud in spirit, notwithstanding the humbleness of my position, and after a while the knowledge galled me, and I felt that I could bear it no longer. Acting upon this impulse, and the advice of my friends, I made the fatal mistake which so many of my sex have made before me, of accepting the first eligible offer which I received, and which chanced to be from Laurence Edwards, the rising partner in a large mercantile firm.

I did not love him. Whatever my heart feels for him now, I must record that here. How could I have loved him, and yet have this story to relate of myself? He was a grave business-like man, some twelve years older than I was, and whose disapprobation of my levity was the occasion more than once of our engagement being nearly broken off. However, matters were made smooth again between us. I liked him as well or better than most of the butterflies who were hovering about me; my acquaintances congratulated me on the excellence of my prospects, and I indorsed their opinions by becoming his wife. But very shortly after my marriage I had a dangerous illness; so alarming a one, indeed, that the doctors recommended an immediate return home as the only means of restoring my health. My husband could not go with me; he had but lately returned from his tour of pleasure, and the other partner of the house was away, so he was compelled to let me depart by myself. He put me on board the homeward-bound steamer, was vigilant in providing all things necessary for my comfort during the passage, and full of cautions as to my behavior on my arrival in England; but he did not express much grief at our separation. That he felt it I now know well, but he was a man who could bow himself gracefully to the inevitable; he feared to excite my alarm by appearing to think too much of my state of health, and I attributed his reticence to want of feeling.

I returned to England, then, as I left it, alone, and, for the first time, thrown on my own discretion as a guide. Legally, I was no longer a child to be looked after and directed by guardians; but in reality I was just as unfit to be my own mistress as when I left school. Having no family of my own, except the most distant connections, I first visited that of my husband, in Scotland; but I did not stay there long. His countrified and stanchly Presbyterian relatives scared me with their rigid ways and doctrines, as doubtless I horrified them by the laxity of my manners. Having been brought up entirely at school, and being very foolish and heedless, as became my youth, I had no idea of accommodating myself to the habits of those prim Scotch people, and cried myself ill before I had been a week under their roof, which set them so much against me that it was a mutual pleasure when the day for my departure was fixed. I had never lived out of London before, and every other place seemed strange to me; therefore my husband consented to my taking a house in the suburbs, where, with my small establishment of maid-servants, I expected, for some time, to hear that he was on his way to rejoin me. But business interfered with his plans, and one thing after another combined to prevent his return, until we had been three years separated from each other; and although my own health was then perfectly restored, I was enjoying myself too much to have any wish to revisit Calcutta.

More than that, I had begun to regret, guilty creature that I was, that I had ever seen the place, or the man whom I called my husband! I had never known much of him, as may be supposed. During our brief married life he had been occupied for the greater portion of each day, and the little I did know was fast fading from my memory. The heart forgets quickly from eighteen to twenty-one, and particularly when absence is added to a feeling which had never culminated beyond gratitude. And much happened during those three years to wipe the remembrance of him off my mind. I was exceedingly thoughtless and fond of gayety, and my little house was soon crowded with visitors. I was pretty also—I need have no hesitation in transcribing the fact, since paper can not reflect my blushes—and some among my new acquaintance were found bold enough to tell me so. Among these was a certain Alfred Knowles, a connection of my own, who had introduced himself to me on that account, claiming a distant cousinship, and taking advantage of that claim to establish an intimacy between us. He was a handsome young fellow, not many years older than myself, with lots of life and sparkle about him; and when at last he ventured to tell me that he loved me as he had never loved woman before, he made me believe he was very much in earnest; and, to my misery, I went still further, and believed not only that I returned his love, but was very much in earnest also. Perhaps some may wonder that I can write so quietly on such a theme; but I have an object in doing so. My purpose in telling this tale is to show the means by which I was rescued from the wrong I contemplated; but I will not sully its pages by detailing how the sin was so nearly brought about. When it was that I first fancied I loved Alfred Knowles I can not say; but the idea grew by little and little, until I was strongly imbued with it, and when the crisis of my fate arrived I felt as though I were entangled in a web from which there was no possibility of escape. It was not many days after the completion of the third anniversary of my arrival in England that he implored me to break through the shackles of a marriage which had been unhallowed by affection, and to link my lot with his, and I consented. Without taking time to weigh the consequences of the step I was about to take—without having seriously ascertained whether my lover was really worth the loss of position and name and honor to me, I had promised to give up every thing for him, persuaded, almost against my better judgment, by the professed ardor of his attachment and the fervor of his entreaties!

How well I remember the night upon which I had agreed to fly with him! how well recall each trivial incident of that miserable time! It was a warm evening in July; even at nine o'clock it was still light, and I thought the darkness would never fall to cover my disgrace. I sat in my drawing-room, striving to occupy myself and to make the hours pass as they did on ordinary occasions, but without effect. My nerves were so painfully acute that the least sound made itself apparent, and distracted my attention. As the time advanced I could hear the servants chattering to each other as they put up the shutters and bolted the doors, and shuddered as I thought how freely they would handle my name upon the coming morrow. Ten o'clock! How slowly the hours dragged themselves away! Would they never go to bed? As I anxiously awaited the moment when I should have the house to myself, and yet dared not hasten their movements by a word which might excite suspicion, all the events of my past life crowded into my mind; and while I could have counted the loud pulsations of my heart, it seemed as though I lingered there for no other purpose but to gaze upon the panoramic pictures which memory presented to me. With my elbow leaning on the table, and my eyes staring into vacancy, I must have looked more vanquished than triumphant—more like a defaulter who hears the approaching step of the officer of justice than a woman whose coveted happiness is just within her grasp! Why did the remembrance of my husband, of the man of whom I had thought so little, come to torment me in that hour of nervous expectation, and make me turn so hot each time I thought of him that there did not seem enough air in the room for me to breathe? I did not love him, neither did I fear him; but I knew him for a man of unblemished honor, and I could not contemplate the blow I was about to inflict upon his name without acknowledging that he deserved something better at my hands. He had taken me, a dowerless orphan, for his wife; he had loaded me since with every benefit that money could procure; I could recall the affectionate gravity with which he would reproach my girlish levity, the cheerful readiness with which he acceded to every innocent wish that I expressed. Why—why, in the name of God, did all this, which I had so long forgotten, come back to me now? What would he say? What would he think? How would he look when he heard the dreadful news that I had dishonored him, and left my home with a stranger? I dared not consider. I covered my face tightly with my hands, and rocked myself backward and forward in my pain.

And yet how could I disappoint Alfred, or give him up who loved me so? "Oh, why," I inwardly moaned—"why did my husband send me home to England, or why did he not come also to protect me from harm? I have lived alone, without a friend to warn me of my danger, and now it is too late—it is too late!" So in my extremity I sighed, and so I thought.

The servants now appearing to ask if I required any thing further at their hands, I dismissed them impatiently, and listened wearily for the moment when silence should reign over the little household, and its mistress be free to forsake it. When it arrived I went up to my bedroom. There stood the boxes, addressed and corded, to account for the presence of which I had been compelled to fabricate the falsehood of my being about to pay a visit in the country the following day, trusting that when the servants found I was gone they would forward them to their destination.

In the mean while I had only a small traveling-bag to carry in my hand, and the few articles which I required were soon placed in it. I stripped off the jewelry which I wore, and locked it in my jewel-case, putting the key in a place of safety; I emptied the contents of my purse upon the dressing-table, for I had no intention of taking any thing with me that I could possibly do without. Then I robed myself in my walking apparel, and I was ready—ready for what?

Eleven o'clock, the hour for meeting, was close at hand, yet I lingered, loath, I am glad to think, to break through the ties which bound me yet a little longer to the society of the good and the pure. But I had made up my mind; I had given my promise. What was there to detain me? I was leaving the room, when I caught sight of a print which adorned its walls—the representation of an infant, with clasped hands, kneeling upon its little bed. The sight stung me; the remembrance of my orphaned childhood, my neglected youth, my unloved maturity, rushed into my heart, and for a moment I wept bitterly.

"Ah!" I exclaimed, amidst my tears, "had I had a child of my own, this had never been; or had I had a mother to teach me how to pray, Heaven might mercifully have guarded me this night against myself!"

But I felt that I had gone too far, and that the time for thinking thus had passed over my head. Drying my eyes, I quietly unfastened the bedroom door, and with a lighted candle in my hand crept stealthily down the staircase, fearful lest the servants should be attracted by the sound of my footsteps and fancy that I needed their assistance.

But when I reached the hall I found the task before me, of obtaining a quiet egress, more difficult than I had anticipated. The ponderous bolts and bars and chains were rusty; some I could scarcely move, and of others I did not understand the mechanism. As I was fingering them with trepidation, lest I should be overheard, the footstep of a man sounded upon the pavement outside, and fancying it must be that of the one I was about to join, I applied myself with fresh energy to the task, and had just accomplished it, when a thundering double knock upon the door itself, and close against my head, nearly threw me off my balance with alarm.

Who could it be? Not Alfred, surely—with a noise that reverberated through the little tenement! In my surprise and confusion I suddenly threw open the unfastened door, and saw before me the figure of him whom I had imagined to be thousands of miles away—of my husband, Laurence Edwards!"

The shock was so great and unexpected that I staggered backward and leaned against the wall. The candle which I brought down with me was still flaring in its candlestick upon the hall table, and its feeble uncertain light threw a sickly glare upon my husband's face, as doubtless it did upon my own. He, apparently as astonished as myself to have the hall door opened to him at eleven o'clock at night by his wife clad in walking attire, regarded me for a few seconds in total silence. I was the first to recover myself.

"Good Heavens, Laurence!" I exclaimed, "how you frightened me! I never dreamed of seeing you! Why did you not apprise me of your intended return?"

"Because I had a fancy for taking you by surprise," he replied, gravely, "and I seem to have succeeded perfectly. Where were you going?"

"Going!" I faltered. "Going! Where should I be going at this time of night?"

"No, to be sure. You have just come in, of course. Well, get out of this draught, Marion, while I settle my business with the cabman."

He reopened the door as he spoke, and I perceived that a cab with his portmanteau stood outside, and guessed that he must have been looking for the number of the house for some minutes before he startled me with his knock.

I obeyed him, and walked mechanically into the sitting-room, where the servants, roused by this time, had appeared with lights. My head was so confused that I could hardly think; but above the knowledge that all my plans had been upset by my husband's reappearance, and the fear as to how much he might or might not guess concerning them, rose the idea of a great deliverance. I felt as though I had been standing on the brink of a precipice, and some one had suddenly drawn me backward; as if I had been bent upon suicide, and the angel of God had stood in the path with a flaming sword and forced me to turn another way. In another minute Laurence joined me. I had hastily removed my bonnet and shawl and thrown them in a corner. He came up to my side, and tenderly embraced me.

"Is my wife glad to have me home again?" he said, kindly; "or is she sorry?"

"Glad," I replied, in a low voice; and I did not lie. I was glad that he had come to save me. Now that the least check had been given to my impulse, I felt how unworthy it had been of me, and how I had magnified its attractions. I did not feel any the better for this conviction; on the contrary, I knew that it withdrew the only excuse I could have claimed for my intended treachery, and, as it struck me, my head sank lower and lower, until I felt abased to the very earth. My husband did not appear to notice my sense of humiliation; he conversed cheerfully with me, during the meal which I caused to be prepared for him, on the reason of his sudden return to England; told me that he had often delayed it until the business should be better able to spare him, but finding that each year increased instead of diminishing its demands, had determined to put it off no longer. He questioned me on my own plans, and trusted that his advent would make no difference to them, while I sat before him like a culprit, each kind word he uttered sinking like a knife into my heart. Ah! if he only knew, if he only could have read my thoughts, how would he have felt toward me? When I had somewhat accustomed myself to his presence I took courage to raise my conscience-stricken head and examine his appearance. I do not suppose he was much altered from what he had been when we parted, but I had thought of him so little that he looked almost like a stranger to me. I saw before me a tall, dark man, rendered still darker from being exceedingly sunburned, whose blue eyes contrasted strangely with his black hair and beard. I was fair and small myself. He struck me as being very manly and good-looking, and I wondered that I had never perceived it before. As he caught me in the midst of my scrutiny he smiled, but sadly.

"I suppose you have nearly forgotten what I am like, Marion? Well, you have had time enough to do so. I do not see much alteration in you, my dear; you seem quite unchanged to me. I trust your heart is as much so as your face?"

I felt myself blush as he addressed me, but I gave him no other answer.

"Come, is the house locked up again?" he said in another minute. "If so, I think we had better go to bed, for if you are not very tired, I am."

This was the moment which I had been dreading ever since his arrival, when he must see my corded boxes, and require some explanation of their being there. With all my wickedness, I had not been in the habit of telling falsehoods, and the idea was dreadful to me; yet I was desperate, and I knew that I must lie or be discovered.

"Halloo!" he exclaimed, as his eyes fell upon them. "What are these? Your boxes, Marion? Were you going away any where?"

"Yes," I replied, I hardly knew how. "I was going away for a little while, but it is of no consequence."

"Dover," said my husband, reading the address. "You wanted a breath of sea-air, did you? Well, I don't wonder at it this stifling weather. We can go together, my dear, can we not? It will do us both good."

"Oh no! Pray do not think of it. I would rather stay here, now that you are come—I have no wish for a change," fell rapidly from my mouth, as I dreaded his insisting upon putting his proposal into execution. I could not have gone there with him. I would have died sooner. I should have feared that the very stones would have cried out and revealed my base intentions to him—those intentions from the thought of which I had already commenced to shrink with horror.

"It shall be just as you please, Marion," was his quiet answer. "My only object in coming home is to give you pleasure."

It will be readily conjectured that I did not sleep much that night. What my lover would think of my defection, and how I should communicate my further wishes to him—what my husband would say if he ever guessed the truth, or part of the truth, and how I could live so as to best conceal it from him—troubled me too much to permit me to sleep. How I longed that night to die before the morning! What a debased and guilty creature I seemed to myself! How incapable of making the happiness of either of the men with whom I had to do! And yet I had time to wonder at the fact that my intrigue with Alfred Knowles appeared already to have become a thing of the past; that whatever became of me, that would never happen now; that the merciful hinderance I had received had been sufficient to open my eyes, and to cause me to see myself and my design in their true colors.

The next day I felt that I owed it to him to send him immediate intelligence of what had occurred, and how I intended to act for the future. I scarcely know what I wrote. I believe I said simply that my husband had returned, and that I considered it an especial interposition of Providence to save us from a crime for which we should never have forgiven ourselves or each other, and that if he loved me as he said he did, I prayed him to leave me to myself and that performance of duty by which alone I hoped to deaden the stings of conscience which assailed me.

But he would not do as I desired him; he was selfish and profligate; and instead of considering that we had experienced a great escape, he looked upon me as on one who had cheated him and forsworn herself. He did worse. He sent me letters so openly that I lived in a state of continual dread lest my husband should ask to see their contents or from whom they came; and, disregarding the privacy of my home, he presented himself there to upbraid and revile me for my cowardice, even threatening me with exposure if I did not keep my word.

But I was firm. Thank God, I was firm. Better still, the change in Alfred Knowles's behavior to me made the flimsy thing which I had called my love for him, and which had had no surer foundation than a flattered vanity, melt away into thin air, and leave me nothing but thankfulness for my release.

All this time my husband did not relax in any of his attentions to me. He was uniformly kind and tender; he almost anticipated my wishes; and, what touched me more than any thing, he appeared fully to trust me—I, who had proved myself so utterly unworthy of his confidence. Throughout the period of Alfred Knowles's bitter reproaches to me and entreaties that I would change my purpose, my husband never seemed suspicious of either my cousin or myself; on the contrary, he often left us together to fight out our battles, and was only (or the contrast made me think so) the more tender afterward than before. I thought that I had never known Laurence as I knew him then; I often said to myself that, had I only known him, I must have loved him too much to contemplate his dishonor. But the idea would make me shrink from his caresses, feeling myself so unworthy of them, till he was pained to imagine what could have so distressed me.

One evening we were at the theatre together—for he was careful to take me to every place of amusement—when I observed Alfred Knowles in a box opposite to the one we occupied. He was accompanied by several other gentlemen, and a very beautiful but care-worn woman, handsomely dressed, was leaning over the front of the box.

"Do not notice your cousin to-night, dear Marion," said my husband, in a whisper. "I will give you my reason presently."

I obeyed him, as indeed I had no wish to do otherwise; but I stole several furtive glances opposite in the course of the evening. I observed that, beautiful as the woman was, none of the men appeared to pay her much attention; that they talked to each other without intermission, although she put up her hand several times, as though to entreat their silence; that at the close of the play they left her to cloak herself, and that she followed them out of the box without being offered the arm of any one.

I guessed who she might be, but I left my husband to tell me when he thought fit. As we were driving home he said,

"I wonder Knowles likes to show himself in public with a person of that character. Of course, Marion, you do not know who she is?"

I acknowledged my ignorance.

"Poor creature!" he replied, "what she is is best not told; but she was the wife of one of the peers of the realm, and the woman most to be envied, perhaps, in England. She made one false step, and for the sake of a man who forsook her a month afterward—and there she is; very beautiful still, as you see, but devoid of all claim to our respect or courtesy. It's a dreadful thought, isn't it, little woman?"

A dreadful thought—ah! was it not? He would have clasped me to him, but I shrank back into the further end of the carriage seat, and trembled to think that in will, if not in deed, I had been as lost as the woman he spoke of. Had been—yes! Thank Heaven, I need not alter that sentence; the will had now as completely vanished as the probability of the deed.

My health now began to fail so considerably that my husband took me away to the sea-side.

Laurence thought it was the close London air; the doctor recommended tonics and a change. I knew the real reason well, and thought the only change which could heal me was death. I was beginning to love my husband; the more I was convinced of this the more wretched I felt. I could not live under the burden of deceit which my whole life was to me, but neither had I the courage to confess to Laurence that I had so wronged his trust. What, then, was left for me but to die? I was so strongly impressed with this conviction that I actually brought myself down to the doors of death. Laurence took me away to a quiet little watering-place, and had the best advice, but it was of no avail—I grew weaker and weaker.

His tenderness to me never failed; often would he entreat me to tell him if I had any thing on my mind—to be assured of his full forgiveness before I spoke—to believe that he would not fail to love me through every thing.

But still I could not speak. It was all very well for him, ignorant of the true cause of my melancholy, to entreat me to reveal it, but were I to take him at his word I was convinced that the effect would be far different to what he supposed. He could not love me with that knowledge on his mind; he would cast me out from the light of his presence forever.

And so I lay, and looked at him, and longed to disburden my soul, and yet dared not to do so, until weeks had resolved themselves into months, and I really thought that I was dying. One evening, when I felt weaker than usual, and he had been more than usually kind to me, I burst into a flood of tears, and hid my face in the sofa-cushions.

He came to me at once—my husband, whom I had learned to love so much—and took my head and laid it on his breast, and tenderly reproached me for my weakness.

"No, no! not there!" I exclaimed, tearing myself, in the pain of self-conviction, from the position he had caused me to assume; "not there, Laurence. I am not worthy!"

"Not worthy, my dear wife?" he said, gravely. "If you are not, who is?"

Then his apparent perfect trust in my goodness broke down the barriers of shame which had prevented me hitherto from telling him the truth, and I thought that, sooner than live any longer and endure the bitter reproach of his unsuspecting praises, I would be thrust forth by his hand from the roof which I had so nearly deserted.

"Stop, stop!" I exclaimed, wildly. "Laurence, hear me speak." Then I told my wretched story rapidly, and mingled with tears, but with my face still buried in the sofa-cushions. I told him all—from the first to the last. I did not rest until I had made a clean breast of it.

When I had finished (the miserable recital did not take long) I lay still, scarcely breathing, till I should hear his exclamations of horror and surprise.

I lay still, determined to accept with patience any thing his outraged feelings might choose to inflict on me. But all that issued from his lips was—

"Well, dear wife?"

I looked up timidly, and met his blue eyes gazing at me with the utmost tenderness, though there was sadness mingled with their love.

"Laurence!" I gasped, "strike me! kill me! but don't look at me like that! I have told you all, as there is a God in heaven! And now you know why I am not worthy of your love."

"And what if I knew it before, Marion?" he asked, gently.

I raised myself in my amazement, and stared at him. Yes! it was truth! I read it in his candid eyes; he had known it, and—he had loved me through it all!

I had no words wherewith to thank him, no courage to make protestations for the future; I could only kneel there sobbing, and trust to my generous-hearted Laurence to accept my tears and the clasping pressure of my hands for all that they meant.

"I knew it before I left India, dearest wife; it was the knowledge of your danger which brought me home so unexpectedly. By accident you inclosed one of your letters to Alfred Knowles in the envelope you sent to me. Once alive to the fear of losing you, I resolved at any cost to reassume the office of protector to you, which I should never have relinquished."

"It was not your fault, dearest," I murmured; "the fault has been all mine. Would the misery had been so also!"

"I deserved my share of it," he answered. "I had many doubts about letting you, so young and inexperienced, return to England alone; but the hope of speedily amassing a fortune, which you should enjoy with me, proved too strong a temptation, and for it I risked my domestic happiness. Thank God that I have only risked it!"

My heart echoed his thanksgiving.

"And now, Marion, now that it is all over, you are sure that you are mine only?" he continued, wistfully.

I looked straight into his eyes—those dear eyes which through all my deception and doubt and indifference had never altered their kind protecting gaze; and, though mine were almost too dim with tears to see, we understood each other, and were satisfied.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

FOR the next three months we shall think of little but sea-side toilettes. Colored linen, principally of the different blue tints, from indigo blue, which is almost black, to the pale myosotis blue, will be the material most in use, and for which white and écru linen and batiste have been almost wholly abandoned. Although these are still worn, it is by the few rather than the many, who have gone over from écru to blue; nevertheless, these few compose the small number who always form the advance-guard of fashion, and whose preferences must be taken into account, since they are almost sure the next season to become those of the masses.

Linen dresses appear very simple. But it is not safe to trust to appearances: these simple linen dresses cost as dear, if not dearer, than the beautiful silk toilettes of winter. The linen itself is cheap, but to it are added fine embroideries, galloons, and trimmings enough to make the expense equal. Here is a model of this style:

Dress of very light turquoise blue linen. The tablier is trimmed with perpendicular bias folds, edged on each side with a band of white nansook, scalloped and ornamented with very fine embroidery. On each of these bands is a fold of white nansook, embroidered through the middle with a light vine, and dotted on each side. The skirt is covered, the tablier excepted, with pleated flounces of the same linen; each flounce is trimmed on the bottom with a band of nansook, scalloped and embroidered like the bands used on the tablier. Each flounce has a heading edged with a narrower band, and defined by a band of white nansook, dotted on each side. The flounces are separated by a space, on which is applied a band of white nansook, embroidered and scalloped, and wider than those which edge the flounces. Casaque like the skirt, very open in front, draped high on the hips, and simply bordered with an embroidered and scalloped band, which is surmounted by three similar bands, graduated in width, the first being the widest. Sleeves rather loose at the top, and narrower toward the wrist.

Blue linen dresses of a deeper shade are considered more négligé, and are trimmed more simply; but here again expense is not wanting. They are loaded with embroidery worked with white cotton, and nothing is more costly at Paris than embroidery wrought by hand.

Next in favor to blue linen dresses are those of coutil, with écru stripes of different widths on a white ground. Dresses of white damask are little worn, except by eccentric persons, who are ready to use the same fabric for their toilette and their dinner napkins.

Pompadour percales, with figures, vines, and flowers, are used solely for polonaises, which are worn over plain linen or black silk skirts. As I have said before, the rule this season is to use figured fabrics for polonaises, and plain materials for skirts. In toilettes of two shades the polonaise must always be lighter than the skirt.

As I predicted in the beginning of the season, polonaises and over-skirts, far from being abandoned, are universally worn for street costume. Long dresses draped in a pouf, and mixed dresses with trimming simulating a polonaise or over-skirt, have gained a footing in the fashion, it is true, but without dethroning suits, and remain consecrated to full-dress occasions—dinners and soirées. A slight modification of the suit is in preparation, however, for autumn, which threatens the draperies and loopings now in fashion. This consists of a single skirt, very much trimmed (with a tablier differing from the rest of the skirt), and a long casaque, not draped, and trimmed simply with a bias fold of the material or some bright color. We have seen and worn the same dress before, some sixteen years ago.

The trimming of the front breadth in a different style from the rest of the skirt is and will long continue to be the fashion. Here are some of its varieties: First, tablier pleated or trimmed with perpendicular bias folds; back breadths trimmed with one or three flounces. Secondly, tablier edged on the bottom with a wide flounce; back breadths covered with narrow flounces. Thirdly, the preceding combination reversed—that is, the tablier covered with narrow flounces, and the back breadths edged with one wide flounce.

Large sashes, crossing the panier or arranged on one side, are more and more in vogue. These sashes are made of broad shaded ribbon, comprising all the tints of a color. Ribbons have never been more remarkable for richness and variety than now; they are in all styles—Roman, Bayadère, Egyptian, Persian, Alsacian—in a word, of every country of the globe, and one can take a lesson in geography and history only by looking through a box of ribbons.

Bonnets are still high, and generally round, even for elderly ladies, who soften the shape, which does not seem made for them, by the aid of wash strings, with several ribbon loops at the place where they join the bonnet; these strings are tied not behind, but over the ears. One of the most becoming shapes among the present bonnets, which look as though they had been invented in an insane asylum, is round and rather large; the edge is turned up, but under this edge is set a row of ribbon loops, a light wreath of flowers, or a lace ruche. Wild flowers are much worn on bonnets and coiffures; not only the classic poppy, mixed with wheat, but primroses, cowslips, wood-violets, water-lilies, sweet-brier, and brambles; choice garden and hot-house flowers are rejected as being, if not common, at least too well known. These flowers are mounted on long flexible rubber stems, and are worn in garlands and clusters, or else to cover the comb, falling behind the coiffure like a veil.

Dresses designed for the elegant reunions at the châteaux in the fall are already in preparation. It is important to study these, not only because their wearers give the key-note of the fashion, but also because these fall styles contain the winter fashions in germ. I will describe a few of these toilettes, designed to be worn in the latter part of September.

Long dress of silver gray faille. The tablier is trimmed with superb Malines lace, arranged in flat flounces, surmounted with an insertion, which is lined with bright orange ribbon. The back of the skirt has no other trimming than a very long train; it is draped in a pouf, which is confined by a bright orange sash. Half-long sleeves, finished with a deep frill of Malines lace, which veils the elbow and fore-arm. Corsage open heart-shaped in the front and back, with a plastron of Malines lace in front and behind.

Long dress of serpent blue faille entirely covered with pleated flounces of the material and gathered flounces of mauve silk gauze; these flounces alternate, one of silk and the next of gauze. The plain waist, which is open square in front, has, in the guise of basques, loops of ribbon of the same color, shorter in front than at the sides, and longer in the back than either —a kind of trimming which calls to mind the trappings of a red Indian.

Very light maize satin skirt, trimmed round the bottom with a single pleated flounce, very deep in front, and narrowing gradually toward the back. Above this flounce is a tufted border of maize feathers. Polonaise of very light maize canvas guipure, trimmed with deep white lace, surmounted by a border of feathers, which is narrower than that of the skirt. A double string of red coral and amber beads, mixed, drapes the polonaise on each side under the arms.

For the same reunions a number of polonaises of black silk grenadine embroidered with jet are also in preparation; this embroidery is in designs like the old-fashioned damask, composed of branches and flowers which overspread the whole garment without interruption. The effect is wonderfully rich and striking. These polonaises are to be worn over black lustreless silk skirts, and are edged with silk fringe, mixed with jet. Some of these dresses cost eight hundred francs merely for the embroidery, which, however, is a work of art, both for the grace of design and perfection of workmanship. Jet passementerie still retains its supremacy, and is used very largely in trimmings of all kinds.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

THE QUEEN AND THE SHAH.

THE reception of the Shah of Persia by Queen Victoria was the crowning feature in the great pageant enacted in England. It must have been a new thing for this Oriental, who had been accustomed to treat women as inferior beings, shut out from Mohammed's paradise, and relegated to a lower station here on earth, to find himself the guest of a female sovereign, and see a whole nation do homage to her as its queen. This fact must have done more to teach him the true spirit of our civilization than all the reviews and parades that have been held in his honor. It must be said to his credit that he bore the ordeal well, and greeted the Queen with as much respect as though she had been the great Solyman himself, even assuring her that he reckoned the meeting as the chief pleasure of his journey. Perchance visions flashed through his brain of Zenobia the Magnificent, and Semiramis, and Cleopatra, and the Queen of Sheba herself; for Eastern women have sometimes risen to the heights of power. Be this as it may, we are glad that the Shah found a woman on the throne of Great Britain, and was forced in one instance to yield that respect to the sex in which rumor says that he has too often been wanting. The Queen received him at Windsor Castle, the principal residence of the sovereigns of Great Britain.

Stand with Work-Basket, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS stand, with work-basket, is of gilt wood bars, and is thirty-five inches and a quarter high, including the basket, and twenty-one inches and three-quarters wide. The basket is thirty-seven inches and three-quarters in circumference. The bottom of the stand is furnished with a small basket, which is joined with the larger basket by chains of gilt wood rings, as shown by the illustration. The baskets are lined on the inside with brown faille, and are trimmed on the outside with embroidered borders. On the inside of the large basket, on the sides, are set pockets for holding the sewing utensils. The stand is ornamented, besides, with cords and tassels. First line the large basket; then cut for each side of card-board one piece each from Figs. 51 and 52, Supplement. Cover these parts smoothly on both sides with faille. Set the rosette on Fig. 51, and fasten the card-board covered with faille in the basket, taking care that the rosette comes on the opening in the side. Run faille through the bars of the basket as shown by the illustration, and fasten the borders on the large basket. Fig. 2 shows a full-sized section of the border. Each border is worked on a foundation of light gray faille in application, satin, and half-polka stitch embroidery. For the dark strips on the sides of the border apply dark gray silk braid, which is ornamented with light and dark gray silk in half-polka stitch and point Russe. For the wound ribbon on the middle of the border baste on light and dark gray silk braid, and button-hole stitch it on the foundation with light gray saddler's silk In working the button-hole stitches always form a picot at the corresponding points. The leaves, flowers, and stems are worked with saddler's silk in the natural colors of the flowers and leaves in diagonal and dove-tailed satin stitch and in half-polka stitch. Finally, trim the stand with cord and tassels as shown by the illustration.

SEALS AND SIGNETS.

IN a figurative sense, the heraldic shield or field represents the ancient firmament, and the charges the houses or mansions in which resided the powers, potentates, and dominions which guided the constellations. They were of greater or less dignity—or, argent, gules, azure, sable, vert, purpure, sanguine, tenne. It is not a little singular that these represent the sun, moon, and the seven planets known to the ancient Magi. This subject is too recondite to be here further pursued. We will, therefore, take a brief but general glance at the mottoes of the armorial bearings of the English nobility now surviving on their arms, the representatives of ancient seals and signets. The mottoes are more or less expressive of qualities or purposes, which may, by a figure of speech, be called characteristics of the family whose coat of arms they accompany as a general illustration of the emblazonry. This view, however, more particularly applies to the original or primitive shield, for the various quarterings through the intermarriage of families have complicated the symbolical figures so that the harmony between the marshaling and the motto is in a considerable degree destroyed. It is no less a fact that present owners of coats of arms and mottoes do not necessarily inherit those virtues for the possession of which the original grant was made, and not unfrequently the character is more discordant with the motto than the motto is with the symbols on the shield. No doubt there are some, possibly many, whose mottoes indicate the character of those who own them, being full of significance, embodying principles at once simple and important, while others express concentrated knowledge, purpose, and experience. Let us glance at a few mottoes by way of illustrating the general object of this article.

The Marquis of Abercorn's is "Sola nobilitas virtus." This does not recognize that social—which may with propriety be called conventional—nobility which in these days is accepted as the genuine article, and obtained by that fortunate conjunction of circumstances called birth.

The Marquis of Aylesbury's motto, "Fuimus" ("We have been"), may be viewed as expressing regret or triumph; hence its influence on the mind of the owner of it may inspire melancholy or inglorious ease—scarcely mirthfulness or noble aspirations.

The Earl of Albemarle's motto inculcates a high moral lesson, "Ne cede malis" ("Do not yield to misfortune"), while Earl Annesley's, "Virtutis amore" ("From the love of virtue"), breathes the true spirit of life and the correct principle of human action. The "Always ready" ("Toujours prêt") of Earl Antrim indicates the high civil, social, and patriotic qualities which conspire to make a practical man. Baron Bagton's "Antiquum obtinens" ("Possessing antiquity"), irrespective of other considerations, has but small merit as a signet motto. Viscount Bangor's "Sub cruce salus" ("Salvation beneath the Cross") sufficiently tells its import and its age. Many mottoes of a pious character, of which this may be taken as a fair specimen, are borne by the English nobility and gentry.

The Duke of Bedford's motto may be either pithy or petulant, "Che sarà sarà" ("What will be, will be"). It is an old saw worthy the wisdom of a washerwoman or a wiseacre; while that of Earl Berkeley, "Dieu avec nous" ("God with us"), has all the vanity of its French original, united to the presumption of English sectarianism. "Amo" ("I love"), the motto of the Duke of Buccleuch, is so absolute and yet so indefinite that it may be, by the addition of a substantive (and it has no meaning without one), either good, bad, or indifferent—heavenly, earthly, sensual, or devilish.

That of Earl Carnwath is downright vernacular and nobly heroical—"I dare"—breathing the spirit of chivalry, and smacking of the "tented field;" while "Watch and pray" ("Vigilate et orate") of Baron Castlemain is monkish or puritanical. Earl Castlestuart's motto commands in good English "Forward"—ringing with the metal and mettle which win victories on all the battle-fields of life; and "Semper paratus" ("Always ready") on the banner of Baron Clifford nobly supports the same "sentiment" or command.

There is something philosophically smart and inspiring in the motto of Baron Cranworth, "Post nubila Phœbus" ("After clouds, sunshine"); and not less so the "In omnia paratus" ("Prepared for all things") of Baron Dunalley. The vernacular "Strike," of Baron Hawke, is strikingly in harmony with the name of the thing originally signified; and "Now or never" ("Nunc aut nunquam") of Earl Kilmorey inspires a kindred sentiment of heroism.

Some mottoes are mystical for a purpose, as was that of Earl Kintore, "Quæ amissa salva" ("What was lost is safe")—referring to the regalia of Scotland preserved by the first Earl of Kintore. Baron Langford's "Bear and forbear" is eminently philosophical and pregnant with great practical wisdom; while the Marquis of Tweeddale's "Spare naught" inculcates the very opposite qualities. Equally demonstrative and characteristic is the motto of Baron Westbury, "Ithel" ("Pride"), the Welsh name of the family, a quality not particularly amiable.

Such are some of the most striking mottoes of the English peerage, which they bear on their arms as family distinctions.

The mottoes of the baronets and gentry of England are of course in principle the same as those of the peers and royal family, but there appears to be a greater tendency to the Cæsarian famous dispatch, "Veni, vidi, vici." The following, freely taken from Debrett, will illustrate the fact: "Loyalty," "Devotion," "Activity," "Ready," "Actively," "Innocent and True," "Hallelujah," "Liberty," "Country," "Unity," "Persevere," "Think," "Forward," "Forget Not," "Take Care," "Firm," "Watch."

"I fly high" is the acme of conceitedness, and "Never give in" is a good motto for a fighting family like that of Sir John Lawrence of Indian renown, who bears it; but of far more worth is the truth inculcated by the motto of the Clifford family, "Virtus mille scuta" ("Virtue is equal to a thousand shields").

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DAISY.—Read about white muslin dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 29, Vol. VI. You will want a trained skirt with trained petticoats beneath, and for trimming select Valenciennes lace and insertion, or else embroidered flounces. Wear a white watered sash.

JOHNTIE.—Your silver gray pongee should be trimmed with black velvet. All lace except the worsted yak lace is unsuitable for it. A basque and simple over-skirt are about all you can make of your court train. Pipe the basque with velvet on the edge, and have a velvet vest and cuffs. Place velvet pockets and lengthwise bands down the front breadths, and confine the over-skirt to the back.

F. I. E.—It is immaterial whether the bride's parent or the bridegroom furnishes the wedding-cards. Stationers' statistics show that it is no longer incumbent on the father to pay for them, and that in cases where there is wealth on both sides the bridegroom often pays this bill.

E. H. W.—The Dolman and polonaise mentioned are separate garments. We have no patterns of that especial suit, but can furnish you similar patterns of a loose blouse-polonaise and a Dolman sacque. They will cost 25 cents each.

TEDDY AND LADY ANNA.—Bread-crumbs and milk rubbed on with a sponge will cleanse soiled kid gloves. If this does not remove stains, use fresh benzine.

LIBBIE.—The bride's family and her attendants kiss her and offer congratulations as soon as the ceremony is concluded in home weddings, but not till they have returned home after church ceremonies. Wedding presents are sent before the wedding. Girls of sixteen part their hair in the middle, and wave the front slightly and braid the back. Their dresses should be long enough to conceal their ankles.

LITTLE BOY.—The Gabrielle pattern we furnish is suitable for both boys and girls from six months to four years of age. After these you should get the Highland kilt suits for a boy of three. They are made of piqué, linen, and light summer cloths.

LA MODE.—The Ortolan, which you have frequently seen illustrated in our columns, is a graceful and elegant garment, and particularly well suited for the seaside and watering-places. You can readily obtain it at any leading dry-goods store.

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.—We can not publish rejoinders to articles that appear in our columns. Moreover, a large experience with servants convinces us that we are correct, and that the examples you quote are the exception rather than the rule.

IRA.—We should have said, in answer to your question, that Munson's Complete Phonographer is published by Harper & Brothers, who will send it, post paid, by mail, on receipt of $2. This is a standard work on phonography, and is acknowledged by competent judges to be the best extant.

MRS. E. M.—Sashes are still worn, especially with thin summer dresses. They should be long, wide, with fringed ends, and, instead of a bow directly behind, tied in loose hanging loops with irregular ends on the left side.

JANE R.—If you have fraises of the dress material to all your dresses, you will only require a brooch or cravat bow in front.

MRS. ELLEN S.—Lace sacques are very fashionable this summer, especially those made of guipure. You will find them described at length in back numbers of the Bazar. Lace shawls are draped to form short mantles.

H. G. S.—The straw hats chosen by gentlemen have high crowns with narrow rolling brims. Blue, gray, and purple ribbon bands and wide bindings are used quite as much as are black ones; indeed, colored ribbons are preferred by young gentlemen. Striped and dotted neck-ties of light and very dark colors are in more favor this season than usual. We gave full descriptions of gentlemen's clothes in a late number of the Bazar.

BETSEY BAKER.—Banting's tract on corpulency will tell you how to reduce that disease. Description of the sulphur vapor bath will be given in one of the "Ugly Girl" papers.

WESTERN GIRL.—See reply to "Betsey Baker" above.

MRS. S. A.—Instruction in telegraphy is furnished free at Cooper Institute, in this city. The applicant must write a fair hand, spell and reckon correctly. The next term opens in September. It usually takes from three to six months to learn, with great diligence, though smart pupils have learned the art in two months. Salaries for beginners are from $500 to $600 a year, and the operator remains in the office till nine P.M. The only expense in learning will be the board. Station telegraphers sometimes take beginners into the office and teach them gratuitously for the help they can afterward give, and you had better apply to the nearest ones.

DESDEMONA.—Can give no opinion of white glycerine. It probably has some mineral white in it.

BOSTONIA.—A sulphur vapor bath can not be taken for the face only, because of two reasons. First, no application or treatment of the face only will improve the complexion while the rest of the body is not in the best condition; and secondly, if this were otherwise, the sulphur vapor would strangle one. The greatest care is always taken in giving this bath to prevent the vapor from reaching the face, or from being breathed. It can not be taken with safety in private bath-rooms.

MOTHER GOOSE.—Letter received too late for answer. The nose machine is a London invention—the cost of importing it is about $12. The thimbles are a private invention, and can be procured here. There was no stamp inclosed with your letter.

ADONIS.—Operations to reduce the cartilage of the nose have been successful. A skillful surgeon would be the proper person to consult.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

THE PEOPLE'S FRIEND.—It is susceptible of easy proof that the Sewing-Machine has been a greater blessing to the American people than any invention of the present century. Nothing else has done so much to save the lives and health of the wives and mothers, and the patient overworked women of the land who, as a class, most needed relief from the burdens of every-day life. Every father and husband fails in his duty if he neglects to endow his house with such a triumph of science as the Wilson Underfeed Sewing-Machine. It is the cheapest and best Sewing-Machine ever offered. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.
The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

I.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

It is the very poetry of sylvan experience, sung by a tuneful master. Its minute description of forest "interiors," where broad lakes spread themselves among forest-covered hills, offering irresistible fascinations to sportsmen and to town-wearied workers by the abundance of their finny occupants, and the cool sequestered advantages of their location, are marked by a dreamy warmth which fascinates and never wearies. A better book to take into the country to beguile the long afternoons of the summer holiday could not be desired.—Brooklyn Union.

II.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

"The New Magdalen" is equal to Mr. Collins's reputation. It is as remarkable in plot as any of the great novels which preceded it, and there is the same old skill in the delineation of character as before. Grace Roseberry is a more remarkable heroine even than the "Woman in White."—N. Y. Herald.

III.

ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

The public relations of the author of this volume have brought him into intimate contact with many of the most eminent American politicians. He has collected some of his reminiscences during a long career, forming a series of anecdotes of more or less interest, and related in an unpretending, good-natured, free-and-easy manner, which can not fail to be attractive to the lovers of desultory reading.—N. Y. Tribune.

IV.

KENELM CHILLINGLY: His Adventures and Opinions. A Novel. By E. L. BULWER (Lord Lytton), Author of "Pelham," "Last of the Barons," "The Caxtons," &c. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Reading "Kenelm Chillingly" is keeping good company. It is comprehending fully the "noblesse oblige." It is something of what Thackeray, in one of his letters to Mr. Reed, said of the Alps: "How beautiful it is! How pleasant! How great and affable the landscape is! It is delightful to be in the midst of such scenes—the ideas get generous reflections from them. It is keeping good company. It is keeping away mean thoughts." You who want to breathe a refining atmosphere, read "Kenelm Chillingly."—World, N. Y.

V.

FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated. Square 8vo, Cloth, Beveled and Illuminated, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

Has a breezy country air about it that is very attractive.—Examiner, London.

There is in his poetry a fidelity to nature that deserves the highest praise. He does not describe to us his dramatis personæ, but he places them before us, and they tell their own story. In addition to the forcible realism of these poems, they are characterized by a pathos so simple in its elements as to be sure of universal sympathy, and a humor that is always kindly. There is good, honest, genuine work in his "Farm Ballads," and quite enough merit to entitle their author to rank among the poets. —N. Y. Times.

VI.

OLD KENSINGTON. A Novel. By Miss THACKERAY, Author of "The Village on the Cliff," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

One of the best romances known to alter English literature.—N. Y. Times.

"Old Kensington" marks a distinct improvement in Miss Thackeray's work. * * * Full of touches of art.—Athenæum, London.

"Old Kensington" has a witching power.—Boston Traveller.

VII.

"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting story, effectively told, exhibiting all the best features of the author's style, and but few of its faults. The plot is very dramatic and is well sustained and developed, the interest being kept up and the denouement held beyond conjecture to the end. It will prove a favorite with the admirers of this lady's works.—Boston Daily Globe.

VIII.

THE FISHING TOURIST: Angler's Guide and Reference Book. By CHARLES HALLOCK, Secretary of the "Blooming-Grove Park Association." Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Mr. Charles Hallock is one of the few gentlemen who write a book mainly for the reason that they have something to write about—have something to tell the public which the public desires to know. The title is not a misnomer. The shortest routes to pleasure are laid down, and correct information is given as to the best means of conveyance, the expense of the trip, the secrets of the commissariat, etc. The author has avoided the use of technical terms, and thus made his volume all the more acceptable to the majority of readers.—Turf, Field, and Farm, N. Y.

IX.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN. An Historical Romance. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Miss Harriet Martineau's admirable historical romance, "The Hour and the Man," achieved a great popularity when it first appeared, years ago. It is a powerfully written work, having for its subject the revolution in St. Domingo, in which that extraordinary character, Toussaint L'Ouverture, played an important part. In all its parts, it is distinguished by wonderful power and vigor, both of imagination and execution. —Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

X.

LONDON'S HEART. A Novel. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Grif," "Joshua Marvel," "Blade-o'-Grass," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

It is both able and earnest, and is in all respects wholesome. Its moral is unexceptional, and in its noble aim to draw attention and sympathy toward the sorrows of the helpless and neglected it merits the highest praise. It is Mr. Farjeon's most ambitious work, and is in many respects his best.—Boston Daily Globe.

XI.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Caleb Cushing's new book will do one good service to the country in increasing the number of people who, on this side of the water, accurately understand and thoroughly appreciate the great work performed by the Geneva Arbitration. As a defense of the arbitrators who rightly comprehend the unsurpassed dignity of their position it is a masterly production. The abundant learning of the author of this memorable production shows to excellent advantage in its sharp and clearly defined reasoning and statements. —Boston Transcript.

XII.

TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE. By the Rev. FREDERICK ARNOLD, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The author, in his effort to exhibit the turning-points in the different stages or phases of life, and their importance in influencing the character and the fortunes of men, keeps always in view that it is effort more than accident that controls these, and shows how a proper conduct of life may in many cases lead up to them, and thus man may become in a large degree the arbiter of his own destiny. The moral effect of the book on the young is excellent from this point of view, and it will possess elements of interest, as well as of counsel and instruction, to a large class of readers.—Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

MORAL SONG ON MONEY.

Money is not happiness;
Wealth may coexist with gout;
Buys the physic, ne'ertheless,
Which you can't be cured without.

Money is not mutton—no;
Money is not beer or wine;
But to lack it is to owe
Grievous bills, or not to dine.

Money occupies the purse;
Happiness is in the mind;
Else its state is the reverse—
Woe with indigence combined.

Happiness you purchase through
Money that you wisely spend.
Money is the means unto Happiness, and that's the end.

Who can keep a conscience clear,
Who can have a mind at rest,
That of ruin lives with fear
Ever gnawing at his breast?

Others' happiness your own
Would you render if you could?
'Tis by money's aid alone
You can do your Species good.

Happiness he may, below,
Find, with money who abounds;
None else can until they go
To the Happy Hunting-grounds.

Money when a man decries,
Ten to one his bond is due,
And that presently he tries
Out of cash to swindle you.

On dit the Shah has been asked to stay a week longer than he at first proposed, but he says he Shahn't.

Let us hope that the weather the Shah experienced on his arrival in London will not continue, otherwise, instead of "Queen's weather," the saying it is "Shahery" weather may become proverbial. Had the "August" monarch not come so early as "June," he might have had a "warmer" reception; anyhow, we trust the Shah's visit may prove a happy one—weather or no.

A Danbury man, who bought a new pair of boots on Saturday, says a ship may stand on one tack all night if it wants to, but he finds an hour and a half to be an elegant sufficiency.

MAUVE ON!

Some one with a poor eye for color has described the Shah's favorite white horse with the mauve-tinted tail as "the pink of perfection."

Some young men are a little partial to blue-eyed maidens; others like dark-eyed lasses; but the money-eyed girls have the most admirers.

WHAT REPUBLICANS SHOULD SHUN—Empir-icism.

An amusing story of Messier, the great French comet seeker, is related by Mr. R. A. Proctor. The discovery of a new comet seemed to him more important than the gravest earthly events. His wife's last illness interfered with his astronomical work to such an extent that a rival succeeded in detecting a comet for which both were on the watch. A friend who met him a short time after Madame Messier's death condoled with him on that sad loss. "Ah," responded the man of science, "it was hard—was it not?—that after all my watching I was obliged to leave my telescope just when the comet came!"

A leading London professor of the Terpsichorean art received the following letter: "Sir,—Being anxious to learn dancing, I write to know how long you would think I would take to become proficient. You will also kindly state your terms, and let me know if it would not be possible to instruct me by letter, as I should not like to leave Nottingham, for if I learn, it will be simply for the sake of a young lady residing here. Hoping to receive an early answer, believe me, etc."

COURTEOUS VERDICTS.—A coroner's jury, impaneled to ascertain the cause of the death of a notorious drunkard, brought in a verdict of "Death by hanging—around a rum shop." In California a coroner's jury, under similar circumstances, rendered a more courteous verdict: "Accidental death while unpacking a glass."

A young lady on the third tier of the opera proposed this riddle to a married gentleman while he was looking up admiringly at her from the stalls: "Why is a hen-pecked husband like an opera-hat?" He said, "As you are apparently so much more elevated than I am, I give it up." She replied, "Because he's very big when he's out, but immediately shuts up when he gets home." He responded by the following: "We are told that there is nothing made in vain. But how about a pretty young girl? Isn't she maiden vain?"

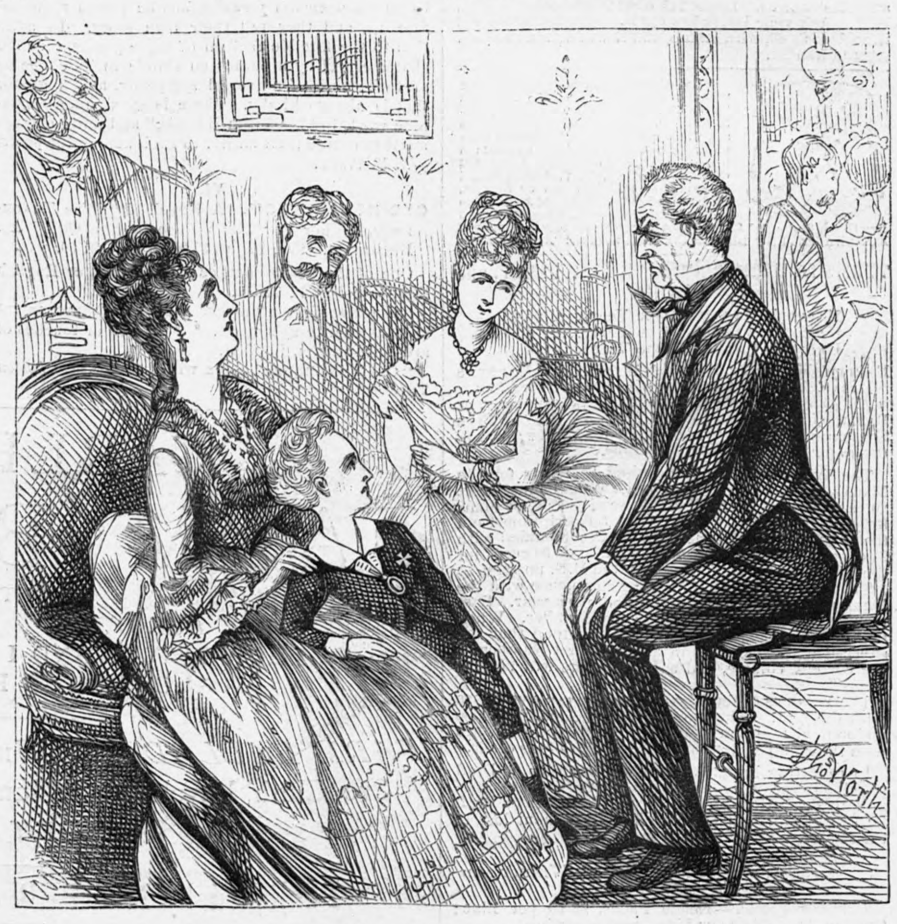
"What do I think of London, ask ye?" said an old Stirling worthy, on being asked his opinion of the great metropolis. "What do I think o't? It's just a lump of good ground spoiled with stane and lime."

A colored man entered the office of the clerk of the court, and advancing to where the deputy was busily engaged, he produced a marriage-license, for which he had paid the legal fee a few days before. "Boss," said he, poking the license under the nose of the absorbed deputy. "What is it?" was the impatient response. "Boss," continued the darky, "de lady declines dis document, and I fotch it in to get my money back." It was consoling to the darky to be told that some men went further and fared worse, but when assured his money could not be returned, he turned indignantly on his double-soled pumps and muttered, as he made his exit, "Ebery body's gone back on de document."

This story comes from Maine. A man in Portland married a widow. She had a fashion, which is too common among ladies who have buried a man, of giving him glowing accounts of the angelic virtues of the dear departed. As a prohibition law is in force in Maine, he could not drown his sorrows in liquor, so he nerved his soul to take a terrible revenge. One night when his wife was sleeping soundly, perhaps dreaming of the "first" victim of her charms, he arose from his bed, took a sledge-hammer, and deliberately raising it to his shoulders, he marched to the grave-yard, and smashed the tombstone of his dead rival into little bits. Now, when his wife says any thing about the virtues of the dead man, he replies, "It may be all very true, old gal; but he can't smash my tombstone. There's where I'm ahead."

HUSBAND. "Isn't it a little rough on me, my dear, to keep your First Husband's picture so conspicuously before folks?"

WIFE. "Now, George, that's unkind! In case any thing should happen, wouldn't I be only too Glad to put yours beside his?"



PRECOCIOUS NUISANCE. "Uncle, do you know of what Great Event in history this is the anniversary?"

UNCLE. "Yes; a little boy was Spanked and put to Bed for boring people at an evening party with Historical Questions."

TWILIGHT.

WHEN through the paling sunset tints
The evening-star swings clear and white,
I listen o'er the hills for her
Who brings to me my one delight.
Down the far western slopes she comes,
All slow and nun-like, draped in gray;
Her thoughtful brow, her steadfast eyes,
Press back the crowding cares of day.

More calm than hopeless winter's clouds;
More sad than autumn's gray gold haze;
But full of strength as angels' eyes,
She rolls the stone from buried days.
She lays her fingers on mine eyes,
And breathes her magic in mine ear,
And then I see, or seem to see—
And know not if I dream or hear.

But all the dear lost shadows pass:
Their eyes reproach me that I stay;
Like dying winds at fall of night,
Their voices win my soul away.
The sunshine of the fair dead days
Gleams faintly through their misty hair,
And the pale, awful smile of death
Replaces that they loved to wear.

The scents, the hues, of vanished springs,
The sun-bright blooms of summer-time,
And autumn's fullness live again,
And sparkles hoar December's rime.
The fields wave greenly down the slope,
And children chase the lambs at play,
And, shouting, count the daisy cups
Among the shining ricks of hay.

And eyes of love light all the earth,
Like some intensest glance of God,
And youth and faith, and hope and truth,
And all the pleasant ways we trod.
They live! they live! One little hour
Renews the joys of perished years:
The wordless, slow processions pass,
And leave me to my silent tears.

Pleated-waist Walking Suit.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS pretty suit is the most comfortable morning or négligé dress that can be worn for the heats of summer. It comprises a three-pleat blouse-waist, an apron-front over-skirt, draped gracefully in a pouf behind, and a walking skirt, just clearing the ground. In the original the blouse-waist is of white linen with blue polka dots, and the over-skirt and skirt of dark blue linen, trimmed with folds and flounces of the material, arranged in a tablier in front. The suit may, of course, be made of any material, and trimmed to suit the taste. The pattern of the blouse-waist is also well suited to thicker material—silk, cloth, or flannel—for the fall and winter.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three garments—three-pleat waist, over-skirt, and walking skirt.

THREE-PLEAT WAIST.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, sleeve, and cuff. The perforations show where to baste the seams and to lay the pleats; those in the top of the sleeve show the size and form of the under part. The notches show how to put the pattern together. Cut the front with the longest straight edge laid on the edge of the goods. Cut the back, sleeve, and cuff with the longest straight edge of each laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Bring the two lines of perforations nearest the middle of the back evenly together on the under side, and join in a seam as far as the holes extend; this will form a box-pleat, which must be tacked at the waist line. Lay another pleat on each side of this in the same manner. Turn the edge of the front under at the top and bottom, and form a box-pleat on the outside. Lay a box-pleat on each side of this in the same way as those formed in the back. The sleeves are sewed in the armhole plain, and the bottom is joined with a slight fullness to the cuff. A pleated upright ruffle trims the neck. Close the front with buttons and button-holes. Put the pattern together by the notches. Baste the seams according to the perforations. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the shoulder and under-arm seams, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, a yard wide, 3 yards.

OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, side gore, straight breadth, and back breadth. Cut the front with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid a seam. Lay two side pleats, turning upward, in the front edge of the side breadth according to the notches near the top. Put the pattern together by the remaining notches. Lay three pleats, turning upward, in the middle of the side gore according to the holes, placing the first three holes from the lower edge evenly together, forming the first pleat. Cut two tapes eight inches long, tack one end of each about one inch on each side of the middle of the back on the belt, and the other end at the single hole on the middle of the back breadth. Sew a small fancy button at the single hole near the top of the side breadth, and a small loop at the single hole near the front edge of the same breadth. Tapes tacked to the second side seam should be tied behind on the tournure for draping. The skirt is trimmed around the bottom with a ruffle of the material four inches deep, laid in very small side pleats. The skirt is joined with gathers at the back, and plain on the side gore and front, to a belt of the material.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 5½ yards.
Extra for ruffle, 2 yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.
Extra for trimming, 5½ yards.

AN OCCASION FOR SILENCE.

AT this happy season of the year, when so many newly made wives are off on the pleasuring of their honey-moon and bridal tour, most of us who meet the fair brides would suppose that the dignity of wifehood was something that needed no amplification. For these young queens who have just come into their kingdom carry themselves as young queens should, insist on their prerogative, and feel that they have taken their proper place in the world which was little less than made for them.

Sometimes the spectators are those who stand on one side and admire or criticise indifferently the pageant of the day as it passes by, sometimes they are sympathizers, sometimes enviers, and sometimes they are other wives—other but less happy wives, who have been through the bright play, and have come out on the dark and lonely side, and who look on sadly and scornfully while these young creatures move before them, their thoughts and inner lives as plainly to be read by them as revelers who disport themselves in lighted rooms are to be seen by those standing in the night outside.

It is this class of spectators who smile grimly at the new dignity of the young wives, who disdain it and satirize it, and who, by being able to satirize it, betray themselves, since—if they will pardon us for saying so—they owe some portion of their own misfortunes to the fact that they never did appreciate the dignity of wifehood even in themselves, and that all their lives have failed to teach them the use of a proper silence—silence, that crucible in which so many strong and precious things dissolve and coalesce.

They entered upon marriage themselves, these disdainful wives, probably with but small reflection concerning the responsibilities they assumed, the duties they undertook; aware of little at the time but their affection for their young husbands; accepting without a thought the old unspoken idea that they are the ciphers and their husbands the integers in the social arithmetic; yielding every moot-point through love in the beginning, till presently it was demanded through custom. They felt it then a nice thing to be married; to have the new title and the new name; to be able to wear the things forbidden to young maidens, such as point lace and satins and diamonds, if within their reach; to be handed out to dinner before their unmarried companions; to have a trousseau, and live in an atmosphere of new gowns and bonnets; to go on a journey, stay in a hotel, and see the world; to be mistress of a house, and receive a social consideration impossible before. They danced into church and out of church, and off on their wedding-tours, with hardly a more serious sentiment; they made their responses before the altar while pondering whether their trains were swept out to the full length or curled round their feet, and if it would be death to all effect should they look to see. "Did I love Charles?" said one of them, recounting the scene. "Of course I did, or else what was I there for? But what a ridiculous question it seemed when I was trying to remember whether Lucy had put my curling-tongs into the dressing-bag!"

How much idea of the dignity of a wife belongs to the person who in such a spirit has the dignity conferred upon her? How fully can she realize the great part she is called upon to fill when she thinks of nothing but pleasure, appearances, and vanity? The guardian of her husband's happiness, the keeper of the honor of a race, the probable mother of a line of men and women, she disagrees about the hour for breakfast, quarrels concerning the frequenters of the house, sulks for the sake of a new bonnet, bickers over this trifle and the other, makes home a place of discomfort, and then goes about with a whine, as if it was all of it his disgrace and none of it hers that her husband has ceased to love her.

Perhaps it is in certain instances his disgrace as much as hers, perhaps even more. Indeed, by some miracle of nature or grace, she may not be in fault at all, and he may prove, without blame due her, a fickle and neglectful or a brutal man. But, be she innocent as Eve, she is the last person to proclaim the trouble, even by so much as that disdainful smile when the new and untried wife goes gayly by. It argues little for her discernment that she chose such a poor husband originally. And, in reality, it is extremely unlikely, it is one case in a thousand, that she is altogether faultless in the difficulties; unlikely that she studied her husband's temperament and possibilities as faithfully as she might; unlikely that she has herself resisted all temptation; unlikely that she has in every thing sought her husband's happiness before her own; unlikely that she has done her whole duty, regardless of whether he has done his or not.

Not that we at all argue for any thing like an abject submission or slavery on the wife's part. We merely insist upon the truth, and the application of the truth, that love seeketh not its own; and since there is one way usually to preserve a husband's love—namely, by the preservation of his happiness—if, then, a wife either deliberately or thoughtlessly separates her own happiness from her husband's, prefers her own gratification to his—prefers, in fact, her own pleasure to her husband's love—she then has no more right to complain that she receives exactly what she has bargained for than she would have a right to complain that her addition of two and two did not make five.

It is true that husbands are not always perfect—are often far from perfect. We confess to doubts of their full performance of duty. We think they are a great deal too apt to regard their wives as so much of their property; to insist that they shall be happy only in their (the husbands') way; to be stingy and selfish and tyrannical. We know that the world is full of martyrs without the palm. But that is neither here nor there in the question of the wife's perfectness; and we would have her, not only for her own sake, but for the sake of all future women, acquit herself of every prescribed obligation though the heavens fall.

> "What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance be > Than make his foe more worthy far than he?"

said some one deserving of attention; and if she desires vengeance, she never can take it in a nobler way. And she can not acquit herself of her obligations if she makes her world ring with the tale of her troubles. In fact, we know of but few more weak and contemptible objects than the woman who goes about whining over the miseries of an uncongenial marriage, and setting her husband's faults in array before her acquaintances—before her acquaintances, for her friends will try to hush her. If she is childless, the course is humiliating and useless; it does her no good, but, on the contrary, harm; for the spoken word must be supported by the open deed, lest witnesses should condemn her poor spirit. The gap is twice as wide as when she held her wrongs in her own bosom. When she broke her silence she burned her bridge behind her; her listener became a barrier she could never cross in return; for a terrible mischief is done by the third party thus brought into the action. But if she is not childless, if there are those that bear her name and his, then she is twice as culpable in her complaints, for she spreads the disgrace of her children upon the winds; and she reaches the superlative degree of folly and of viciousness when to her children she dilates upon their father's wrong-doing. If they have eyes, they can see it for themselves; and they will honor her with a double honor for the speechless endurance that crowns her with an aureole in their affection and remembrance. Let her husband be ever so wrong in his treatment of herself, she has no right to make it harder for the children to yield him reverence; she has no right to rob him of his children's love. Let him rob himself, she need not be a party to the crime. Silence, then, we affirm, is something to be maintained by the wife who values the dignity of her estate—silence as to her happiness, silence as to her woes. That she can never regret; but the opposite thing is like a two-edged weapon, that may cut the hand which wields it. The flower which with the ancients was the symbol of Love was also the symbol of Silence. And so in this age of too free unbosoming let all wives take to heart and remember the old poet's invocation to this same silence:

> "Thou that art
> Flood-gate of the deeper heart,
> Offspring of a heavenly kind,
> Frost o' the mouth and thaw o' the mind,
> Secrecy's confidant, and he
> Who makes religion mystery....
> With thy enthusiasms come,
> Seize our tongues and strike us dumb!"

SLEEP: AN EXHORTATION THEREUNTO.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE one requisite to good health, good looks, sweet temper, prosperity in business, and general success in life, is sleep. I do not know whether we shall be able, as MATTHEW ARNOLD says, to "hit it off happily" with SOLOMON. It is, perhaps, not quite easy to tell exactly what he had in his mind; but if he meant that people should try to cut down their sleep to the smallest possible allowance, it may be superfluous, but it is certainly irresistible, to remark that I do not agree with him. But he probably did not mean that. He certainly would not be likely to differ from me.

The necessity of sleep, it may be admitted, is a disagreeable necessity. To turn aside from all the pleasures of life, from the sweet consciousness of existence, to give over thought and love and memory and hope—all plans and pursuits—and go down into forgetfulness or unconsciousness, is, or seems to be, an unspeakable loss. It is a death, temporary, but imperious and ever-recurring. Yet it is so universal, so gradual, so natural, that we yield to it not only without dread, but with delight. In the silent splendor of star-lit nights, which seem to put us on a brotherly footing with the whole universe, in the blackness of nights that know no star, when we seem to be standing alone in the solitude of eternity, life is too fascinating, and we begrudge a moment lost; but even then, without will, against will, the heavy eyelids droop, and, all unhindered, the sly soul slips away into some remote recess of the brain to lie in ambush for the rising dawn and the strong new world.

If we could have been made to get along without sleep, I should like it better, but since sleep we must, why should we quarrel with fate? Our ancestors, stanch men in many regards, have yet done the world harm by their indiscriminate abuse of sleep. One would think, to read some books, that slumber was an invention of the Evil One, to be repressed and snubbed continually. On the contrary, sleep comes nearer being a panacea than any pill or potion ever concocted. We do, indeed, yield to the truth of history so far as to tell children of beauty-sleep, and bid them go to bed early; but we forget all about it in the morning, and stimulate them to early rising. Indeed, ignorance and folly sometimes go so far as to awaken children for the purpose of getting them up, which is just not murder in the first degree. Lay it down as the rule of family life that nobody is to be waked by external means. There may be extraordinary circumstances which justify a violation of the rule. If the house is on fire, and hand and steam engines fail to extinguish the flames, sleepers must be aroused; but even then begin with those nearest the fire, and bestir others only as the danger advances. I suppose it is absolutely certain that when a man has slept long enough he will wake of his own accord.

The time at which sleep is taken is of less account than the amount of sleep. If it can be had in darkness, doubtless that is best; but sleep by daylight is a good thing too. Some people take credit to themselves for accomplishing much before breakfast, but after breakfast you are constantly finding them napping on the sofa or nodding in the lounging-chair. What superior virtue is there in sleeping by installment to sleeping in the lump? Some people are called lazy because they take a nap after a noonday dinner; but the efficiency of their waking hours is a sufficient justification for their mid-day repose. Sleep any where and every where is good. Ministers complain if here and there a member of their congregation grows drowsy; but as I look around and see the hard-working men and women, all clean and fresh and smooth in their Sunday suits, sheltered from sun, released from toil, and soothed by the pleasant voice of a well-beloved pastor into a slightly unsteady but richly earned repose, I bless them unaware. Not the least of the many benefits wrought us by the clergy is the sweet somnolence which so gently and benignly broods over a weary and happy congregation on a sultry Sunday afternoon. Fore-ordination and free-will may be hard to reconcile; moral and natural responsibility may be difficult of discrimination; the bearing of election on duty is not easy to see; but no man can go into an airy, pleasant church, sit down in peace among his friends and neighbors, and fall softly asleep to the sound of holy words from holy lips, without great gain to the life that now is, and, I believe and trust, with no loss to that which is to come.

As for NAPOLEON and the others who are brandished over us as having wrought their great deeds on four hours' sleep, in the first place I do not believe a word of it, and in the second place, if they did, it was but an exception; and we might just as well put our eyes out because HOMER wrote the Iliad without any, as to rub open our eyes at four o'clock in the morning because NAPOLEON slept four hours in his saddle. One man's need is no rule for another man's life. There is but one infallible rule for the sleepers, that every one sleeps till he wakes of himself; and for the awake, that they shut the doors softly, so as not to disturb those who are asleep. This is the whole duty of man.

If one should desire a few little secondary rules, it might be well to warn him against self-glorification. Neither rising early availeth any thing, nor rising late. The wise man who used to rise with the sun or before it in our copy-books may have been foolish in so doing, but must have been foolish if he based his wisdom on his early rising. The question is, what does he do after he is up? The early bird has been catching the worm for many generations, but I never heard that the late bird starved for lack of worms; and what of the owl and the bat, who do not get up at all till honest folks are in bed?

Ah, no! SOLOMON'S sluggard was doubtless a worthless fellow, who slept as lazily as he wrought, and did every thing by halves. When a sound soul craves a little more sleep, a little more slumber, it is a sign that he needs it, and his first duty is to take it. Nature knows when there has been sleep enough, and makes us aware by the clear brain and the steady nerve and the blood alert; and then there needs not bell nor voice, but only the inward prompting, to set our life astir.

Sleep is the preventive and the cure of disease. Lack of sleep opens the door to every malady under heaven. Sleep, the shadow of death, is the minister of life. Plunder of sleep may give a phantom of life, but it is the herald and the preparer of death.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

PLEATED WAISTS.

THE pleated-waist dress illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is published, is an excellent model for house dresses, and is worn in midsummer both in the street and house. This box-pleated blouse-waist is usually of white linen or some cool washing fabric, while the skirts are dark goods that are not easily soiled, such as Napoleon blue linen or else black silk. Instead of a five-pleated blouse, the waist now most in favor has but three broad box-pleats in front, and a corresponding number in the back. The middle front pleat is like that in a gentleman's shirt front, formed by turning back the material from the front edge and stitching it down flatly near each side. Three eyelet-holes for stud buttons with spiral screws are put down the middle of this pleat. The remaining box-pleats are merely sewed down and opened. Sewing-machine stitching is used for these; but many prefer to merely "run" these pleats, as there is no strain upon them, and machine-work is apt to draw when washed. The blouse is lengthened to extend over the hips, passing under the skirts; the pleats are sewed to the waist line only, and a facing for drawing-strings is then put around the waist. The shoulder seams are very short, and the sleeves when set in should reach the point of the shoulders. The neck is finished by a pleated ruff that may be worn standing all around, or else with the fronts turned over in a point, and pressed flatly like the English collars. The neck band should be fastened with a collar button of gold or pearl to match the studs and sleeve buttons, and this dispenses with a warm neck-tie. The shirt sleeve is slightly full, and gathered into a narrow cuff that slopes wider toward the hand, and is buttoned on the outside of the wrist. Sometimes a pleated frill falls over the wrist, matching that around the neck. Patterns and pretty models for sleeves and collars were given in Bazar No. 31, Vol. VI.

White linens, with stripes or polka dots of black, blue, or scarlet, are the favorite materials for pleated blouses this summer. Among stripes fine hair lines are chosen; polka dots are about the size of a pea, and are placed quite far apart. Such linens cost 60 cents a yard. Sheer linen lawns are also used, and are bought in the same designs for 30 cents. Entire dresses of linen lawn are made by this pattern, with prettily ruffled skirt and over-skirt; the model is also excellent for summer prints and percales. Undressed gray flax linen makes useful blouses for morning and country wear, and has a certain air of style when worn with black skirts of silk or alpaca. The English standing collar with turned-over points in front, and the square shirt cuff with broken points, are used for gray blouses. Sailor blouses are of blue linen, or else navy flannel, with square collars, on which white anchors or stars are wrought. Very dressy blouses of thin white muslin have bands of embroidery or of Valenciennes insertion let in between the pleats. Black Brussels and guipure net blouses are also very stylish with silk skirts. A band of black velvet ribbon, with narrow edging on each side, is placed down the middle of each box-pleat; others have a puff between the pleats, and colored ribbon is run through the puff.

The over-skirt illustrated is a full, long, ample, round over-skirt, stylishly draped. In the picture given the over-skirt is of the dark material of the lower skirt, but variety is given to the wardrobe by having the upper skirt and blouse of the same light fabric with a dark skirt beneath. Thus imperfect remnants of eight yards of any pretty muslin may be utilized, and a graceful over dress made; this quantity will not be sufficient for a ruffle on the edge, and a bias fold is used instead.

THE DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE.

A cut paper pattern is also published of the double-breasted jockey basque walking suit illustrated on page 508. This design is appropriate for both rich and plain materials. The suit copied in the engraving is of two shades of plum-colored silk; dark linens and percales look well made by this pattern; wool de baize, alpaca, and tamise cloth may also be made in this fashion, with a view to the future, as it is said double-breasted garments will be quite as popular in the autumn as they are at present. The jockey basque is of very simple shape, fitted smoothly by the two necessary darts in front, side forms, and a seam down the middle of the back. The fullness below the waist behind is folded under in flat pleats, and held in place by rows of buttons, like the basques of riding-habits, for which this pattern would serve as a model. The bias band for trimming is of a lighter shade of material than the body of the dress; in silk suits this band is lined with foundation muslin, and sewed on by blind stitches; on washing fabrics the band is stitched on by machine. The revers neck and collar is pointed in front, but is high enough to dispense with a habit shirt, if preferred, and require only a standing ruff of muslin, crêpe lisse, or lace. The over-skirt differs from that of the pleated-waist skirt in having a rounded smooth apron cut in a shape that is very becoming to stout figures. The trimming on the lower skirt is flat lengthwise pleats in front, with horizontal ruffles behind.

SCARFS AND MANTLES.

Long straight scarfs and old-fashioned mantillas are the imported wraps worn at the seaside. They are made of camel's-hair of pale turquoise blue or mignonette green, and of striped Algerian stuffs, and are edged with colored yak or guipure lace, above which is a band of insertion let in the material. Mouzaia, a moss-striped raw silk fabric mentioned early in the season, is much worn abroad for these négligé mantles. Pretty striped talmas with long pointed hoods are made of gay striped wool fabrics, and called Ortolan mantles: they cost from $4 upward.

NOVELTIES.

Over-skirts deeply pointed on the sides and clinging to the figure are worn abroad. They are made of twilled India silk, China crape, or any soft flexible fabric, are edged with knotted fringe, or else lace and insertion, and are worn over white muslin or tulle dresses.

Raised embroideries in colored silks and wool are favorite trimmings on French dresses of foulard and other silken fabrics. Every hue of the flower and leaf is represented, instead of the modest designs now wrought in one color, tone upon tone. Embroidered laces are also announced as a garniture, used specially by Worth on very dressy toilettes.

There is an effort abroad to bring into favor what is called the Restoration sleeve, viz., a close sleeve with a large puff at the top. This is unbecoming, as it gives an appearance of too great breadth, and destroys the graceful slope of tapering shoulders.

EVENING DRESSES.

White silk is, of all others, the material most used for imported ball dresses. Crêpe lisse pleatings, ruffs, and fichus are used for trimming, associated with those crystal, frost-like beads the French call white jet. A pretty white silk dress for a débutante's first ball has eight crêpe lisse pleatings on the three front breadths, with four lengthwise bands of green silk embroidered with white jet; the demi-train is untrimmed; an upper skirt covers the back breadths only; the châtelaine waist has a bertha of crêpe lisse and beads. A white silk dress for a young matron has a demi-train entirely without trimming. The long round apron-front over-skirt has two pleatings of crêpe lisse, headed by a puff of black velvet dotted with crimson roses. Deeply fringed black velvet bows, and a sash with rose branches stuck in the loops, are used to drape the skirt. The low Josephine bodice has a bertha of lisse and velvet. The jewelry is dark coral, and a spray of coral is worn in the blonde hair.

Among other tasteful French dresses is a novel combination of lavender and rose silk. The simple dress is lavender silk, low corsage, untrimmed trained skirt, and a tablier over-skirt. The back of the train is caught up in a puff, and held there by the ends of a coquettish fichu which is made of rose-colored silk, trimmed with Valenciennes insertion and lace. The arms are left bare, but the fichu is half high, almost covering the neck, and is finished with a high ruff of lace. Pink roses are in the back hair. Large lavender silk fan with a rose branch painted upon it.

Dresses are also made of crêpe lisse, and trimmed with silk festooned ruffles. Shiny white taffeta silk is more effective than lustrous grain, and is also less heavy on the delicate crape foundation.

COUNTRY HATS.

Hats chosen for the country are of most eccentric shapes, and are by no means displaced by bonnets, as was predicted by milliners early in the season. The Florida hats of fanciful shape, coarse-looking Mackinaw straws, and the Panama hats worn by gentlemen, are the favorites for watering-place wear. The brim is turned up on one side, or else behind, and a bunch of flowers is stuck there. Every thing like regularity or primness is avoided, and the consequence is, a picturesque hat is obtained. Part of the style of these chapeaux consists in wearing them far back on the head, or else on one side, in a careless-looking fashion. The hair is arranged in a small braided knot, and hidden out of sight in the crown of the hat.

PERSONAL.

JOHN STUART MILL sometimes got into the mellowest humor, and went into anecdote with great zest; always talked well. He had a deep dislike to GOETHE'S moral character, and wondered how a man who could draw the sorrows of a deserted woman like Aurelia, in Wilhelm Meister, could behave so systematically ill to women. Turning from GOETHE to SCHILLER was like going into the fresh air from a hot-house. He thought GOLDSMITH unsurpassed; next to him ADDISON; disliked the style of Junius and GIBBON, and thought meanly of the latter in all respects except for his research, which alone of the work of that century stands the best of nineteenth-century criticism.

—Judge ROBERTSON, of Virginia, who died on the 5th of July, at the age of eighty-eight, was a lineal descendant of POCAHONTAS. So was the late Dr. HAWKS, of this city.

—Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., a man of note among English Congregationalists, and author of Ecce Deus, is coming hither in the autumn to lecture.

—Mr. A. T. STEWART, who sailed for Europe on the 15th ult. for a couple of months' relaxation from business, needed the vacation. He could have stood the expense for a year or more past, but the bother was about the time. He has so many irons in the fire that it takes a rolling-mill to keep them torrid.

—Madame RATAZZI, one of the wittiest women of latter days, when last in Paris saw at the house of a friend a picture of MICHELET, who, in point of cheerfulness, is quite equal to HUME or ALISON, and wrote under it the following:

"MICHELET, dont voici l'image,
Offre un contraste assez plaisant;
Il réveille le moyen âge
Et fait dormir l'âge présent."

—The King of Italy has just presented to the Empress of Russia a nice little thing in the way of furniture—a table of marvelous mosaic, from the studio of ENRICO BOST, of Florence. It is round, four feet in diameter, and represents Apollo and the nine Muses.

—Philadelphia has another citizen emulous of the fame of GIRARD. Mr. LEWIS AUDENRIED, an opulent gentleman of that city, has given $100,000 in seven per cent. first mortgage bonds, the interest of which is to be paid to any hospital or hospitals in Philadelphia, whether connected with a medical college or not, that may be designated by his friend Dr. WILLIAM FORBES.

—Very French and very good is this squib from a recent Paris journal at the expense of the French ministry: A gentleman lately presented himself at the residence of a new minister. "I wish to see Monsieur X——, if you please." "He does not live here just now; he is installed at Versailles." "Since when?" "Since he became a member of the cabinet." "Ah, he has entered the new cabinet! Be good enough to allow me to sit down a moment. I will wait till he goes out of office."

—The Shah has clear views as to persons likely to endanger thrones. He therefore thought he was doing the kindly and correct thing when he told the Prince of Wales, as one potentate might tell another, that the undoubtedly proper manœuvre for him to perform on the Duke of Sutherland was at once to kill him, for the obvious reason that a subject so rich and powerful as the duke could not exist without endangering the throne. "Or," said the Shah, "if you can not cut his throat, at least you can put out his eyes." And when told that this, if not improper, would still be regarded as discourteous, he settled into the conviction that there could be little security for a dynasty which possessed so slight authority over its subjects.

—M. DAUBREE, an eminent geologist, is coaching up M. THIERS on the question of rocks and things. THIERS is preparing to write an essay on the destiny of mankind. He will first "go for" DARWIN. THIERS is pretty old, and has lost the velvet from his lovely cheek, but there's a good deal of vim in him yet, and it would be pleasant for him, as his parting literary shot, to bring down the objectionable DARWIN.

—Kaiser WILLIAM is said to be losing his reason, and that the journey to St. Petersburg developed it rapidly. He never had a very strong head, though he had a good figure. Prince BISMARCK, it is known, has a habit of speaking of his imperial master in terms of contempt, and his allusions are not infrequent. He compares the reluctance with which the king entered on the dangerous ground over which Providence guided him in 1864 and 1866 to that which is felt by the inferior equine animals to the saltatory process which is needed to cross a wall. "Thrice had I to bring up the old gasson to the fence before I could get him to take the jump."

—The late JOHN H. EASTBURN was a good type of the Boston printer—industrious, frugal, intelligent. His printing-office he bequeathed to three workmen who had been long in his employ; $5000 gave he to the Franklin Typographical and other charitable societies, $10,000 to the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches. After providing amply for his widow and relations, the balance of his estate is given to the Boston Provident Society, the income to purchase food, clothing, and fuel for the poor of that city. What we especially like in the old gentleman's will is that he gave $1000 to his friend, and every body's friend, P. B. SHILLABER—"Mrs. Partington."

—One Dr. GLENN, of Colusa County, California, owns a little ranch which may fairly be called a nice patch of ground. It contains nearly 45,000 acres, embracing a frontage of eighteen miles on the Sacramento River, and extends back about five miles. He has two tenants who cultivate about 10,000 acres each, and many farmers who work on a smaller scale. G. W. HOOG, one of the two large tenants, is now cutting 7000 acres of wheat, which will yield about 180,000 bushels. He is threshing this grain with a machine which is run by an engine of twenty-horse power. To supply it requires twenty-four large wagons, 110 horses, and fifty men. And he seems to be happy.

—Queen VICTORIA has approved the recommendation of Mr. GLADSTONE granting to Dr. LIVINGSTONE a pension of $1500 a year. The King of Italy sent to his family a gold medal; but gold medals, though very nice, don't produce income. The English style of present is more comforting.

—JEAN INGELOW, it is said, does not write any after breakfast. Great many people in New York do not.

—Among the notable men described by EDMUND YATES as being present at the Guildhall ball to "Mr. Shaw, of Persia," was Mr. SCUDAMORE, second secretary of the Post-office, the man who induced the government to purchase the telegraphs, and under whose direction they have marvelously amplified and improved; a man of extraordinary powers of organization and official aptitude, joined with the pleasantest fancy and the brightest wit; a man who, in his early days, has written magazine articles and stories without end; who has contributed some of the neatest and most humorous verses to be found in the pages of Punch; and who, with the exception of DICKENS, is the best after-dinner orator E. YATES says he ever heard. By-the-way, Mr. YATES notices that "the Princess of Wales appeared with her hair knotted on the top of her head, thus setting the fashion, let us hope, for the abolition of those enormous chignons," etc. That comes of a man's trying to write about fashions. Just as if any body had worn chignons for a year past and more! We might have taught Mr. YATES better than that here in America!

—A recent visitor to Mrs. LEE, at Alexandria, Virginia, found her busily engaged coloring a bunch of autumn leaves destined for a fair to be held soon, the proceeds of which are to go toward erecting a memorial chapel to General LEE. Making fancy-work for this fair and coloring pictures is Mrs. LEE'S favorite occupation, and so eager is she to contribute to its success that she rises at five o'clock to begin her work.

—The Princess of Wales is having a private family visit from her sister, the Czarina of Russia. The two sisters bear a close resemblance to each other, and are two of the handsomest women of the age. Their frank, simple, gracious manners enchant every one, and no two young women were less spoiled by the affectations and artificialities of court life. They are to this hour as kindly and unassuming as when, in a quiet country home in Germany, they made up their own bonnets, and enjoyed their butter-bread at the frugal domestic table. They are deeply attached to each other, wear dresses of the same cut and color, and exhibit every mark of sisterly sympathy and affection.

—The Earl of Dunraven, who has banished himself temporarily from Great Britain to enjoy the pleasure of shooting large game in the very West, has secured the services of the Hon. WILLIAM F. CODY, or "Buffalo Bill," as a shooting companion. The earl is to be succeeded by a large number of aristocrats from that kingdom, bent upon bloody work on the plains.

—It is supposed that the Pope will soon bestow the hat of a cardinal on Archbishop MANNING, of England, and on two American archbishops. Of the latter, either Archbishop M'CLOSKEY or Archbishop BAILEY will probably be favored, while a Southern or Western prelate will have the other head-gear.

—The late WILLIAM WHITING, who left an estate of $715,000, was another of Boston's good citizens. It has transpired since his death that he refused compensation for the valuable services rendered by him to the government during the war, and for the delicate foreign mission on which he was sent.

—The memory of President JUAREZ is cherished in Mexico. Its government has decreed that a $50,000 monument shall be erected to his memory; the national flag displayed on his birthday; that each of his daughters shall have an annual pension of $3000 while single, and $1500 if married, and that his most successful biographer shall be paid $2000.

—Dr. RUSSELL, in a recent letter to the New York Times, presents the Prince of Wales in a character he has not been supposed to fill. "Few people," he says, "in England are aware of the deep interest taken by the Prince of Wales in the politics of his country in its external relations. He carries on an immense correspondence with the great people of Europe, and if the forms of our government and the jealousy of the House of Commons did not prevent his direct participation in affairs, he would be a most valuable minister sans portefeuille of our Foreign Secretary or Prime Minister. There is not a minister, a man of note in Europe, with whom he is not personally acquainted, and his wonderful insight into personal character serves him better than a long apprenticeship to blue-books and papers does other men."

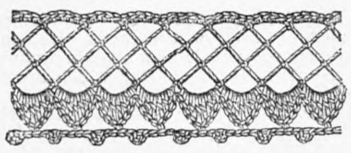

Fig. 1.—NETTED AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Lamp-Mat, Figs. 1-3.

To make this mat stiff lace, gray lining, and white tulle, as well as zephyr worsted in different colors, are required. First baste the lining and then the tulle on the stiff lace, and transfer the design given in illustration Fig. 1 to the tulle so that each line of the design comes on one row of holes on the tulle (see Fig. 2, page 501). Work, as shown by the illustration, with zephyr worsted in two shades of wood brown, the inner six-cornered star and the irregular uneven squares in the hollows between the corners of the star; the latter are worked with light brown worsted. On this are joined two rows of bias stitches, which are worked, as shown by the illustration, with gray worsted in two shades. Finally, edge all the outlines of the design with long stitches of brown worsted. Paste a carriage-leather lining under the mat so far completed, and at a distance of one-fifth of an inch from the outer edge cut away the projecting material. Cover this edge with a fringe of brown and gray worsted. For this fringe work, as shown by Fig. 3, on a foundation of brown worsted, and inserting a piece of coarse twine, one round of single crochet—always alternately three stitches with brown, one stitch with gray worsted. In each upper vein of the stitches in this round tie thread ends of double green worsted an inch and three-quarters long, and comb them out.

Mignardise and Crochet Rosettes for Tidies, etc. Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE rosettes may be used for setting together tidies, etc. They are worked with mignardise and twisted crochet cotton. To work the middle circle of the rosette shown by Fig. 1 take a piece of mignardise which counts 36 loops on each side, and join the ends carefully. First crochet for the inner ring of the circle three rounds as follows: 1st round.—On each loop work 1 dc. (double crochet), then always 1 ch. (chain stitch); finally, 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first dc. of this round. 2d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., 1 dc. on each dc. of the preceding round; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 3d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on every second following st. (stitch) of the preceding round; finally, 1 sl. on the first st. of this round. Cut off the thread and fasten it. Crochet on the other side of the circle of mignardise four rounds more as follows: 1st round.—∗ 1 dc. on the next loop of the mignardise, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the next loop, 2 ch., 1 dc. on the next loop, 3 ch.; repeat eleven times from ∗; finally, work 1 sl. on the first dc. of the preceding round. 2d round.—∗ Five times alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the first dc. of the preceding round, working all the sc. on the same st. on which the first sc. was worked, then 8 ch., 1 sc. on the third following dc.; repeat eleven times from ∗. At the end of the round cut off the thread and fasten it. 3d round.—Lay on the thread anew; 1 sc. on the middle st. of the middle loop of one of the figures consisting of 5 ch. loops in the preceding round, then 11 times alternately 15 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the middle loop of the next figure consisting of 5 ch. loops; finally, 15 ch., 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. 4th round.—5 ch., the first 3 of which count as first dc., then always alternately 1 dc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, 2 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. Cut off the thread and fasten it. Take a new piece of mignardise and work, first, on one side two rounds as follows: 1st round.—∗ 3 sc. separated each by 2 ch. on the next 3 loops of the mignardise, 7 ch., pass over 4 loops of the mignardise; repeat 15 times from ∗; finally, work 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. At the end of the round sew the ends of the mignardise together. 2d round.—1 sl. on the first 2 ch. of the preceding round, ∗ 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 sc. separated each by 2 ch. in the preceding round, five times alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. on which the first sc. was worked, but fasten the middle st. of the middle loop of the figure consisting of 5 ch. loops to 1 st. on the outer edge of the rosette so far finished; then 9 ch.; repeat 15 times from ∗, and in every repetition fasten the middle st. of the middle loop of the figure consisting of 5 ch. loops always to the twelfth following st. of the rosette; finally, 1 sc. on the first st. of this round. Fasten the thread and cut it off. On the other side of the mignardise crochet for the outer edge of the rosette one round as follows: ∗ 1 sc. on the second loop in the hollow of a scallop, four times alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, then 2 ch., pass over 2 loops in the hollow of the scallops; repeat from ∗; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. Fasten the thread and cut it off.

Begin the rosette shown by Fig. 2 in the middle on a foundation of 9 ch. closed in a ring, and on this work, first, six rounds as follows: 1st round.—5 ch., which count as first stc. (short treble crochet), 31 stc. on the ch. ring; finally, 1 sl. on the fifth of the 5 ch. counting as first stc. in this round. 2d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, in doing which always insert the needle in both upper veins of the stitches; finally, 1 sl. on the first st. of this round. 3d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., ∗ then for the first leaflet of a two-leaved figure work 7 ch., 2 tc. (treble crochet) on the first of the 7 ch., working off the 2 tc. not separately, but together with the loop on the needle. This completes one leaflet. Crochet a similar leaflet, then 1 dc. on both upper veins of the fourth following st. of the preceding round; repeat 7 times more from ∗, but in the last repetition, instead of the dc., work 1 sl. on the third of the ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 4th round.—7 sl. on the 7 ch. of the first leaflet in the preceding round, 3 ch., which count as first dc., 7 times alternately 13 ch., 1 dc. on the middle st. of the next two-leaved figure; then 13 ch., 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 5th round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. 6th round.—1 sc. on the next st. of the preceding round, ∗ 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 2 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., 2 sc. on the following 2 st., then fasten to the eighth loop of a new piece of mignardise, 3 sc. on the next 3 st., 1 p., 2 sc. on the following 2 st.; repeat from ∗; the four surplus stitches of the preceding round are passed over, each separately, at intervals. At the end of the round cut off the thread and fasten it, and sew the ends of the mignardise together. Crochet on the other side of the mignardise one round more, at the same time fastening on a second piece of mignardise in the following manner: ∗ 1 sc. on the second loop in the hollow of a mignardise scallop of the work finished thus far; 5 times alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, but the third time, after the second ch., fasten to the ninth loop of the second piece of mignardise, then 1 ch., pass over 2 loops in the hollow of a mignardise scallop of the finished part of the work; repeat 11 times from ∗; finally, 1 sl. on the first st. of this round, then cut off the thread and fasten it, and sew the ends of the mignardise together. Finally, crochet on the outer edge of the second piece of mignardise one round more as follows: 1 sc. on the second loop in the hollow of a scallop, 6 times alternately 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, then 2 ch., pass over 2 loops in the hollow of the mignardise scallop; repeat 11 times from *; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round.

Carriage or Cradle Afghan.—Crochet and Cross Stitch Embroidery. Figs. 1-3.

—[See illustrations on page 500.]

Fig. 1 shows a section of an afghan designed for a carriage, cradle, or couch. The afghan, which is shown reduced in size, is made of single strips set together. It is embroidered in cross stitch, and edged with fringe, which is knotted in. The original is forty-three inches and a quarter long, and thirty-three inches and three-quarters wide, not including the fringe surrounding it, which is four inches wide. It consists of eleven strips, the five wide ones of which are worked crosswise with white zephyr worsted in the common Afghan or Victoria stitch. The six narrow strips are crocheted lengthwise with blue zephyr worsted in rounds, going backward and forward, with raised dots. The crochet-work should be done closely, therefore the crochet needle used should not be too coarse. First work the wide strips of the requisite length in Afghan stitch on a foundation of 28 st. (stitch). Each pattern row of the Afghan stitch consists always of one round going forward and one round going backward. In the first round of the first pattern row take up one loop from each foundation stitch, letting all the loops remain on the needle. In the second round always cast off two of the loops on the needle together, drawing the thread through once. In the course of the work, in the first round of every following pattern row, always take up the loops from the vertical veins of the preceding pattern row. The second round is worked as already described. These strips are edged on the sides with one round of single crochet worked with blue worsted, observing Fig. 3. Work on one side of each strip, in connection with the edging, always one narrow strip of the afghan with blue worsted, in rounds going back and forth, as follows: Turn the work. 1st–3d rounds.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each st. of the preceding round. In working the sc. always insert the needle in the two upper veins of the stitches. 4th round.—* 3 sc. on the next 3 st. of the preceding round, one dot on the vertical veins of the corresponding st. of the first round (see Fig. 3). For this dot five times alternately throw the thread on the needle and draw it through the corresponding st. in a loop three-quarters of an inch long; then 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the next st. of the third round. In working the sl. work off together all the loops and threads thrown over. Repeat from *. 5th round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. Repeat the fourth and fifth rounds three times more, observing Fig. 3. Finally, work one more round of sc.

In setting the strips together, sewing them up from the wrong side (see Fig. 3), a white strip should always come on a blue strip. The cross stitch embroidery which ornaments the white strips is worked with blue and white filling silk. Fig. 2 gives the design and description of symbols. Knot worsted strands into the outer edge of the afghan, and tie them in knots, observing the illustration.

Stand with Emery Cushion.

See illustration on page 500.

THIS stand is of bronze, an inch and three-quarters high, and ornamented with small bronze chains. On the top of the stand is set a cushion filled with emery and covered with pink faille. The latter is embroidered in point Russe with white silk. The under edge of the cushion is bordered with narrow pink silk fringe.

the border, draw out the requisite number of lengthwise threads of the material side by side, and darn the crosswise threads in point de reprise, as shown by the illustration. At both sides of this open-work strip work the point Russe embroidery.

THE CLOUD.

A CLOUD came over a land of leaves
(Oh, hush, little leaves, lest it pass you by!):
How they had waited and watched for the rain,
Mountain and valley, and vineyard and plain,
With never a sign from the sky!
Day after day had the pitiless sun
Looked down with a lidless eye.

But now! On a sudden a whisper went Through the topmost twigs of the poplar spire;
Out of the east a light wind blew
(All the leaves trembled and murmured, and drew Hope to the help of desire);
It stirred the faint pulse of the forest tree,
And breathed through the brake and the brier.

Slowly the cloud came: then the wind died;
Dumb lay the land in its hot suspense:
The thrush on the elm bough suddenly stopped;
The weather-warned swallow in mid-flying dropped;
The linnet ceased song in the fence:
Mute the cloud moved, till it hung overhead,
Heavy, big-bosomed, and dense.

* * * * * * *

Ah, the cool rush through the dry-tongued trees!
The patter and plash on the thirsty earth!
The eager bubbling of runnel and rill!
The lisping of leaves that have drunk their fill!
The freshness that follows the dearth!
New life for the woodland, the vineyard, the vale—
New life with the world's new birth!

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Is he an Impostor?—How he drops his Diamonds.—The Guillotine.—Poor Mrs. Reuter.—A Lady of Fashion.

IF the Shah is not, like Falstaff, witty himself, he is at least the cause of wit in others. Among other brilliant ideas he has suggested is this really charming one that he is not the Shah at all, but only an imitation one sent over by the true "king of kings" for stock-jobbing purposes, to excite the public, and make the Persian loan that Baron Reuter is raising "lively." This is, however, contradicted by the same consideration that forbade the lady to suspect her rival of wearing false hair—i. e., if she had had to buy it she would have bought better: the genuineness of the Shah is proved by his inaptitude and feebleness. Dissipation and gratified self-will have so wrought with him that he is more like a delicate yet ill-made piece of mechanism than a human being. He has to be wound up, as it were, by what the doctors call "constant support," or he would cease going altogether; and when he does go, it is by fits and starts, and only a very little way. Some of our newspapers are in raptures about him, because, "unlike an Eastern potentate, or even those born to great social eminence among ourselves, he permits to his countenance a considerable mobility;" by which, I suppose, they would politely indicate that he is not so great a fool as some of those hereditary personages who imitate the unruffled calm of North American Indians, lest an interest in the wrong thing should expose their childishness or their vacuity; but, as a matter of fact, a sickly smile is the very most that he can muster in acknowledgment of all the efforts made to please him; and only upon one occasion has he been known to wave that handkerchief he does not use for its legitimate purpose, namely, when Captain Shaw and his Thames firemen suddenly directed their hose against the steamer in which he visited Greenwich, and gave him a feu de joie in water-works. It was a new sensation—for he is never washed—and positively pleased him.

The reflection that the lives and fortunes of real men and women at home are dependent upon the mere caprice of this royal automaton is to me a sickening one. At Brussels a characteristic thing is said to have happened. The institution that took his fancy most was the guillotine, and he was accordingly desirous to see it in action. The king, his host, expressed due regrets that just at that time there was no criminal on hand who could exemplify its virtues; whereupon he answered, in the Persian tongue, "What does that signify?" Then, correcting himself, he added, hastily, "Or, if it does, take one of my suite."

In the sunlight he really shines like a cucumber frame, so resplendent is his attire with precious stones; and you can easily understand how a poor man might without servility desire the post of his body-servant, so far as to be permitted to brush his clothes. How his diamonds can be made to stick on is indeed a marvel to me, though up to the present time, I believe, he has only lost half a dozen (from his bridle-rein when at the review at Woolwich), and those of comparatively small value—namely, £50 a piece. Prince Esterhazy, who was wont to be attired in the same costly way, used to drop £50 worth a night.

The most humorous piece of social gossip I have got to tell you this week is the story of how the Shah has treated "the man who has bought Persia," namely, Baron Reuter. So anxious was this gentleman to secure a visit to his house from his imperial client that he telegraphed (you know how cheap he can telegraph) to his Majesty, even so early in his European tour as when he was at Moscow, to implore him "to give him a night" when he should come to England, and a gracious response was received in the affirmative. Mrs. Reuter resolved to be equal to the occasion, and outshine the court itself in her reception. Her own house in Palace Gardens is a fine one, but semi-detached; so she hired the next one, and broke down the wall between them. She turned her doors into windows, and very literally her house out-of-doors, by building a room 120 feet long outside it, with a dais for the "king of kings." She has asked half London, and made the other half wild because it is not asked. And now it has begun to be whispered that the Shah won't come to Baron Reuter's after all.

Some say the temperature of Moscow made him wish to be a little warmer than he really felt toward his financial patron; others that the telegraph officials mistook his "no" for "yes." But the fact is, I believe, that the baron committed a solecism in etiquette in not sending his invitation through the Lord Chamberlain. That great official probably thinks very little of Mr. Reuter (for the latter, being a naturalized British subject, is no baron in his eyes), and is not displeased at the opportunity of snubbing him. In vain has the wretched Reuter—urged, we may be sure, by his still more wretched lady—laid stress upon the Shah's promise, upon his own lavish expenditure, and upon his wife's humiliation in case she should be left Shahless. "We can give you a breakfast," said the Lord Chamberlain, referring to the long list of his Majesty's engagements, "or perhaps even a luncheon; but we really can not give you a night."

Mr. Rudolph Lehmann, to whose great merits as a portrait painter I have already alluded, has been commissioned by Baron Reuter to paint a picture of the "concession," which may one day have a great historical interest, for which the statesmen who accompany his Majesty have duly "sat;" but the Shah himself has sat to nobody, and is altogether a difficult bird to catch either by night or day.

This enthusiasm, or rather this furor, about the Eastern monarch is absolutely unintelligible upon grounds of common-sense, for he is really but a very "one-horse" concern as a political power, and can neither "make us nor break us." It arises, first, I think, from the fact of his being an absolute monarch, with power of life and death; secondly, from his being copper-colored; and thirdly, and mainly, from his going about with "a hatful of diamonds." These cast the Czarowitz, who is also just now a guest of ours, though of ten times his political importance, completely into the shade. Perhaps, too, the Shah's privilege of a plurality of wives gives him an exceptional interest with the ladies; and I am sure that upon his part that interest is reciprocated. The way he stares at them—and in this respect his suite is no whit behind him—is suggestive of an unbounded admiration for the fair sex. In the East, of course, it is not usual to see so much of them as he sees here, and the more he sees, the more he seems to like them. His attempts at making himself agreeable, however, are very crude. It is said that Lady Odo Russell, at Berlin, admiring his diamonds as only a woman can, observed, "How you must love them, sire!" "Not so much," replied the monarch, in execrable French, "as I love you;" and it is whispered that he pinched her arm.

The case for the prosecution in the Tichborne trial is almost over, though it is said the whole affair may not be concluded till September. The whole affair is getting too ridiculous; so much so that the judges and the jury, the bar and the audience, are sometimes all in a roar together. The cross-examination yesterday of Mrs. Townley, one of the daughters of the late Sir Henry Tichborne, and a lady of fashion, was characteristic.

"Had you any bets upon the last trial, madam?"

"Yes, several; as many as I could possibly get my friends to lay me."

"Were these to any amount?"

"Oh no; the largest was but fifty pounds."

"Were they all paid to you?"

"Not all; some objected to pay because it was only a nonsuit."

"Have you any on the result of the present trial?"

"No: because I could get nobody to back the claimant."

Re-examined by the counsel for the prosecution, she was asked, "Had you any bet with Mr. Guildford Onslow?" (This is the member of Parliament who has "invested" in the claimant, and has "stumped" the country in his favor.)

"Oh yes; but he has not paid." (Roars of laughter.)

It is a mistake to suppose that if found guilty the sentence must needs be light. It is within the power of the judge to give our "fat friend" fourteen years. But it is rumored that one of the jury has such good and sufficient reasons for "sticking to him" that he will eat his boots rather than find him guilty. In that case, all this tremendous business will have to be gone over again.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

AS IT SHOULD HAVE BEEN.

TO stumble on one's guardian angel making up one's personal account for the day is rare, I know; nevertheless, it happened to Mrs. Larche. Twilight; every one else away; the room so silent that the ticking of the clock was almost impertinent; and then a golden flash past Mrs. Larche, half asleep in her easy-chair.

In an instant she comprehended it by that marvelous instinct that we possess in dreams and visions; and there flitted through her mind various items: fifty dollars given to the Orphans' Home; tickets given out for a mothers' meeting; a moral lecture over their coffee to her husband, who troubled her by his irreligion. But the angel commenced with an item headed, "A Visit to old Miss Moss."

"Miss Moss," wrote the angel, "is sixty, wrinkled, and yellow as if she had been dyed; wears a black shawl and limp black skirt; gives herself strange bobs and twitches, so that people are inclined to titter at her even when she advances to the communion-table in the church of which Mrs. Larche is a member, and kneels beside that lady. But that is because they see only the shell. The real Miss Moss within is as fresh as spring; an enchanted princess, bound by ugliness and poverty, and unable for her chains to get out to the beauty and sympathy of the outside world. A brook and a hill, with a blue haze over both, hung up in some window, or a scrap of Beethoven, brings tears to her eyes. She dotes on books; for in them she is young and lovely and noble and great, and has troops of friends; and the Persian enchantress herself never loved flowers better. But no one sends her books, flowers, or concert tickets. Old Miss Moss! the idea would be ridiculous! And she is too poor to buy; and sometimes her soul beats hard against its prison bars. The enchanted princess rebels against her fate—as she did this afternoon.

"The sun beat down hard in her dry little room. She was tired to the very death of looking at the sampler over the mantel, the daguerreotypes and tea-cups beneath, the fat footstool, the striped table-cover, and, without, the rays fluttering on the roof, and the tangled kite fast in one of the chimneys. The bit of sky she could see was as blue as the sapphire pavement the Hebrew elders saw. The vagrant wind brought a scent of lilacs and spring freshness; and she knew that without the grass was already like velvet, and the trees in full leaf. People every where were walking, chatting, buying, painting, looking at pictures, singing, writing, driving—in one word, living; and,

"'I am shut out from it all,' she said. 'The whole world of art and beauty and thought is closed against me. I am denied even a peep through its gates. Denied! I am not even remembered. The whole world has forgotten me. Shall I have any of these delights in heaven, I wonder, or will my brothers and sisters in Christ monopolize them there as here?'

"Bitter and unwholesome thoughts these, and bitter were the tears that trickled down Miss Moss's withered cheeks. And just then that Mrs. Larche should drive up!—she could hardly believe her eyes; but there was the lady—that she should come for her! that she should bring her a fuchsia and a lapful of new books! that she should take her out for her share in the spring and sunshine and lilacs! take her to drive! remember her, and not in the flannel and soup way, but as a sister in Christ, with wants and longings like her own! Miss Moss's poor heart went out to God in a gust of thanksgiving and faith and delight; and for Mrs. Larche, she will find her reward with Him who remembers even the cup of cold water given for His sake. That was a true angel's visit."

Mrs. Larche's cheeks were crimson. "But—but," she said, "I never did any thing of the sort. I never thought of it. I drove out alone, and—yes, I remember—past the old house where Miss Moss lives; and I do believe, now I think of it, I saw her face at the window looking after me."

Without reply, the angel proceeded to the second item.

"Mary Stubbs, ætatis nineteen, is in what may be called a transition state—and transition states, in governments or individuals, are apt to be marked by disagreeables. Mary Stubbs is not altogether a pleasant person. She is ignorant and ambitious, with vague longings for something strong, bold, grand, and not every-day. Her ideas of what is great are about as intelligent as that barbarian's Christianity who crucified his followers because the English Scriptures recommended that form of punishment. She wears a riding-hat, short hair and skirts, and flourishes strong-minded notions, and proposes a course for herself of mathematics and political economy—the short hair, riding-hat, and political economy being to her what much jewelry and wonderful neck-ties are to some very young men. Under that is cleverness, principle, and fine traits that only want development. That Mrs. Larche should detect this; should silence her natural antagonism toward the hat and the hair; should sacrifice an evening a week for her sake; should patiently, almost imperceptibly, incline her toward a higher, more womanly creed—in short, be always ready with the word fitly spoken for this unattractive, provoking, and yet worthy girl—no words of praise are strong enough. To give money is easy: to give thought and time, and sacrifice prejudice and pleasanter company for an indifferent person, is noble, and marks the true woman and the Christian."

"Oh!" murmured Mrs. Larche. "When I have always detested the girl, and turned her into ridicule; and only last night, when Jane said she was sorry for her, and that she should invite her there occasionally, and try to be of some use to her, I told her on all such occasions to give me warning, as I did not choose to see too much of Miss Stubbs. It never occurred to me that I owed her any duty."

Still without reply, the angel advanced to the third item.

"Mrs. Riche has long been ill. Before her illness she was a fine, showy woman. You would observe her hair and her color and her waist. You would also observe that no lady saluted her, and that your wife, or your daughter, or whatever lady hung on your arm, meeting her for the first time, surveyed her with marked and instant distaste. Nothing was absolutely known against Mrs. Riche. She lived quietly with her husband and children. But it was one of those cases where, although nothing discreditable was known, every one was firmly convinced that there was a great deal to be known if one chose to take the trouble to unearth it.

"But Mrs. Riche has now been ill for weeks. Her husband looks sleepless and anxious. There is trouble with the servants, as is apt to be the case when the head of the house is ill. The little children, playing about, look unkempt and forlorn. Mr. Larche passes them every afternoon on his way home, and Mr. Larche has a tender heart for children. He saw little Nanny crying, and scratched with the gravel where she had fallen, and little Mollie, only two years older, trying to comfort her and play the mother, and dashed a mist from his eyes, and muttered something about 'bitterly good women.' Mr. Larche is not what is called serious. He declares that his wife, who is a notable woman in the Church, does the piety for the family. But he ventures on occasional hints about Mrs. Riche, as that 'the Riche family must be in sad trouble, now that there is no one to nurse the invalid or watch the children,' or that 'Riche, poor fellow, looks almost worn out.'

"To tell the truth, it is not only that his sympathies have been roused: he has something at stake. There is a principle of opposition strongly developed in Mr. Larche. He is not the man to accept a creed because his fathers believed it before him, or because it is the fashion. And well was it that Mrs. Larche, asking herself what her Lord and Master would have done were He on the earth, went at once to Mrs. Riche on hearing of her condition, comforted the children, reassured the servants, sent over whole meals ready cooked, soothed the sick woman, and relieved Mr. Riche, worn out between business and nursing, of the strain on body and nerves. For, seeing that, Mr. Larche now declared his belief in the inspiration of Christianity; 'for,' he argued, 'if there is a God, and a just God, then He must love all His creatures as His children, spite of differences of color, manner, and language, and all mankind are brothers. And if that be so, Christians could not dare to wave aside a lost and erring brother or sister, as the haughty Brahmin, in the pride of his purity, motions away the pariah from his road; for Christians must believe, if they believe at all, that Christ died for this lost man or woman also. There is in him not only our own blood and a common humanity, but something of God, and they dare not despise what had any thing of God in it, and that God still loves. This is what I have waited for; for many a philosopher and heathen creed has inculcated purity and self-denial, but God alone could inspire humanity with a love for what is fallen and inferior. Hitherto I have recognized my wife's virtues, but I despised her prejudices, her exclusive dogmas, her readiness to judge. I have hated the thought that religion sits safe and satisfied while believing that millions were perishing before its eyes finally and forever; and if my wife had refused to play the Samaritan to this woman, half dead by the road-side, I should have refused, once for all, a religion that consisted in a pew, a church, a Sunday-school, a genuflection in the creed, one hundred dollars a year to missions, and the sewing society. When God's children cry to Him for bread, He could never send them such stones as these.'

"I say again it was well that Mrs. Larche listened to the teachings of her Lord. Facts, not dead principles, are what are wanted by earnest, thinking men like Larche, and a thousand sermons could never have carried the conviction that did that one act of self-denying, womanly charity."

Mrs. Larche was very pale now. She had told her husband that morning "that she could not comprehend his interest in Mrs. Riche, for her part. When any respectable woman was ill he showed no such sympathy, and he must excuse her. She could not compromise herself by entering a house like Mrs. Riche's. It would make her ill to touch the woman. Let her husband, if he was her husband, bring some person who would be congenial to her to nurse her and look after his children."

Apparently unheeding, the angel made a final item.

"Any one occupying an exceptional or a professional position is very much at the same disadvantage as on the stage. All her neighbors have a decided conception about the way in which she should play her part, and are ready with criticism if she fails in any point. Such a part was that of Aline Raye, the minister's wife. For example, a minister's wife, in the eyes of the family Snyder, should be a pale woman with a pinched nose, entirely given over to flannels for the poor and prayer-meetings; with the family Nodyett, she should be a hearty, jolly woman, great on pickles, recipes, and neighborly offices; with the family Renche, a peculiarly spotless, refined, lady-like appearance was required, and an appreciation of Chopin; with the family Prigy, a mighty visitor was indispensable; and by every body she was expected to be the one woman in the parish wholly free from human infirmity, and never to make a slip or an imprudent observation, or to fail in tact, or patience, or costume, or strength, or smiles, or presence any where when she was wanted. Aline Raye, of whom all these impossibilities are expected, is sensitive and impressionable. She is entirely conscious on each occasion where she has failed to perform the impossibility, and divines all the strictures that follow. Proud and self-controlled, she shows no sign; she never complains even to her husband, for fear of adding to his cares; but were it not for the thoughtful sympathy, the moral support, of a leading lady like Mrs. Larche, it is difficult to say whether she could still continue the struggle to perform her manifold duties, knowing all the time that she is pleasing nobody. Breeze after a parching noon, dew to a withering flower, sunshine in gloom—all these and more is Mrs. Larche to her suffering, fainting sister in Christ. She fulfills the command, 'Bear ye one another's burdens.'"

This was intolerable. Only that day Mrs. Larche and other leading ladies had weighed, measured, and found wanting the parson's unfortunate wife. Thoughts of help! of cheering her way! Nothing could have been further from them. She only occurred to them as something in which to stick a pin—not to comfort. The question with them was, What were her duties? not if they owed any duties to her. Stung beyond bearing, Mrs. Larche started to her feet. But the golden gleam had faded; darkness filled the room. Probably Mrs. Larche had been dreaming.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

WE discussed music classes last time, and so I will say a few words to-day about the sister Muse, as presiding over painting and drawing classes. There are several good ones to be found in various parts of Paris, so it is not necessary to specify any one cours in particular. Perhaps, before entering on this new point, I had better mention for the benefit of those who wish to cultivate music professionally that the classes of the Conservatoire are open to all aspirants to musical proficiency, amateur or professional, but that it is a grievous mistake to imagine that the pupils receive private lessons from the masters of that establishment, or that the instruction provided for them en masse is at all adequate to the requirements of a serious student of music. The classes teach thorough bass, and they do this admirably; but if you want instrumental lessons, you must pay for them separately, and just as highly (from fifteen to twenty francs a lesson) as outside pupils do. So that the so-called gratuitous artistic education, when examined in detail, is a very meagre one indeed. Another point to which I feel bound to call the attention of strangers is the fearful risks a young girl runs in being thrown into such companionship as the aggregate of the Conservatoire pupils provides. They are recruited largely in the first instance from the concierge class, whose morality does not stand much higher than its education, and there is the usual contingent of Bohemianism among the artist class, of whose moral standard the less said the better. How far these serious dangers may be modified by having the pupil accompanied to the classes by a steady governess or matron of some sort, and waited for through the lessons, I can not really say; but no French mother, unless driven by unavoidable circumstances, would allow her daughter to go there alone. I can not recall an instance of any French girl of respectable position having been allowed to go there at all. But this is only the experience of one person. To Americans I would say that their best plan would be, for professional candidates, to follow a private cours and have lessons from some first-rate professor simultaneously. The concerts of the Conservatoire are excellent, and afford a very good lesson in themselves to those who are fortunate enough to get admittance to them; but the tickets are very difficult to obtain. And now about the drawing classes. There is a state school under the nominal superintendence of Rosa Bonheur, where the classes are free, and, as far as I can testify, quite unobjectionable. I know several young French girls who from time to time have gone there, and they never reported any thing disagreeable in this respect. But the teaching is not very satisfactory. I used the word "nominally" concerning Rosa Bonheur's superintendence with intention. The great artiste visits the ateliers for an hour once a week, perhaps, and goes round the easels and desks, scanning the work of each, and saying a word of kindly encouragement or of criticism, as it may happen. But Michael Angelo himself could not do much toward evolving the artistic powers of some hundreds of pupils with such opportunities as this. The fact is that, as in most large public competitions of this sort, the only ones who gain any thing from the presence of the master are the few who are sufficiently advanced to profit by a few words of wisdom directed to their special needs, hints or warnings that their style suggests to him, and which at a certain stage may be invaluable to a novice. To these few whose work interests him, and whose abilities are already developed to a certain point, the great master will devote as much as he can of his rapid supervision, and that little will be an immense gain to these pupils. But the rest derive no benefit whatever from his transient apparition in the studio or the music-hall. To these, then, I would say, study first at a good private drawing class. But make sure that the professor, male or female, be a competent one. Study from the block till you have mastered its difficulties, and then go to a studio where there are living models, and when you have got to a certain point there, go and copy at the Louvre or the Luxembourg. You have only to apply, with certain credentials within the access of all respectable applicants, to the Minister of Fine Arts, and he will send you a ticket of admission. Now that I think of it, I am not quite sure whether that functionary exists at present. But some one tantamount to him does, and there can be no difficulty in finding out his name and address from the porter at the Musée du Louvre, or one of the artists in the gallery. A branch of drawing that has been very fashionable of late in Paris, and that American young girls are fond of, is painting on china. It is very effective, not difficult, and very useful, so I will give you a few hints about it. It is rather difficult to get a desirable master or mistress in this style, for the artists are recruited, generally speaking, from a very low class. Your best plan would be to write to Sèvres, to the manufactory, and ask for the address of some artist belonging formerly to that establishment, who may be willing to give lessons in Paris. There was one lady, a very accomplished flower and fruit painter, who was for many years "first brush" in her special department at Sèvres, and who was, perhaps still is, in the habit of giving lessons to pupils at their own homes. The terms were fifteen francs for two hours. The pleasantest plan is for two to join in the lesson, which insures the stimulant of competition as well as divides the expense. It is by far the best plan to take a two hours' lesson instead of one. China colors require a good deal of preparation, and by the time you are thoroughly under way, and that your first coat of paint is laid on, the first hour is drawing to a close, and you will do just twice as much by continuing the lesson now as by taking another single hour at another time. The baking of the china is the most troublesome part of the performance. There are no ovens in the habitable side of the city. You must go to the Faubourg Poissonnière, and those remote regions around it, to get one, and you must be careful to choose a good one or you risk to have your chefs-d'œuvre broken in the cooking. But not to frighten you unduly by this warning, I must add that the writer has run the gantlet scores of times, and has never had an accident of any sort to deplore, not even a crack in the most delicate Sèvres china. By-the-way, I will tell you a secret. If you long—as all dabblers in this kind of art invariably do—for some Sèvres plates and cups whereon to immortalize your genius, don't buy what they offer you at the shops in Paris; they are shams; but go to Sèvres and make yourself as fascinating as you all can, you dreadful Americans, to the director of the manufactory who shows you over the place (you can get a ticket to visit it from the Minister of Public Works), and tell him this longing of your soul, and he will take you to the boutique, as they call it, where certain pieces of china not considered perfect by the artists of the place are set aside, and sold for very little. The painting entirely covers the flaw, which often no eye but that of a Sèvres artist could detect. You may in this way collect an entire service, and paint it yourself.

COMET.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

WILLIAM MORRIS is widely known in this country as well as in England as the author of Jason and the Earthly Paradise. Many who read and admire the books do not think of the author save as the scholar and man of culture who chooses the life of letters for his vocation, justifying it by success. But the poems which have made his name a household word are the result of his leisure hours, his recreation. His vocation is thorough-going hard work, with matter-of-fact prose details.

Many years ago a few earnest young men, each rich in the artist eye, hand, and heart, resolved in their own way to lift the world, and make it wiser, happier, better, because they had lived in it. Prominent among them were William Morris, Gabriel Dante Rossetti, Burn Johns, Marshall, Faulkner, etc.—their governing principle to be this: not to do the best art work the public would stand—i. e., could then appreciate—but absolutely the best they themselves were capable of producing.

The medium chosen was the creation of truthful designs for stained glass, wall-papers, carpets, furniture, and decorative art generally. From small beginnings in the various departments have grown large and important establishments and factories that to-day in their specialties stand unrivaled.

The first grand success which Mr. Morris achieved was in the stained glass displayed at the English Exposition, 1862 (now at Kensington). From that hour success was certain, and orders in that one branch have been constantly at least a year in advance. Of necessity such work as Morris & Co. give the world is expensive, and not yet within reach of the multitude. Much of it, however, is on exhibition from time to time, and its influence in reforming and educating public taste can not be limited or estimated.

We wish now to speak particularly about the Morris wall-papers. These are peculiarly unique both in coloring and design, the latter from Morris's own hand, the former under his special supervision. The most distinctive that have reached us are—

1. The Ferns. Groundwork, the tint known as réséda, or, to speak more intelligently, olive; the spray of fern thrown carelessly upon it with that perfectly artistic grouping that can only come from the closest study of nature. The ferns are in a lighter shade than the background, but the tracing and fine lines are dark. A lovely paper for a room where one wishes to hang pictures, the neutral tint, so soft yet so cool, forming an admirable background. For a finish above and below, a picture moulding a shade darker, with black lines either side, is charming; if preferred, a gilt edge can be used, however.

2. The Daisies. There are two styles of this pattern, securing entirely different effects by the use of different tints for the groundwork. The light daisy has a creamy ground, with the faintest suggestion of green—paler than Nile water, unless it were covered with foam. The daisies are in clusters, as you might gather them; pale pink, buff, or white, with real daisy leaves, not some nondescript growing from a stalk that might bear cabbages or roses. Each flower is distinctively and truthfully treated in the smallest detail. Among the daisies are a few bluebells and scarlet columbines, as carefully finished as the daisies. The dark daisy has an olive ground, rather deep in tone, heightening the hue of the flowers by contrast, permitting also warmer coloring: at all events, a selection of the brightest daisies the field afforded.

3. The Pomegranate or Fruit Pattern. The foliage is peculiar, suggesting foreign flavors in the fruit hanging so temptingly within reach—half grown, wholly grown, ripe, and unripe; here and there one with the rind divided, showing the crimson seeds. This also is repeated on dark and light grounds.

4. Rose and Trellis. Narrow bars in tints of brown, four to six inches apart, suggest old-time cottage casements; veritable roses, not woven arbitrarily, one in, one out, ad infinitum, but climbing freely, luxuriantly, as nature might dictate, throwing out sprays and leaves where sprays and leaves made themselves necessary; bright, warm June roses, hanging heavy and sweet, tempting the bluebirds and thrushes that stoop over them for their morning draught. A stray humming-bird or two are among the flutterers. Count the petals of the roses, if you will; trace the leaves; they, too, are studies from nature, not offsprings of the artist's fancy.

5. Birds and Arabesque. These are in white on a ground of blue, like the heavens in June, not the glittering blue of a frosty winter's day, but the soft, hazy blue that makes all things fresh and fair. This is repeated in gold tracery on a black or extremely dark ground.

6. The Jasmine. Newest of all; groundwork no tint that can be named, yet you can see it sometimes after sunset lying low above the horizon; neither gray nor blue nor green, still less yellow, but with a hint of each, the key-note, after all, being a sea tint. One sees it looking across a meadow to a woodland when the July sun is warm, and a greenish golden haze comes between the eye and the trailing vines of jasmine, with their odorous white blossoms. A single spray is worth study, as if for an illustrated botany.

To bring out into daily life, to have home, however small, a thing of beauty, because harmonious throughout, should be the central thought in decoration and furnishing. This is only possible when unity of purpose is preserved from the outset to the final line drawn and purchase made. To assist those who are sincere in the aspiration, but lack the fine artistic sense which makes success a matter of course, Morris & Co. have established a consulting office in London, where some member of the firm or a competent clerk is always in waiting to give advice, show specimens, etc. If desired, the plan of a house being given, they are ready to draft to the smallest detail designs for furniture, carpets, inlaid floors, wall-papers, carvings, and interior decorations of every kind.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

SEE that your trunk is in order before you begin to pack it. Many people find a strap torn, the lock broken, or the key minus just as they are going to start for the cars or boat. Don't expect the express-man to wait for you to put in last things, unless you also expect him to get angry. And it is not worth while to carry every change of dress you possess if you are only going for a week's stay at Saratoga. The wisest and best travelers do not burden themselves with unnecessary luggage. Allow time enough to reach cars or boat without hurrying. Nothing is more vexatious to the individual most interested or more ludicrous to lookers-on than a late-comer running after a steamboat or car which is fairly on its way. Dress plainly for traveling; flashy jewelry and showy or inappropriate garments indicate inexperienced vanity, lack of good taste, or want of good sound common-sense. There is no occasion to contract sudden intimacies with every one you meet on your journey; on the other hand, there is no need to be sullen or impolitely curt toward strangers. Some persons have the appearance of regarding the cars as their own private carriage, and every one who enters as an intruder on their personal rights. There is a happy medium which may be preserved between undue familiarity and exclusiveness, and which goes far toward making a comfortable and congenial traveling companion. In the arrangement of window or seat over which you may have temporary jurisdiction be mindful of the comfort of your neighbors. If the cinders fly into the eyes of the lady behind you from your open window, it may be kind to close it, though you yourself are not troubled by its remaining open. Do not be lunching all the time; take meals regularly if possible when traveling. We have seen gentlemen (?) who evidently thought the car floor was a spittoon, and ladies (?) who regarded it as a convenient receptacle for pea-nut shells and apple peelings. In entering and leaving public conveyances, is it necessary to suggest that one should consider those about him as susceptible of feeling, and not elbow and push his way about? A vivid remembrance assures us that a hint on this point is very much needed. A volume might easily be written giving simple suggestions about little details of manners, habits, and general courtesy, whereby the comfort of the great traveling public might be greatly increased. But this brief chapter will suffice for the present.

A sad incident occurred in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, the other day. Two young boys, one eight and the other five years old, were playing near that part of the lake which is enclosed by a wire fence. They crawled under it, and while rolling on the turf the older one slipped into the water. The younger, frightened, ran home; but when inquired of regarding his brother, did not tell of his falling into the water. The mother immediately went to the Park, however, and a search was instituted for the missing boy. His cap was found on the bank, and on dragging the lake his body was brought to shore.

The consumption of potatoes in Saratoga is large. At the Lake House it is the fashion not only to nibble a goodly quantity of this delicacy (fried, of course) while there, but to carry some away for future consumption. It is said that the proprietor sold no less than 13,000 packages of fried potatoes to the visitors of Saratoga in the season of 1872.

The trustees of Mount Holyoke Seminary have voted to erect a two-story brick building, seventy by fifty feet, for a science and art gallery. The new structure will stand south of the main building, with which it is to be connected, in a style similar to the library building, and will cost about $30,000. The basement is to contain a chemical laboratory, a museum, and lecture-rooms, while the upper story will be used for an art gallery. Probably, also, an observatory, with a complete set of astronomical instruments, will be added to the building. Mr. A. L. Williston, of Northampton, has given $7500 toward the cost of this new building. Deacon Andrew Porter, of Munson, Massachusetts, after thirty-seven years of faithful service, has resigned his position as treasurer of this institution, much to the regret of all. He has an able successor in Mr. Williston.

"Donner Lake" and "The Emerald Pool" are two paintings which were sent by Bierstadt to the Vienna Exhibition. For a long time these paintings could not be found, and it was supposed that they had failed to arrive. Probably the artist's name misled the managers of the Exhibition, for it has been ascertained that they were hung in the Belgian instead of the American department, and at last accounts still remained there.

A pretty incident is told concerning the Emperor of Germany when lately visiting a village in some portion of his dominion. After some welcoming exercises on the part of the school-children of the place, the Emperor thanked them, and then taking an orange from a plate, he asked, "To what kingdom does this belong?"

"The vegetable kingdom, sire," replied a little girl.

The Emperor took a gold coin from his pocket, and holding it up, asked, "And to what kingdom does this belong?"

"To the mineral kingdom, sire," replied the child.

"And to what kingdom do I belong, then?" asked the Emperor.

The little girl colored deeply, for she did not like to say "The animal kingdom," as he thought she would, lest his Majesty should be offended, when a bright thought came, and she said, with radiant eyes, "To God's kingdom, sire."

The Emperor was deeply moved. A tear stood in his eye. He placed his hand on the child's head, and said, most devoutly, "God grant that I may be accounted worthy of that kingdom."

The balloon trip to Europe across the Atlantic seems to be determined upon. Professor Wise, who has had great experience in aeronautics, is resolved to make the attempt, being confident of success. He has been advised by Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution, with whom he has had some correspondence on the subject, to make a preliminary voyage across the continent, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, which, if successful, would establish the practicability of the proposed enterprise. The question whether a balloon can be sustained at a sufficient height and for a sufficient length of time to make the journey can only be ascertained by actual experiment. The project is full of hazard; but Professor Wise is impressed with the conviction that the trial must be made, and is confident of ultimate success.

A well-known aeronaut, Professor La Mountain, met with a frightful death on the Fourth of July. He was to ascend in a balloon from Ionia, Michigan. Probably some of the apparatus was wrongly arranged, for soon after the balloon rose from the earth the canvas began to flap around with great violence, and when perhaps half a mile high the structure slipped between the ropes, and was instantly inverted. The unfortunate man descended with fearful velocity, clinging to the basket. Evidently he was conscious, as he struggled to raise the basket above him, hoping to use it as a parachute, and succeeded, but when about one hundred feet high he loosed his hold and folded his hands and arms before his face. He struck the ground with a dull, heavy thud, and was crushed into a literal pulp. Not a sign of motion or life was visible when he was reached. Medical examination disclosed the fact that hardly a whole bone was left. Many were ground and splintered to powder.

A reliable physician recommends dancing for old people. He says that they require it far more than the young. We understand that the doctor has organized a dancing class the junior member of which is a damsel of sixty-five, and the senior a lively lad who has just completed his eightieth year.

Yale College has revealed to the interested public a long list of important details respecting its late graduating class, such as that out of the 113 graduates thirteen might be called handsome, thirty-one are positively ugly, and the rest are intermediate; that seven are "engaged" (alas! only seven!); that the oldest is twenty-nine, and the youngest a little over nineteen; that sixty-nine smoke, forty-one have chosen law as a profession, and thirteen propose to try the ministry.

Times have changed indeed. A Savannah lady engaged as cook a colored girl who applied to her for the situation. After the arrangements were made the "new cook" desired to be shown to the room she was to occupy. The apartment was in the basement, comfortable, but not specially commodious. The colored damsel viewed the premises carefully, and then, shaking her head dubiously, said if that was the only room that could be given her she didn't think she could stay. The lady, in surprise, inquired why, when the accomplished cook replied that the room was not large enough to accommodate her "piano and sewing-machine;" and she left.

The Warm Spring Indians, who played so important a part in the Modoc war, derive their title from the fact that they reside on the Warm Springs Reservation, which lies at the eastern base of the Cascade Mountains. A large and singular hot spring is on this reservation, near which the Indians pitched their wigwams, having great faith in its curative effects. The water gushes out boiling hot from the spring, but is gradually cooled as it flows along through the canal, so that one can choose any point between the spring and the turbulent Warm Springs River for a bath, taking just the temperature he pleases. The waters are impregnated with sulphur, and are highly esteemed in rheumatic difficulties. These springs would be highly prized if they were pleasantly located in a more accessible region.

THE REGATTA.

REGATTAS have attained such a degree of popular favor that the scene depicted in our charming illustration may be found reproduced again and again during the fine season on the banks of almost every river and bay that affords a fair race-course for the ambitious athletes. We have yacht-races, college regattas, rowing matches, etc., every where; yet it is scarcely a quarter of a century since the first rowing match took place in the United States. This fact alone is a gratifying evidence of progress. In all our schools—boys' schools at least—physical culture is regarded as an indispensable adjunct to mental training, and athletic sports are assiduously cultivated. This we have borrowed from England, with many other good things; and an excellent thing it is if we are wise enough to avoid excess, and the dissipation of betting, which degrades a noble pastime.

We wish that the example could be followed in young ladies' schools, and that sufficient care could be bestowed on the physical training of our girls to insure a generation of healthy American women, who could walk, ride, row, and swim with as much ease as their more fortunate brothers.

FRENCH HOME LIFE.

MOST French people content themselves, like their neighbors in other countries, with rumbling carelessly through marriage, making no attempt to improve it, and not even suspecting that it is capable of improvement. And yet, thanks to their light, laughing natures, they generally keep clear of gloom. They bring into married life the bright cheeriness which is so frequently an attribute of their race; they stave off worry by insouciance; they support annoyances with a coolness which in their case is not indifference, but which, to an unpracticed foreign eye, looks so singularly like it that it is difficult at first to fix the point where calm patience appears to end and indifference seems to begin.

There are, however, contradictions in abundance to this rule of quietly supporting cares. Frenchmen have sometimes in their character so many of the faults which elsewhere are supposed to be the property of women only that they are capable of growing fidgety and nervous to a scarcely credible degree; and woe to the unlucky wife who stumbles on a husband of that species!—he wears her out with teasing. Gentle and affectionate as the men ordinarily are, there are some among them who are absolutely intolerable at home. Luckily they form an infinitely small minority; otherwise it would be nonsense to pretend that French marriages, on the whole, are happy. The evidence which can be collected by listening to opinions, including ill-natured scandal in all its forms, tends certainly to show that, according to their impressions of each other, most Frenchmen are singularly forbearing toward their wives; they do not make the most of them, but their habit is to treat them with much softness, with constant consideration, with deference and courtesy. It is far from easy to discover really unhappy marriages in France: here and there are isolated instances, evident to every one, for they have terminated in voluntary separation; but the testimony of society, and particularly of the women, who are not more charitable toward each other in France than they are in other lands, in no way indicates any multiplicity of failures. The impossibility of divorce creates a strong motive for mutual concessions, with the object of soothing away asperities, and of rendering obligatory companionship supportable if not agreeable. As for absolute infidelity on either side, it is now so rare that it is often possible to look round a large circle of intimate acquaintance without being able to point out one example of it. This assertion may seem absurd and false to that large group of our people which, though in total ignorance of the facts, grows up, lives, and dies in the contrary conviction; but the assertion is strictly, literally true. The marriage tie is vigorously felt in France: husbands and wives cleave there to each other, and do not now seek for illicit joys, whatever some of them may have done in days gone by. Indeed, they point to England at this moment as the country which produces palpably the largest amount of conjugal irregularity, and quote in proof, with bitter justice, the shameless details of the Divorce Court which are given in the newspapers. We have grown accustomed to this odious publicity: habit blinds us to its dangers and its indecency; but if we could hear foreigners talk about it—if we knew the impression of disgust which it creates in France, where the rare cases of co-respondency are treated criminally, and are always pleaded with closed doors; where husbands do not receive money damages for their wives' dishonor—we should perhaps be led to recognize that, in this question, we do not offer a satisfying spectacle to the world, and that we have lost all right to throw stones at others. We are unable to judge ourselves on such a subject: we must submit to the verdict of lookers-on; and a very painful one it is for us to support.

AN AUTUMN FLOOD.—[FROM THE PICTURE BY C. E. JOHNSON IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY.]

AN AUTUMN FLOOD.

THIS engraving is from a picture by Mr. C. E. Johnson, which has recently attracted some attention at the exhibition of the Royal Academy at London. The wild waste of swirling, turbid waters is powerfully depicted, the clouds are still lowering, and seem to promise an addition to the already abundant rain-fall. Overhead the birds are circling in flocks, driven, doubtless, from their usual places of resort by the watery deluge, though some among them, especially those which fly high and keep apart from the rest, are possibly on the look-out for the dead carcasses of sheep or other animals which are pretty sure to be hurried down by the raging flood. The thickly wooded island stands like a haven of refuge in the midst of the whirling waters, yet few would care to choose it for an abiding-place, not knowing what height the flood may reach. It is at such times as these that cottagers and others whose homesteads are threatened anxiously watch the memorials notched on trees, or notified by stakes thrust into the ground, feeling hopeful that the flood will not pass the limits of the famous deluge which was the chief event in the life of some patriarch of the village.

JOHN'S GONE OFF TO-DAY!

BY JOHN H. YATES.

It has come about! I feared it would; yes, John's gone off to-day,
And left me alone on a mortgaged farm without any means to pay:
Gone off with the very woman who has hated me for years,
Who has planted my path with thorns, while I watered them with my tears.

Perhaps 'tis foolish to mourn; perhaps 'tis better so:
When love goes out of the dwelling, the loveless man should go.
But the heart can't let go quickly from the one it has loved so long,
Though suddenly comes the tempest, though terrible be the wrong.

I gave him my youthful love in the far home over the sea.
Through all the years of our wedded life his heart has been true to me,
Till this woman came to our table, with her fine sheep's clothing on,
To prove but a wolf, as she has to-day, by running away with John.

It is hard to work, as I have worked, for love and a home when old,
Then find I have garnered nothing but fond hopes dead and cold.
It is hard to love, as I have loved, then hear the old neighbors say,
John wouldn't have done this wrong but I scolded him night and day.

There isn't the proof in Scripture that Adam was drove to sin;
There isn't a wife around here more patient than I have been:
A woman's tongue may drive a man out of the house for a while,
But to lead him astray from Wisdom's way, there's nothing like her smile.

'Twas the smile of this evil woman, 'twas the honeyed words of her tongue,
That shattered love's golden bowl, and love's tuneful harp unstrung.
When the serpent's charm is broken, and John comes back to his mind,
He will sigh again for the true love of the heart he has left behind.

Will I run to the door to meet him? Will I welcome him home with a kiss?
Supposing I do it, neighbor, will that be doing amiss?
It's dangerous sailing without the man who has been at the helm so long,
And they who are prone to evil should learn to forgive a wrong.

I often take my Bible, the well-worn one on the stand,
And read of the prodigal son coming home from that famine land.
Didn't the father run to meet him? Didn't he kiss his repenting boy,
And order the fatted calf killed to make him a feast of joy?

So will I welcome John when his wayward race is run:
Is not a prodigal husband as good as a prodigal son?
If I forgive his trespasses, obeying the law divine,
The Lord who pities the erring will surely pardon mine.

It will come about, it will; yes, John will come home soon;
Together we'll mend love's broken bowl, love's golden harp we'll tune;
Then the fatted calf I'll kill, and the news I'll spread around—
My John, though dead, is alive again; though lost, he now is found.

THE LADY'S CROSS.

I.

ONE morning in September, a few years ago, a cheerful party was assembled at breakfast in the dining-room of Earnscliffe Castle. It consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Chester, their eldest son, their only unmarried daughter, and one guest—Sir Eustace Vaughan. Sir Eustace had not known the Chesters long. He had made acquaintance with the son the previous autumn, when both were guests of a common friend at his Highland shooting-box. He had afterward spent a few days at Earnscliffe for some winter gayeties there; he had subsequently seen a good deal of the Chesters in London, and had now been for two or three days at Earnscliffe as the sole guest, finding the family party so pleasant that he looked upon as an unmitigated nuisance the numerous other friends who were expected that day to fill the house for a ball in the neighborhood on the following evening.

"What are we all going to do to-day?" said Harry Chester as they left the breakfast-table.

"I have to take the chair at a meeting in Bridgefield," said his father.

"Maude and I are going over to Lindenwood to luncheon," said Mrs. Chester. "I shall order the carriage at half past twelve, Maude."

"Very well, mamma. It is such a lovely morning that I think I shall go out at once and finish my sketch of Sir Randal's Oak. Will you pick me up at the lodge? I will be ready when I hear the carriage."

Mrs. Chester acquiesced in Maude's proposal and left the room.

"Then we may as well take out our guns, Vaughan?" said Harry.

His friend agreed.

A quarter of an hour later Maude passed through the hall, her drawing materials in her hand, and a cloak over her arm. Maude Chester was not beautiful, but she was a pretty, attractive girl, with a graceful figure, and a countenance full of life and feeling and intelligence. This morning, in her fresh, tasteful summer dress, she looked remarkably well, and so Sir Eustace Vaughan, who was idling in the hall as she passed, evidently thought.

"Waiting for Harry, Sir Eustace?" said Maude, gayly. "He is always so unpunctual!"

"He is writing a note," said Sir Eustace, who could not, in strict truth, be said to have been waiting for Harry. "He won't be ready this half hour. Let me carry your things to the river for you, and tell him to follow us."

Maude acquiesced with a bright blush and smile. She was beginning to feel that Sir Eustace preferred her society to her brother's, and the knowlege was pleasant to her. Sir Eustace looked into the library, and said, "I am going to the river with your sister, Chester; you can overtake me."

"All right," responded Harry, and Sir Eustace and Maude set off together.

Turning away from the terrace and flower garden, a flight of steps and a short steep path led them to the foot of the wooded cliff overhanging the river Earne. They took a broad, well-kept path which followed the downward course of the stream, there being just room for it between the cliff and the river on that side, while on the other the rocks came sheer down into the water. The path was cool and shady, for the trees on the banks nearly formed an arch over the narrow gorge; the river, low as it was after the long summer drought, still splashed with pleasant murmurs along its stony bed, and trickled in tiny falls over the rocks into clear pools, reflecting each leaf of the overhanging foliage, while enough sunlight found its way through the trees to play here and there upon the water. It was very beautiful, but neither Maude nor her companion spoke their admiration. Silence is perhaps the highest tribute. Five minutes' walk brought them to the end of the little gorge. The cliffs beyond where they stood subsided into sloping, park-like, tree-studded meadows. Sir Randal's Oak, in all its stateliness, was the nearest single tree, and just beyond it was a graceful single-arch bridge. Maude broke the silence, which was becoming rather embarrassing.

"Here, if you please," she said, pointing to the trunk of a fallen tree; and Sir Eustace spread her cloak for her to sit upon, and placed her drawing materials on the bank by her side.

"It is beautiful, is it not?" said Maude. "Almost too lovely to be profaned by one's attempts to paint it! And to think that this horrible railway is to cross the river here and spoil it all!"

"Here?" said Sir Eustace. "Well, Miss Chester, prosaic though you think me, I sympathize with you. Does it really come here?"

"Yes," replied Maude. "And papa and Harry say we are lucky, for it will just cut off a tiny corner of the park, and not be visible from the house, nor from any part of the grounds except the bridge here, which I suppose need not be very ugly. But I can not bear the idea of its crossing here, going right through the Lady's Rock and destroying her Cave."

"The Lady's Rock?" said Sir Eustace. "Which is that?"

"Have you not heard its story?" said Maude. "It is too romantic to please you. That wall of lichen-covered rock opposite to us is called 'The Lady's Rock,' and in it, below the level of the water, even when the river is low, there is an opening into a cave. There, according to the story, an ancestress of ours once concealed herself from her father rather than marry her cousin (the next heir, after herself and her sister, to her father's lands), for she loved the son of a neighboring baron, with whom the Chesters were always quarreling. Sir Randal, the same who planted that oak, swore that Adeline should marry her cousin at once, or take the veil. Adeline, horribly frightened, promised submission, and her wedding was to take place the next day; but she fled in the night and concealed herself in this cave, which in those days could be easily entered when the river was low. She sent a messenger whom she could trust to Alan Radclyffe, to tell him where she was, that he might come and carry her off. He did come, before daybreak; but even in those few hours all was changed. There had been heavy rain in the west for some days previously, and the water had come down from the moors, as it does sometimes even now in spite of modern drainage, in a sudden torrent, swelling the river and flooding the cave. It was quite impossible to get in. The entrance was deep under water, and the current frightfully strong; but there was a possible hope that Adeline might still be safe in some of the inner recesses of the cave where there were high ledges of rock. Alan Radclyffe went boldly to Sir Randal and told him where Adeline was, and entreated him to send every man within call who could use a spade to turn the course of the river in the meadows above the gorge, and so enable them to enter the cave and search for her. Sir Randal refused, and had Alan Radclyffe shut up in the castle dungeon; and when the flood subsided Adeline's lifeless body was found in the cave. The old Baron Radclyffe besieged Earnscliffe Castle to rescue his son. He took it; Sir Randal was killed, and Alan set free. They raised a monument to Adeline, the ruins of which still stand in the park, and Alan went to the Crusades and was killed soon afterward; but his younger brother, Hubert, married Isabella Chester, Adeline's sister, and from them we are descended, for their second son inherited the lands of Earnscliffe, and took the name of Chester. Since that time the current of the river has changed. That memorable flood moved some rocks below, so that the pool by the cave became much deeper, and it is very, very rarely that the water is low enough for the opening into the cave to be seen. Sometimes it is so, and then a cross, cut in the rock in memory of Adeline, is visible; but it is supposed to be a bad omen if it is seen by one of us. The saying is:

"'Each daughter of Sir Randal's line
Who sees the Lady's Cross and Shrine
Must look for trouble, pain, and strife,
And live unwedded all her life.'"

"And have you any family records of its truth being tested?" said Sir Eustace, with a smile. "Have there been any victims to a sight of the cross?"

Maude laughed. "One or two; but I shall not tell their stories to such a nineteenth-century spirit as yours. Even you, however, must allow that a rock and cave with such a history are more interesting than a railway bridge?"

"Yes, I admit that," said Sir Eustace. "But then, from this time forward, future Chesters will be free from the shadow of such a mysterious omen."

"Yes, I am the last of my race to whom it can appear," said Maude, lightly. "Before next summer those wretched engineers will have blasted the rock to pieces."

"Are you superstitious, Miss Chester?" asked Sir Eustace. "Would a sight of the fatal cross alarm you?"

Maude colored slightly. "I do not think I am particularly superstitious, but I would rather not see it; and I think if I knew that it were visible I should avoid this path until the water covered it again. I give you leave to laugh at me, Sir Eustace, but I think most people in my place would feel the same about it."

Sir Eustace did not laugh, he did not even answer, and Maude looked up, surprised.

"I beg your pardon," he said then. "My thoughts were wandering to what you said at breakfast this morning."

"What did I say?" said Maude, smiling. "That it was a fine morning, but rather hot, or something equally original, I am afraid."

"You spoke of Colonel Wardour's engagement to Miss Temple, and you said you could take no interest in it, because last year he had been so much in love with some one else. Do you never believe in a second love?"

"One must believe in such an every-day fact," replied Maude; "but I don't think it very interesting. Do you?"

"People seldom marry their first love," said Sir Eustace. "Men especially often entangle themselves first in some foolish affair, and may thank Heaven for their escape, if escape they do. I do not say that a heart which has loved thus unwisely can ever be quite the same again, but it may be by no means an extinct volcano, and its second affection, if calmer, may be far deeper and truer, far better worth acceptance, than its first passion."

Maude was silent. What could she have said?

"I speak from experience," continued Sir Eustace. "Miss Chester, will you have patience while I tell you of myself? Last summer, in the Tyrol, I met a girl traveling with her father, who charmed me completely. She was beautiful, but her beauty seemed to me her least attraction. The same hotel was our head-quarters for some time, and I was with them day after day, seeing her in all the intimacy of long excursions taken together, of hours of uninterrupted companionship. I loved her, how well I will not attempt to conceal from you, and I waited only to feel sure of success before asking her to be my wife. At her father's invitation I joined them in traveling home, and day by day my hopes grew, till at length I was sure that she understood and encouraged me."

He paused, and Maude looked up in silent, eager interest.

"Luckily for me," he continued, "I was undeceived in time. We stopped at Baden-Baden, intending to spend a few days there. On the evening of our arrival, among the crowd sitting under the trees in the public promenade was a group which attracted my attention. They were evidently foreigners of distinction—a Russian prince, I afterward found, with his wife and two little boys with an English tutor. As we passed them, the tutor, as if recognizing my companions, rose and came toward us. With a start of surprise, and a degree of emotion which made her deadly pale, Helen stopped, but her father drew her on hurriedly and authoritatively. After that she was silent, and soon said she was tired, and wished to go in. We took her to the door of the Hôtel d'Angleterre. As she left us, her father said to her in an aside which I could not avoid hearing, 'I forbid you to see or speak to him, and you will be ready to leave Baden to-morrow morning.' She made no answer, but went up stairs, and her father, declining any farther walk, turned into the reading-room of the hotel. I went back to the promenade, ascertained who the foreigners were, and the name and position of the young Englishman with them, and then wandered about, too much disturbed by this mystery to pay much attention to any thing around me, until I saw, not far from me, under a tree, Helen's maid giving a note to the English tutor. I passed close to them. I felt like a spy, but I could not help doing it; and I heard him say, 'In the avenue, tell her, to-morrow morning at six o'clock.' I think I was justified in going to the avenue myself the next morning; at any rate I went. I hoped not to see her, but she came. I saw them meet, and the manner of their meeting, and then I had seen enough. I had neither the right nor the desire to watch her farther. It half maddened me—can you wonder? I had thought her as good and pure and true as she was charming; and to find such falsehood, such utter want of delicacy and dignity! to know that she must have been either heartlessly trifling with me or willfully duping me, and that she could stoop to deceive her father, and make a secret appointment with her lover through her maid! I could not doubt the evidence of my senses, and I resolved not to see her again. I walked about the woods for some hours, and when I returned to the hotel they were already gone. Her father had left a note for me, apologizing for so abruptly deserting me—'circumstances which he could not explain obliged him to leave Baden at once.' He gave me his address in England, and hoped to see me there some day. I also left Baden that day; but I did not follow them, and we have not met since. The pain of those days was sharp, Miss Chester; but would you, therefore, condemn me to a solitary life forever? Would you forbid me ever again to seek for love and happiness? Or may I not, when I have found a woman with all Helen's charms, and with the truth and purity which she had not, try my fate at least on equal terms with others? I have told you all the truth, Maude. Will you refuse to believe that I can love again deeply and truly, and with perfect trust that I can think of the past only with gratitude for my escape?"

Maude had not again looked up while Sir Eustace spoke. She had sat perfectly still, one hand in the river, letting the water trickle over it, and her eyes fixed upon it. She looked up when he ceased speaking. What was she going to say? Suddenly an expression of bewildered surprise crossed her face, already pale with agitation, and hastily starting from her seat, she pointed across the river. Some mysterious agency had been at work; the bed of the river was nearly dry, and opposite to them the Lady's Cross was distinctly visible, cut deep in the rock at the mouth of the cave. An exclamation of astonishment escaped Sir Eustace; then turning to Maude, he said:

"You are not frightened—you will not let such a trifle affect you?"

Before Maude could answer, her brother's joyous voice from the bridge above them broke the silence:

"I say, you two! You look so picturesque down there, it's a pity you should not be photographed. Come, Vaughan; Wilkinson has gone on with the guns and the dogs, and will meet us at Woodend farm."

Sir Eustace felt that he must go; but he did not like to leave Maude, and he lingered. She had recovered her self-possession enough to say, quietly:

"I know what it is. They have stopped the water higher up to prepare for beginning their work here. I am not superstitious; but do not speak of this to Harry, or to any one, till I have seen you again. Promise," she added, earnestly.

"I promise," he replied. "Will you, too, promise to think of what I have said? My happiness depends on your answer, Maude."

"Yes, I will think," said Maude, slowly; and Sir Eustace, obeying her sign to him to leave her, sprang up the bank and joined Harry on the bridge.

Maude watched them till they were out of sight, and then with a shudder she buried her face in her hands.

II.

It was long before Maude looked up, and when she did so her face was pale and troubled. The same view was before her in all its beauty, but she no longer saw it. One idea filled her mind—a temptation beset her. Sir Eustace Vaughan loved her, and she could not blind herself to the fact that no other blessing of life could be half so precious to her as his affection. Happiness as perfect as any this world has to offer was within her reach, and yet she might not grasp it. She had recognized the story he had told her; she knew that he had been entirely mistaken; that Helen was as innocent and true as herself; and she felt that she must tell him this, and in doing so destroy all her own hopes of happiness. True, she need not do it; he had mentioned no names; he would never know either that she had guessed to whom he had referred, or that there was any explanation of the story to be given. She had only to be silent, and their next meeting must confirm his engagement to herself. It was in her power to become his wife if she chose. Should she do so? The temptation was strong. He loved her, and that love was returned. She recalled all the pleasant days of their growing knowledge of each other; she thought of his many valuable qualities, of his charming manners; she saw herself his wife, the mistress of his beautiful home, doing her utmost to make him happy, and succeeding. Yes, she felt that she should succeed, and that he would never regret the past if he were now left in ignorance of the true explanation of Helen's conduct. But conscience, honor, generosity, and innate truth all made her feel that she must speak, at whatever cost to herself. When summoned to join her mother she had made up her mind.

Maude was the youngest child of a happy home, the darling of parents, brothers and sisters, and friends; her nineteen years of life had been very sunny, and this first cloud was dark and heavy. But, though young and untrained to sorrow, Maude was brave and unselfish. As she rose to leave her seat she gazed once more upon the still visible Lady's Cross, and paused before she turned away. Thoughts crowded upon each other in her mind. The strangeness of the coincidence; the tale of sorrow she had told so lightly but a short time ago, without an idea of its coming home to herself; a comparison of her own lot and Adeline's; the full meaning of the emblem engraved there in memory of her; and then a solemn silent vow to accept the cross appointed for her, and bear its burden unflinchingly, be it as heavy as it might.

"Have you finished your sketch, dear?" said Mrs. Chester, as Maude took her place beside her in the carriage.

"No, mamma; I was very idle," replied

Maude; and her mother guessed that Sir Eustace had been lingering with her, and asked no more.

Maude talked to her mother as usual during their drive; she made conversation and played croquet with the young people at Lindenwood; but all the time she felt as if it were not real, as if she were asleep. As they drove home in the afternoon Mrs. Chester was silent, and Maude was free to think of the task before her. She must speak, and that without delay, for Helen Anson and her father were among the guests expected at Earnscliffe that day. How should she make an opportunity? and, when made, how find courage for such an explanation? Flattering hopes would sometimes rise that perhaps Sir Eustace's love was really hers now, and would not be turned back again; but then came the thought of Helen, of her beauty and sweetness, and she felt that such hopes were vain. The position for all parties must be embarrassing, and it must be her part to make it as little so as possible.

When the carriage drove up to the door at Earnscliffe the two young men were just coming home from shooting. Harry turned off to the kennels with the keeper, to see a lame pointer, and Sir Eustace came forward to help the ladies. Mrs. Chester went in-doors at once to be ready to receive her guests, who might arrive at any moment; and Maude made a desperate resolution.

"I left my drawing-block and colors by the river this morning, and must go for them," she said. "Will you come, Sir Eustace?"

Sir Eustace had fully intended securing a private interview with Maude before dinner, and had, in fact, dragged Harry home early on purpose, but he was rather startled by Maude so coolly taking the initiative. It offended his somewhat fastidious taste. There was silence till they reached the walk by the river; then Maude spoke:

"You told me a story this morning, Sir Eustace, which you must forgive me for alluding to again. Were not you speaking of Helen Anson?"

"Yes," he said, much surprised.

Maude went on quickly:

"I felt sure of it, for I know the other side of the story, and must undeceive you. Helen Anson is my cousin and intimate friend. She was at Baden last summer, and, when there, made exactly the appointment you describe, but it was with her brother."

"It was no brother," Sir Eustace said, sarcastically. "You have heard some plausible story, I suppose, but the gentleman I saw her meet was a Mr. Hamilton. We will not talk about it now, though, when there is so much else to say."

"In justice to Helen and to you, I must speak," said Maude, firmly. "Her youngest brother is tutor to the two sons of a Russian prince. Poor Regie! We were all very sorry for him. He was careless and extravagant at Oxford, and left it horribly in debt. Uncle Anson, pleasant as he is in society, is something like old Sir Randal at home, and would only consent to pay the money if Regie would take orders, and a family living which an uncle would give him. This he would not do. He was not fitted for the Church, was disinclined to it, and would not take orders from such a motive. Uncle Anson was furious and implacable, and Regie was sent away without any allowance, and was forbidden ever to return home or to speak to his father again. He could not stay in England because of these debts, and thankfully took the appointment of this tutorship in Russia, which a friend was able to procure for him. He is highly paid, and is fairly happy and comfortable, but it was altogether a wretched business, and Helen especially felt the prohibition even to correspond with him. She could hear of him only through Harry. He has dropped the name of Anson, and is known only by his two Christian names—'Reginald Hamilton.' I think she was fully justified in her disobedience at Baden; but I little thought, when she told me of her meeting him there, that it had caused so serious a misunderstanding."

They had reached the rocks where Maude had sat in the morning; but the river was again flowing peacefully over the cave and its cross. The engineers had made their preliminary investigations, and no more was to be done at present. Maude collected her property, and then turned to Sir Eustace, who had stood in silent, painful perplexity.

"The Ansons come here to-day," she said. "It is lucky that you know the truth before you and Helen meet."

"She might have trusted me then," said Sir Eustace, bitterly.

Maude pitied him. He was in an unusually awkward dilemma.

"According to your own showing, she had no reason to suppose that you knew any thing about it," she said, gently. "You never met after she first recognized Regie. She could have no clew to the cause of your silence after their hurried departure. Was not the want of trust yours rather than hers? If you had asked for an explanation—"

"Miss Chester, you are cousins and friends, you say; then may I ask—you probably know—"

"I know nothing," replied Maude. "Helen never even spoke of you as an acquaintance, from which I imagine that the subject has been a painful one to her. But she comes here to-day, so that every thing can now be explained; and I hope she will quickly forgive your unjust suspicions of her."

"It had better rest unexplained," said Sir Eustace. "She never knew of my suspicions; so she need not be asked to forgive them. It is too long ago. Let it rest between ourselves. You can not have forgotten what I asked this morning, and what you promised."

"I promised to think," said Maude, "and I have thought; and the result of my thoughts I have told you."

"You do not understand me," began Sir Eustace.

"I think I do," said Maude, gravely, and she raised her eyes and met his unshrinkingly; "and I want you to understand me. In telling you all I know, I have done what I can to promote Helen's happiness and yours. If I can help you farther, you have only to tell me."

Sir Eustace stood in irresolute silence. Every impulse of feeling prompted him to accept Maude's sacrifice; but he felt dreadfully guilty toward her.

"You are generous, Maude," he said at length. "May I really hope that you will forgive—"

"I have nothing to forgive," said Maude, simply. Then, with a changing color, she added, "My knowledge of the truth canceled your words to me as they were spoken, and I need not answer them. I adhere to my theory in favor of a first love. Make your peace with Helen, and let me welcome you as a cousin as soon as possible. My fate we know," she added, lightly, pointing across the stream. "But keep our sight of the Lady's Cross to yourself. I should not like to have it talked about and laughed at. Now I must go in."

Before he could answer she had turned up a steep path leading to the back of the Castle. She trusted that she had played her part well, and had not betrayed herself. She was proud as well as brave, and she felt that no one must know her trouble. She would bear her cross without a murmur; but she must bear it in secret. If its weight were known, she felt that she must sink under it.

Sir Eustace's reverie after Maude left him was a painful one. Great as was the happiness of knowing Helen to be all he had ever thought her, and still free, it was almost counterbalanced by genuine regret for the unpleasant position in which he had placed Maude. In the eyes of her parents and brother he had virtually avowed himself her lover, and must appear to have treated her very badly. He felt keenly all the difficulties and disagreeables of his position, and paced the bridge walk till it grew dark, and the stable clock struck seven, and the dressing-bell rang. He was almost tempted to play the coward, leave Earnscliffe at once on some extemporized plea, and then write to Helen; but he did not: he went in and dressed for dinner like other people.

III.

Meanwhile numerous guests had arrived and were assembled in the library, where tea was going on.

"Where is Maude?" asked Helen Anson of her cousin, Harry Chester.

"Studying the picturesque by the river with a friend of mine," said Harry, in a low voice, with a mischievous smile. "The beauties of nature, as seen on our banks, have great attractions for Maude and Sir Eustace Vaughan."

Helen was sitting in shadow, her face was scarcely visible.

"Is Sir Eustace staying here?" she asked.

"Yes. Do you know him?" said Harry.

"We met him last summer in the Tyrol."

"He is capital company generally," said Harry. "But just at present he keeps it all for Maude's benefit."

Helen made no answer, and Maude at the moment entered the room.

When the ladies dispersed to their rooms Maude lingered in Helen's, wishing to warn her of Sir Eustace being at Earnscliffe, yet hardly knowing how to introduce his name. She spoke of the other people in the house, intending to mention him casually, and failed; then she looked at Helen's dress for the ball the next evening, and compared it with her own, but that did no good; at last, as Helen's maid came in, she said, quickly,

"Will you come to my room and go down with me, or be independent? You know all the people except Harry's friend, Sir Eustace Vaughan."

"Harry said he was here," said Helen, turning away as she spoke. "We met him in the Tyrol last summer." She was determined to avoid an introduction.

The evening passed as such evenings usually do. Maude talked and laughed, and did her part as the daughter of the house with unflagging spirit. But she saw how anxiously Sir Eustace watched Helen; she saw the nervousness that changed his manner when he spoke to her, and she could not doubt that he really loved her; as little could she doubt that Helen had loved and still did love him.

There was little rest for Maude that night. She could not repress all sense of ill usage and neglect, but she resisted resolutely all bitter feelings, and schooled herself to think that a true affection for Sir Eustace must lead her to wish his happiness, even if in securing it she destroyed her own. She fell asleep late, and dreamed that she was Adeline, and alone in the darkness of the Lady's Cave. She heard the rushing of the rising water, and she struggled to get out, and then she heard Alan Radclyffe say in Sir Eustace's voice, "It is better for her to be thus at rest forever than to live and know that Helen is my wife." And then she turned again into the cave, longing for death, and woke with a start, to find her maid in the room, and that it was time to get up. She braced her nerves as best she could, and went down to breakfast. Afterward she organized a croquet match, which included all the young people of the party except Helen, who was "afraid of the heat," and Sir Eustace, who had "letters to write." Maude hoped that somehow they would come to an understanding during the morning. The croquet match was not finished at luncheon-time, and Maude, lingering for a moment behind the rest of the party to lay her mallet close by her own ball, was joined by Sir Eustace. She forced a smile.

"Are you come to be congratulated?" she said.

"No," he replied. "When you go in you will hear that I am unexpectedly obliged to shorten my visit, and am going at once. I am on my way to make my excuses to Mrs. Chester; but you have a right to know the truth. I have seen your cousin. She positively refuses to forgive my having doubted her, and will have nothing to say to me. After that I can not stay here. I am sure you will understand. Some day I hope that we may meet again under happier conditions; but I can never thank you enough for your kindness to me in this difficulty. Good-by."

He held out his hand; Maude's did not meet it. She conquered the impulse to let them part without remonstrance.

"Not good-by yet," she said, gently. "Let me advise you this once, Sir Eustace. That Helen is already repenting her decision, I do not doubt: she was angry, I dare say. You can not wonder. But that she loves you, I am certain. She has very likely received some false impression. Let me speak to her, and explain—"

"There is nothing to explain; I told her every thing," said Sir Eustace, proudly. "That she should be angry at first was natural; but her final refusal was unreasonable and decisive. I can do no more; I do not see that I have any choice but to go."

"Except to stay and try again," said Maude.

"If I thought"—began Sir Eustace. "I put myself in your hands, Miss Chester. That I truly love your cousin, you know; her doubts of that were unjust."

Maude was very pale.

"Unfounded—scarcely unjust," she said. "If you told her all, she might easily misunderstand. Let me see her before you go, and ascertain if her refusal meant more than temporary resentment."

"I will be guided by you entirely," said Sir Eustace, forgetting—in his preoccupation with his own hopes and fears—what a difficult and possibly painful task he was allowing Maude to undertake.

"Then go in to luncheon, and leave Helen to me," said Maude.

Sir Eustace obeyed, and Maude went at once to her cousin's room. The door was locked; but in answer to her urgent entreaty it was opened. Helen's face showed traces of great agitation; but in reply to Maude's gentle inquiry, "What is the matter?" she said, with proud resentment, "Nothing."

"Oh, Helen, you can not expect me to believe that nothing, or even a trifle, has caused this distress. I have just seen Sir Eustace, and I am come to scold you."

"For what? I am surely free to decide such a question as I please."

"Of course you are, but that does not make it rational to decide so hastily as you have done, and I want you to retract while you can." Helen was silent. Maude went on, "I don't wonder at your being angry at his ever having thought such things possible; but the apparent evidence against you was strong, and at any rate it can not be wise to throw away your happiness to gratify your resentment."

Helen turned quickly toward her.

"You can not judge of what is for my happiness, Maude; and as for his, he will soon console himself."

Maude felt the insinuation keenly, but she said, quietly,

"I see that he has really told you, as he said he had, every thing."

"Yes. He was frank!" said Helen, bitterly. "And he was wise; he has satisfied his conscience, and insured my leaving him free."

"You are unjust now, Helen, and you know it," said Maude, firmly and rather indignantly. "He told you all, where many would have told you only half; and he was right, for there ought to be no mystery between you. But you are ungenerous now. I will not pretend not to understand your grievance, but it is unreasonable. As soon as he had heard my story, any child could have seen that he repented of his words to me in the morning. You need have no doubt of his love for you. I have none. And if you are worthy of it, you will confess frankly that you have been hasty, and will let me tell him that he need not go away."

Helen's answer was a silent caress, which Maude interpreted into full powers to say what she chose. What farther explanations took place during the afternoon, no one exactly knew. But at the ball in the evening Sir Eustace and Helen were dancing together so often as to excite observation, and it gradually became known to all the Earnscliffe party that they were engaged to each other. There had been a general impression that Maude Chester was to be Lady Vaughan, but only her own family were in a position to be really much surprised. They naturally felt that Maude's peace had been shamefully trifled with, and were anxious for her, and angry with Sir Eustace; though for the sake of her dignity their resentment could not be shown. Maude herself, however, danced away so brightly with all her usual partners, and was so often to be seen in such evidently friendly conference with Sir Eustace when dancing with him, as she did repeatedly, that even her mother began to think she had been mistaken about it.

"You look tired, Maude," said Mrs. Chester, as they stood for a moment at her bedroom door at six o'clock in the morning.

"Do I?" said Maude. "Daylight and tatters after a ball are trying, no doubt. But what a capital ball it was—worth being rather tired and having one's dress torn to pieces! Eventful, too—were you surprised, mamma?"

"Very much so," replied Mrs. Chester. "Were not you?"

"Not at all; but then I was in Sir Eustace's confidence before," said Maude, determined that he should not be blamed on her account.

"How long had you known it?" said Mrs. Chester; and Harry, on his way to his room, lingered to hear the answer.

"Long enough to be heartily glad when their cross-purposes came to an end," replied Maude. "It all began last summer in the Tyrol. Good-night!"

She went into her room and closed the door. Mrs. Chester and Harry were satisfied, and their anxiety was never again awakened. Whatever Maude suffered, she suffered in silence. She had done much to promote the happiness of those she loved, and had done it well; and bitter as were some days and hours in the following year, peace came surely, if slowly, to her heart. The sight of the Lady's Rock, and the recollection of its again invisible Cross, ceased to excite painful thoughts, and Maude has learned to look forward to the "unwedded life" predicted for her—if it should indeed be her lot—as one which may nevertheless be rich in happiness.

WATERING-PLACE COSTUME.

See illustration on page 508.

THIS elegant costume is of two shades of blue—turquoise and sapphire. The long walking skirt of turquoise blue silk has a wide flounce, pinked on the lower edge, and gathered above to form two puffs and an upright ruffle. There is no over-skirt; a sash and ruffles on the upper back breadths make them sufficiently bouffant. The sash and bows are of dark sapphire blue silk. The waist is a blouse of Swiss muslin puffs separated by insertion of white guipure laid on blue ribbon. Above this is a sleeveless basque of sapphire blue velvet, with border and ruff of white guipure lace. White chip hat, trimmed on the side with a tricolor cluster of roses—pink, crimson, and yellow. Turquoise blue parasol, embroidered with a rose wreath in colors. Pale buff gloves.

Double-breasted Jockey Basque.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on page 508.

THIS stylish suit is suitable for almost any material, from the linens, percales, and foulards of summer to the poplins, silks, and cashmeres of the fall and winter. The original is made of plum-colored gros grain, trimmed with revers and bias folds of gros grain of a lighter shade. A frill of lace is sewed on the neck and sleeves. Bonnet of two shades of plum-colored gros grain, trimmed with pink roses and buds.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three articles—double-breasted jockey basque, over-skirt, and long walking skirt.

DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, side back, sleeve, collar, and cuff. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to baste the shoulder and under-arm seams, to take up the darts and cross basque seam, to turn back the lapels, to turn down the collar, to sew on the buttons, and the size and shape of the under part of the sleeves. The back is closely fitted by a seam in the middle and side backs. The extra width at the middle of the back is laid in a box-pleat, that at the side seams is laid in a side pleat turning toward the front, and held down by four buttons placed in a lengthwise row. The neck is pointed in front, and finished with a collar and lapels. The front is fastened by three buttons and button-holes; a second row of buttons is placed on the opposite side to correspond with the first. The front is fitted by two darts and a cross basque seam on each side. The back dart is left open below the waist line, and trimmed around. The sleeve is coat-shaped, and finished at the wrist with a cuff. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the shoulder and under-arm seams, and a quarter of an inch for all others. If the sleeves are too long or too short, add to or take from the top and bottom as much as is necessary.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3½ yards.

Extra for trimming, three-quarters of a yard.

OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, side gore, side gore for the back, and back breadth. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid seams. The front is rounded up to the belt on the side, and overlaps the side gore. In making, gather the top of the back breadth and side gore, and place the two single perforations in the top of the front side gore evenly on the corresponding ones on the side gore of the back. Cut two tapes twelve inches long, and tack them on the back of the belt two inches from the middle, and at the single holes in the back part of the skirt for draping.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 5 yards.

LONG WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, side gore, straight breadth, and half breadth for the back. Cut the front and half breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. The bottom is trimmed up the front breadth about eighteen inches with deep side pleating, and the back and side gore with four bias ruffles four inches deep, bordered with a band two inches wide.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

Extra for trimming, 5½ yards.

THE IMPERIAL FAMILY OF RUSSIA.

THE IMPERIAL FAMILY OF RUSSIA.

ALEXANDER II., Czar of all the Russias, was only a boy of seven when, in 1825, his father, Nicholas I., assumed the imperial power upon the death of Alexander I. and the renunciation of all rights to the throne by the Grand Duke Constantine. Thus become heir-apparent, young Alexander was taken from his mother's gentle rule, transferred to the care of military tutors, and taught to conform to the stern discipline of barrack life, as Czar Nicholas wished his son to be, like himself, a despot of the true old Russian type. Of a different and far milder disposition, however, than his father, Alexander grew terribly weary of the unbending soldierdom of Russian court life, and falling ill, was sent on his travels to regain both bodily and mental strength. At the court of Hesse-Darmstadt he fell in love with the Princess Marie, the daughter of the Grand Duke Louis II., and in 1841 he was married to her. In 1855, after the disasters of Balaklava and Inkerman, his father died, and Alexander succeeded to the throne. At first he stoutly declared his resolve to continue the war, but on the fall of Sebastopol gladly made peace on the well-known terms of the Treaty of Paris. Turning his attention to internal affairs, he emancipated firstly the Russian and subsequently the Polish serfs, reformed the army, made great improvements in the various educational establishments of his country, and instituted elective provincial representative assemblies. The great blot in his reign, in the eyes of most people, is his harsh treatment of Poland and the Poles, whose yoke is even now sadly irksome, the unfortunate townspeople being harassed by harsh rules and regulations as to costume and even form of worship, in order that their nationality may be suppressed as much as possible. The greatest achievements of the army under Alexander II.'s sway have been the Central Asian campaigns, which have been so eminently successful in bringing large tracts of hitherto independent country under Russian rule. Of this no better example can be afforded than the recent capture of Khiva.

The Czar has had seven children—six sons and one daughter. Of these the eldest died suddenly at Nice in 1865, and the remainder, of whom we this week give the portraits, are all living. Alexander, the present Czarowitz, is now in England, and has been sharing with the Shah of Persia the recent festivities. He is particularly interesting to the English from having married the Princess Dagmar, sister to the Princess of Wales, and who had been betrothed to his deceased brother. When on his deathbed, however, the late Czarowitz placed her hand in that of his brother, and as a last wish requested that they might be united. Young Alexander is said to be opposed to his father's policy of "reform," and to belong to the school of "Old Russia"—a party stanchly addicted to conservatism, and opposed to all Western "reforms" and "new-fangled notions." During the Franco-German war, also, the Czarowitz espoused the French cause, while the Czar manifestly leaned toward Germany. He is now in his twenty-ninth year, and has two little boys by his marriage. Of the remaining sons we may mention that the Grand Duke Vladimir, who was born in 1847, visited England in 1871, and has recently been staying with his mother and sister in Italy; that the Grand Duke Alexis, now a trifle over twenty-three years of age, and six feet in height, is on his travels round the world, having been made a tremendous lion of in the United States, and being now somewhere in the China Seas; and that the Grand Dukes Serge and Paul, aged respectively sixteen and twelve, have not yet been brought forward into public life, though, according to Russian custom, they are already colonels of two regiments.

The Grand Duchess Marie, who is nineteen years of age, has been staying with her mother, the Empress, at Sorrento, and according to rumor, as yet officially uncontradicted, will shortly be affianced to the Duke of Edinburgh, who, indeed, visited them at Sorrento a few weeks ago. A correspondent of the London Times, writing thence, recently described the Empress as "highly popular, and, apart from her liberality, most gracious and amiable. Equally so is the Grand Duchess. She is unlike her mother, who has full blue eyes, whereas those of the Grand Duchess are small, or half closed. Without being decidedly pretty, she is simpatica, which is far better, as it implies expression and disposition."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. STODDART.—Common photographs require no preparation for painting beyond dampening with a wet sponge. If spots appear when wet, touch with photographer's size, procured from any gallery.

H. M. B.—Tincture acetate of iron, one ounce; glycerine, half an ounce; sulphuret of potassa, five grains; water, one pint. Mix well, leave open till the sulphur smell passes, and add ambergris. No. VII. of "Ugly Girl" papers is what you want.

SPRING-TIME.—There is no danger in using wood ashes as recommended. A wash of vinegar will remove any discoloration if it should appear. Nothing will prevent the growth of superfluous hair again except patient and oft-repeated applications. The camphor may be used at the same time, though either application is enough.

MRS. J. N. C.—A little gum-tragacanth dissolved in bay-rum is a good curling fluid. Hair is crimped best by weaving small locks in and out of an elastic band such as is used to confine papers. The band is stretched to weave the hair on it, and when let go holds it close in a sort of braid. Left overnight so, the hair will be finely crimped. Large crimping-pins are good inventions. Strong hair is best curled with large curling-tongs sold at hardware stores, heated to the hissing point, but not scorching. Soft hair may be curled on papers. To remove mask, take a taraxacum pill for three nights, then omitting three, and so on for six weeks. Thirty grains of chlorate of potash in eight ounces of rose-water is a good wash for it. Beat the white of an egg into the alum-water and leave the paste on all night.

G. S. L'BT.—Preparations for causing the beard to grow are not necessarily injurious any more than hair invigorators are. There is nothing better than a mixture of ammonia and sweet-oil. The tincture of mace is also good.

SINCERITAS.—Frequent bathing and coarse food are the only permanent remedy for flesh-worms. Carbolic soap is of some benefit. The seventeen numbers of the Bazar containing the "Ugly Girl" papers are sent at the regular price, ten cents each. You will find your questions answered in those papers.

VANITY.—Scaly complexions are a sign of great disorder of the blood. The root-beer the recipe for which is given in "Ugly Girl" papers, No. VIII., Vol. V., No. 6, of the Bazar, will do you good.

PLEASANT RIDERHOOD.—The Bazar Book of Decorum is sent by mail, post paid, for $1. For the egg and alum paste see number of the Bazar named above.

A CONSTANT READER.—You will find Lola Montez's book in almost any large public library.

ELLA F.—The recipe is tar and sweet-oil mixed by heating, and applied to the face. The mixture should be a thin sirup.

SPOTTED FACE.—A wash of nitre is recommended for freckles. Eat lemons and grapes in plenty. Also rub slices of lemon on your face.

VIOLET.—Dissolve the alum in rose-water till it will dissolve no more. Then add as much more rose-water to dilute, and bathe the skin several times a day. The egg and alum paste recommended to "Pleasant Riderhood" would have better effect.

H. N. C.—The sulphur vapor bath will be described in a future number of "Ugly Girl" papers.

CALLIE.—Bathing, coarse food, and Buchan's carbolic soap are the only specifics for pimples.

LONGWOOD.—See answer to "H. N. C." Powdered borax is said to be an effectual cure for water-bugs. Cucumber parings are also recommended.

ELSIE L.—Measure the length and breadth of your face, cut two layers of linen with wadding between of the proper size, quilt lightly, cut and bind holes for eyes, nostrils, and mouth; tie with strings behind the head. Wet this with cosmetic and wear at night.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

THE MODERN WONDER.—Experienced people are found wondering how so perfect a sewing-machine as the New Wilson Under-Feed can be made so perfect in every part, so thoroughly adapted to the requirements of family sewing, and yet be sold for twenty dollars less than any other first-class machine. The reason is easy and plain. First, because the Wilson Company is content with a fair profit, and do not belong to any combination whose object is to keep up the price of sewing-machines; and, Secondly, because the most perfect machinery is used in its construction. The splendid establishment of the company is the best evidence that this policy has been a success. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

Prime's I Go A-Fishing.
I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

No recent book, save George Eliot's "Middlemarch," has been received with such unanimous and enthusiastic admiration, as will appear from the following extracts:

An admirable piece of literary mosaic. It abounds in fresh descriptions of nature as breezy and fragrant as the spicy woodlands in which they had their birth. The author has brought to its composition a rare familiarity with the daintiest products of literature and art, a passion for curious and out-of-the-way knowledges, extensive and observant travel in regions remote from the beaten track, and a heartfelt love of nature in her hidden ways and sylvan retreats which transmutes all rural sports into the delights of poetry.—N. Y. Tribune.

A record of the experience of an enthusiastic angler, who is at the same time a traveler, a scholar, and a gentleman. He imparts to the narration of fishing adventures the rare flavor of an intense love of nature, the most engaging personal characteristics, a cosmopolitan knowledge of men and life, extensive reading, and a warm and deep philosophy. It is a lovely book.—N. Y. Sun.

It is the very poetry of sylvan experience, sung by a tuneful master. Its minute descriptions * * * are marked by a dreamy warmth which fascinates and never wearies.—Brooklyn Union.

It is a volume that will outlive the summer, and many summers, and be as fresh and pleasant and suggestive by the fire-side as by the brook-side.—Boston Journal.

An enthusiastic angler, given to much contemplation, a gentle spirit full of religious thought, but not in the least ascetic or gloomy.—New Bedford Mercury.

A very entertaining and equally instructive volume. On his line he hangs all sorts of episodical incident, discussion, antique lore, curious bits of philology, poetry, and story, beguiling the hours on lake and stream with pleasant talk, such as Izaak Walton or Dr. Bethune indulged in.—*N. THE RECORD OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN.

THE LIFE OF THE REV. ALFRED COOKMAN. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

This book will be highly acceptable to a numerous class of readers throughout our country. The ministry of few Christian pastors has more broadly and deeply impressed the American public during the last decade than that of Alfred Cookman. His talents, piety, zeal, and catholicity have endeared him to thousands both within and without his own denomination, while the memory of his devotion to the cause of freedom and the nation during the late civil war will be remembered by all philanthropists and patriots as one of the most fragrant memories of the great struggle. His triumphant death will be quoted every where as a remarkable instance of the power of the Christian religion.

The author has wisely given much space to a delineation of the career of the Rev. George G. Cookman, father of the subject of the biography. To all who knew the father, or heard him preach, or have felt interested in the traditions of his wondrous eloquence, this will constitute a pleasing feature of the memoir.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

It is the very poetry of sylvan experience, sung by a tuneful master. Its minute description of forest "interiors," where broad lakes spread themselves among forest-covered hills, offering irresistible fascinations to sportsmen and to town-wearied workers by the abundance of their finny occupants, and the cool sequestered advantages of their location, are marked by a dreamy warmth which fascinates and never wearies. A better book to take into the country to beguile the long afternoons of the summer holiday could not be desired.—Brooklyn Union.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

"The New Magdalen" is equal to Mr. Collins's reputation. It is as remarkable in plot as any of the great novels which preceded it, and there is the same old skill in the delineation of character as before. Grace Roseberry is a more remarkable heroine even than the "Woman in White."—N. Y. Herald.

III.

ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

The public relations of the author of this volume have brought him into intimate contact with many of the most eminent American politicians. He has collected some of his reminiscences during a long career, forming a series of anecdotes of more or less interest, and related in an unpretending, good-natured, free-and-easy manner, which can not fail to be attractive to the lovers of desultory reading.—N. Y. Tribune.

IV.

KENELM CHILLINGLY: His Adventures and Opinions. A Novel. By E. L. BULWER (Lord Lytton), Author of "Pelham," "Last of the Barons," "The Caxtons," &c. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Reading "Kenelm Chillingly" is keeping good company. It is comprehending fully the "noblesse oblige." It is something of what Thackeray, in one of his letters to Mr. Reed, said of the Alps: "How beautiful it is! How pleasant! How great and affable the landscape is! It is delightful to be in the midst of such scenes—the ideas get generous reflections from them. It is keeping good company. It is keeping away mean thoughts." You who want to breathe a refining atmosphere, read "Kenelm Chillingly."—World, N. Y.

V.

FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated. Square 8vo, Cloth, Beveled and Illuminated, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

Has a breezy country air about it that is very attractive.—Examiner, London.

There is in his poetry a fidelity to nature that deserves the highest praise. He does not describe to us his dramatis personæ, but he places them before us, and they tell their own story. In addition to the forcible realism of these poems, they are characterized by a pathos so simple in its elements as to be sure of universal sympathy, and a humor that is always kindly. There is good, honest, genuine work in his "Farm Ballads," and quite enough merit to entitle their author to rank among the poets.—N. Y. Times.

VI.

OLD KENSINGTON. A Novel. By Miss THACKERAY, Author of "The Village on the Cliff," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

One of the best romances known to alter English literature.—N. Y. Times.

"Old Kensington" marks a distinct improvement in Miss Thackeray's work. * * * Full of touches of art.—Athenæum, London.

"Old Kensington" has a witching power.—Boston Traveller.

VII.

"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting story, effectively told, exhibiting all the best features of the author's style, and but few of its faults. The plot is very dramatic and is well sustained and developed, the interest being kept up and the denouement held beyond conjecture to the end. It will prove a favorite with the admirers of this lady's works.—Boston Daily Globe.

VIII.

THE FISHING TOURIST: Angler's Guide and Reference Book. By CHARLES HALLOCK, Secretary of the "Blooming-Grove Park Association." Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Mr. Charles Hallock is one of the few gentlemen who write a book mainly for the reason that they have something to write about—have something to tell the public which the public desires to know. The title is not a misnomer. The shortest routes to pleasure are laid down, and correct information is given as to the best means of conveyance, the expense of the trip, the secrets of the commissariat, etc. The author has avoided the use of technical terms, and thus made his volume all the more acceptable to the majority of readers.—Turf, Field, and Farm, N. Y.

IX.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN. An Historical Romance. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Miss Harriet Martineau's admirable historical romance, "The Hour and the Man," achieved a great popularity when it first appeared, years ago. It is a powerfully written work, having for its subject the revolution in St. Domingo, in which that extraordinary character, Toussaint L'Ouverture, played an important part. In all its parts, it is distinguished by wonderful power and vigor, both of imagination and execution.—Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

X.

LONDON'S HEART. A Novel. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Grif," "Joshua Marvel," "Blade-o'-Grass," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

It is both able and earnest, and is in all respects wholesome. Its moral is unexceptional, and in its noble aim to draw attention and sympathy toward the sorrows of the helpless and neglected it merits the highest praise. It is Mr. Farjeon's most ambitious work, and is in many respects his best.—Boston Daily Globe.

XI.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Caleb Cushing's new book will do one good service to the country in increasing the number of people who, on this side of the water, accurately understand and thoroughly appreciate the great work performed by the Geneva Arbitration. As a defense of the arbitrators who rightly comprehend the unsurpassed dignity of their position it is a masterly production. The abundant learning of the author of this memorable production shows to excellent advantage in its sharp and clearly defined reasoning and statements.—Boston Transcript.

XII.

TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE. By the Rev. FREDERICK ARNOLD, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The author, in his effort to exhibit the turning-points in the different stages or phases of life, and their importance in influencing the character and the fortunes of men, keeps always in view that it is effort more than accident that controls these, and shows how a proper conduct of life may in many cases lead up to them, and thus man may become in a large degree the arbiter of his own destiny. The moral effect of the book on the young is excellent from this point of view, and it will possess elements of interest, as well as of counsel and instruction, to a large class of readers.—Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

FACETIÆ.

THE famous auctioneer whose advertisement stated that the only drawbacks on a certain country place which he had for sale were the "noise of the nightingale and the litter of the rose leaves" was the right sort of a man for his profession.

A "SHOCK"ING AFFAIR—Hair-cutting in prison.

Professor Agassiz is no believer in Darwin. Not long ago he was introduced to a lady whom he was quite sure of having met before. She told him he was mistaken. He laughingly replied, "Well, we have known each other, but I presume it was when we were both toads!"

Can a butcher's be said to be a joint-stock business?

We have often looked for a sentence that would clearly explain it. A Western paper kindly supplies the want in this beautiful simile: "You might as well try to shampoo an elephant with a thimbleful of soap-suds as to attempt to do business and ignore advertising."

A MAIDEN SPEECH—"Ask papa."

"That's awfully stunning," as the man said when he pitched on his head from the top of Bunker Hill Monument.

Among the innumerable stories told about the Shah is one to this effect: According to the Koran, his Majesty is forbidden to tread on any other soil than that trodden by Mussulmans. To remedy this little drawback the Shah has ingeniously placed a lining of earth of his own country between the soles of his boots. This probably accounts for the dust which is kicked up wherever he goes—just as the quantity of diamonds he wears results in his constantly making such a shine!

A young lady of Richmond suggestively remarks: "If it was not good for Adam to live single when there wasn't a woman on earth, what shall be said of old bachelors, with the world full of pretty girls?"

TEXTS FOR SINNERS—Pretexts.

A camel and an elephant belonging to a circus were tied to a tree near the railway the other day, when the express train came along. The camel fainted away, but the elephant started off with the tree, the camel, and the keeper.

A pretty and well-dressed young lady, after looking at several pairs of gloves, lavender-colored, in a shop lately, shocked the assistant by asking him which pair he thought the "lavender-est."

"I should have no objections," said a henpecked husband, "to my wife's having the last word, if I could only be assured that it would be the last."

The reputation of members of the Legislature for sobriety seems to be rather bad in Kentucky. Two of them were rather noisily drunk on a railroad train the other day, and when the conductor remonstrated one of them pompously asked,

"Do you not know, Sir, that I am a member of the Legislature?"

The conductor quietly replied, "You have got the symptoms."

POLITICAL PEDESTRIANISM—Running for office.

A man lately learned what it was to have insult added to injury, in being first scared out of his wits by his horse running away with him, and then arrested and fined for driving at an illegal rate of speed.

A FINE-IMPOSING PERSONAGE—A magistrate.

A gentleman with a good falsetto voice wishes to exchange with any body possessing a good false set o' teeth.

A young man who went West a few months ago has sent only one letter home. It came Friday. It said, "Send me a wig," and his fond parents don't know whether he is married or scalped.

An enthusiastic African, who had "spent de winter in Jamaky," found it an earthly paradise. He said he could "lie abed, and, putting his arms out de windy, pick oranges, pine-apples, and Jamaky rum right off de trees."

A man who was bitten by a dog the other night declared, as soon as he recovered from his fright, that he would kill the animal.

"But the dog isn't mad," said the owner.

"Mad!" shouted the victim, exasperated.—"What has he got to be mad about?"

Every dog has his day. Now's the time—these are dog-days.

In an advertisement of a baker's business for sale the following appears:

"Death the sole reason for leaving."

It would be hard to find any more important cause for vacating an establishment sacred to the staff of life.

Said a woman to a physician who was weighing two grains of calomel for a child, "Dinna be so mean wi' it; it is for a poor fatherless bairn."

"Jury," said a Western judge, "you kin go out and find a verdict. If you can't find one of your own get the one the last jury used." The jury returned a verdict of suicide in the ninth degree.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 33.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

HYBRIDIZATION OF PLANTS.

ONE of the most interesting of horticultural operations is the raising or originating new varieties of fruits or flowers by means of crossing or hybridizing one species with another, or a species with a hybrid, or one hybrid with another. This process takes place, but somewhat rarely, with plants in a state of nature; but with plants in a cultivated state it is of common occurrence, especially when the operation is properly performed by the cultivator. By this means some of the most beautiful plants we have in cultivation have been produced, and as it requires delicate manipulation, we especially recommend it to our lady floriculturists, for they will find in it a source of great interest and amusement, particularly as its results are almost as uncertain or unforeseen as those of a game of chance. In this respect it may be called a floricultural lottery; for the laws of nature governing the experiment and its results are so mysterious and so little known, even by the most intelligent botanists, as to preclude any definite or positive knowledge of what the character of the hybrid may be.

Crossing one species with another is called muling or hybridizing; crossing varieties already obtained with each other is called cross-breeding. As the result of the first we may instance the beautiful varieties of roses obtained between Rosa indica (the common China-rose) and R. moschata (the musk-rose); Azalea pontica and A. nudiflora coccinea, the hybrids of which are known in our gardens as Ghent or Belgic azaleas; Rhododendron arboreum with R. ponticum and R. catawbiense, producing the almost innumerable varieties of this superbly ornamental shrub; to which may be added the various hybrids originated between the different species of fuchsia, pelargonium, calceolaria, viola, dahlia, erica, and other favorite plants; and between the various hybrids thus originated innumerable cross-breeds have also been produced.

It is very rare indeed that any hybrids can be produced between different genera, however closely allied they may be. All the stories told of hybrids between the orange and the pomegranate, the rose and the black currant, and similar dissimilar species, are simply "yarns for the marines;" and even between species of the same natural family the relationship must be very close indeed to produce any result. No hybrids have ever yet been raised between the apple and the pear, the blackberry and the raspberry, the peach and the plum, the gooseberry and the currant, the morello cherry and the common cherry, although they are respectively closely allied species. No definite rules can be given by which to ascertain whether any two species will produce hybrids. It can only be ascertained by continuous and patient experimenting.

As a general rule, the constitution of the mixed offspring is more capable of enduring cold and the vicissitudes of weather or climate than its parents; they have also greater precocity, producing their flowers and fruits earlier than their parents do. The flowers are also larger and more persistent, and in the case of fruit-bearing trees and shrubs their fruitfulness is also greater; but their seed-producing character is greatly diminished and frequently obliterated, so that they have to be increased by some other method than that of seed sowing. By impregnation with the pollen of either of the parent species the hybrid may be brought back to that especial species, losing all its characteristics as a hybrid; this will take place sometimes in three or four generations, when the pollen of the original male plant is used, but it takes a longer time to produce this effect when the pollen from the original female or seed-bearing parent is used. Instances are not wanting in which, through this process of hybridizing, one species may be transformed into another.

In a hybrid the individual characteristics of the parents are greatly modified, so that it is decidedly different from either, yet resembling both, but often favoring one parent more than the other; sometimes the characteristics of the male parent predominate, and at other times those of the female parent; but generally the latter gives the habit and constitution, and the former the color and form of the flower. In hybridizing for color the resulting hues in the hybrid are not necessarily intermediate; a hybrid between two plants, one producing blue and the other yellow flowers, will not, as a consequence, produce green flowers: they will be of different shades of either of the original colors, or party-colored, in stripes, blotches, or spots.

The instruments necessary for this operation are a pocket lens, a small pair of forceps, and a camel's-hair pencil. The first is to be used to ascertain whether the flowers are in a proper state for the operation, the second to remove the anthers from the flowers, and the third to apply the pollen.

The proper time to perform the operation is when a viscid secretion is found on the stigma of the seed-bearing flower, and the pollen of the flower of the other species or variety is in a dry, powdery state. The flower of the seed-bearing plant should be closely watched, and the anthers removed as soon as the petals unfold, for if it should be impregnated with the pollen from its own anthers, all your labor will be lost. The petals also in many cases may be removed without injury to the process. The flower to be operated on should be inclosed in a loose covering of fine cambric muslin tied close to the stem, to prevent any access of insects, which would, by carrying the pollen from other flowers on the same plant, or from others of the same species, completely neutralize your efforts. It is also necessary to prevent the same effects being produced by the action of the wind distributing such pollen indiscriminately.

When it is found that the viscous exudation is well developed on the stigma of the flower to be impregnated, with the camel's-hair pencil gather the pollen from the flower of the other plant, and apply it gently but firmly to the stigma, to which it will adhere by means of the exudation; then again inclose the flower in cambric until you see that the stigma is withered, and any accidental impregnation is impossible. The proper time in which to perform the experiment is on a bright, sunny day, as cold, wet, ungenial weather is very likely to frustrate the results of the experiment. The proper hours of the day are generally between nine or ten o'clock in the morning and three or four in the afternoon, as then the flowers are in the best state of development.

If the flower from which the pollen is to be taken should be open some days before the seed-bearing flower is likely to open, the pollen may be gathered with the camel's-hair pencil, and preserved in white paper until needed, as it will keep for some time, provided it is not crushed or otherwise roughly handled. It is preferable, however, when possible, to force and bring into bloom the female flower earlier than the male, and by removing from it the anthers it will remain a long time vigorous, if kept free from any accidental impregnation.

When double flowers are desired, a double flower should be searched for that has one or more anthers among the petals, the pollen from which should be used for fertilization. The progeny is almost certain to be double-flowered, although the female flower may be single.

Greenhouse flowers are the most readily operated upon, and with more certainty as to the results, as there is less danger or liability of accidental impregnation from extraneous sources. To such of our readers as may feel interested in this subject, and disposed to try the experiment, we would recommend their beginning with fuchsias, pelargoniums, calceolarias, roses, azaleas, Chinese primroses, cactuses, cannas, and caladiums, as on these plants the operation is very readily performed, and the results soon ascertained.

The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

THE WEATHER.

WE are in the habit of laughing at the prominent place the weather is apt to take in all desultory conversation; but when we consider that it is a subject of such general interest, and one with which we are so constantly confronted, it is hardly to be wondered at. It seems to be a sort of circulating medium in conversation, by which we establish a condition of good-fellowship, it being a fact with which every body has to deal, with which no one can avoid having familiar acquaintance. We say, "A pleasant morning, Mr. Slipshod!" by way of discovering if his mental thermometer corresponds with the physical. If we were to begin our chat with remarks upon foreign treaties or civil reforms, ten to one we should hit upon a topic of which he had no knowledge to mention, or one to touch upon which would be equivalent to stepping upon his gouty foot. Mr. Slipshod, in the mean while, answers us in harmony with the morning, or he assures us that it is susceptible of certain improvements to suit his constitution: if it were not so damp, the twinges in his offending member would be less acute; or it is too warm for the season to be healthy—like the fickle sweetheart who was too pretty to be wholesome—by which means he shows us that he in no wise resembles the old man who thanked Heaven when he woke in the morning that there was any weather whatever! Thus we establish relations between us by which we are taught if it will be well to prefer that other little affair we had in view, whether it would be wise to speak of his daughter, or to desire his name upon our note of hand. Here we use the weather as an indicator of the atmosphere of our friend's mind. Then if we are afflicted with a paucity of ideas, or, having nothing in common with our neighbor, are not aware of any sympathy existing between us, the weather steps in to befriend us—a real benefactor—and adjusts things to the satisfaction of all. It would seem the height of unsociability to sit neighborly for an hour or so, as often happens, without a word; but we can not speak of those things that are nearest the heart, are vexing or delighting us, though no doubt but he would prove the best of listeners, and relish the hearing mightily; but we can not confide to him that we have no more idea than he has from whence our next meal is coming, that Angeline has trifled with our best affections, or that our note has been protested at the bank; nor yet that the Slow-and-Sure Mills have declared a semi-yearly dividend, which, with regard to ourselves, is equal to a declaration of independence. We are too well aware that any of these communications would be too generous a bone for him, or, on the other hand, would fail of eliciting a spark of interest. But the weather is a joint-stock concern, upon which we may compare notes and exchange confidences and prophecies without the slightest danger of showing our hands to each other, without imperiling our wisdom and respectability, and without being snubbed by indifference. We may ring as many changes upon it as we please, and exhaust a fertile fancy in comparisons and similes without let or hinderance. Indeed, there is no subject the boundaries of which are so elastic, no hobby that will carry us so far with so little outlay; for we may follow it around the world, from tropic to frigid zone, from Nova Zembla to Noman's-land. It may serve us, too, for a background against which to exhibit our opinions of climatic effect upon individuals and races; we may lay to its charge the indolence of Southern nations and the bristling energy of the Northmen, the intolerance of our ancestors and our own humors. We may build as many theories upon it as there are stars in the Milky Way, and make it a preface or starting-point for discussion and induction. A weather vane is more potent than a magician's wand; to what possibilities of sun or shower does not the silver thread of the new moon furnish a clew!

But if the sunshine disposes us to a more affectionate belief in God, no less should the dropping cloud, the ragged lightnings, the storm that adorns the earth with its crystalline transformations, the right arm of the wind, whose lines of beauty no eye beholds! Among His dispensations is one preferable to another? It is these trifling accidents of the weather, about which we laugh and complain, that are quickening the germs, ripening the corn, reddening the fruit, adapting themselves to the great purposes of seed-time and harvest. We think of them, mainly with respect to ourselves, as disappointing us of a pleasure, giving us the blues, replenishing the empty cistern, delaying the mails, when, in fact, they are fulfilling a vast mission in the economy of the earth; when not a sunbeam but has an errand, and no snow-crystal but is governed by laws as wonderful as those of a planet! If we inquire into any of the customs of man, we shall find that they sprang, in most cases, from natural causes. So this habit of giving the weather the place of honor in our daily talk must owe its origin to an instinctive recognition of its important part in the eternal order of things.

We grumble over the changes in the weather without considering how essential variety is to a state of well-being, without reflecting that "some days must be dark and dreary," in order, perhaps, that we may better appreciate the benediction of the sunshine, which PLATO calls the shadow of God.

The Flounder, sometimes called American sole, is in season, and an excellent fish it is when properly cooked. The small ones are generally fried. When drawn, they must be washed well, the skin scraped, and split on both sides of the spine; then wipe them dry with a towel, dip them in milk, dust them with flour, and drop them in hot fat. (We have given general directions for frying in preceding numbers.) After being done, and turned into a colander, put them on a towel, so that if there is any fat around them it will be absorbed by the towel. Salt all over, and serve them warm. Fried parsley or slices of lemon may be served with the flounders.

Boned and fried.—Split the skin and flesh to the bones right on the middle of the back, and then by running the knife carefully between the bones and the skin, going toward the edge, you detach one-fourth of the flesh of the fish free of bones. When the halves of the back are thus detached, do the same with the under part; then place one of the four pieces in front of you on the table, the tail end nearer to you and the skinny side underneath; take hold of the end of the skin nearer to you with the left thumb and forefinger, and run a kitchen knife between the skin and flesh, holding it horizontally, and inclining the back of it somewhat toward you, and move it to and fro as if sawing, pushing it gently forward, thus removing the skin from the piece. Do the same with the other pieces; then fry, and serve as above.

With a Tomato Sauce.—When boned and fried as above, place the pieces on a dish, one lapping on the other, and leaving an empty place in the middle. Have a tomato sauce ready and warm; turn it over the fish, and serve as warm as possible. It makes an excellent dish. It is sometimes called à l'Orly.

Another excellent dish of flounders is to prepare them as the above, and turn a rémolade sauce over instead of a tomato sauce.

Rémolade Sauce, simple.—Put two yolks of hard-boiled eggs in a mortar, with a tablespoonful of sweet-oil, and mix into a paste; then chop fine six or eight stalks of parsley, as much tarragon and chervil, if handy, a shallot or a small green onion, a few stalks of chives, if handy, and two cloves of garlic, if liked. Mix the whole well with the yolks and oil, adding salt, pepper, grated nutmeg, mustard to taste, two table-spoonfuls of vinegar, four of oil, a pinch of Cayenne pepper and one of sugar, and it is ready for use. To give it a better appearance it may be rubbed through a fine colander when made.

The same Sauce à la Provençale.—To the above add a few anchovies boned and pounded, capers, cucumbers, burnet, one raw yolk of egg, and the juice of a lemon. When the whole is well pounded in a mortar, mixed, and rubbed through a colander, it makes a really excellent sauce. The addition of a clove or two of garlic is certainly an improvement, and those who discard garlic more through prejudice and hearsay than through dislike or aversion, should at least give a fair trial to a well-made rémolade sauce.

Flounder Normande.—Clean, bone, and skin a good-sized flounder; spread on the bottom of a crockery dish that can stand the heat of a hot oven about one ounce of butter, spread over it two middling-sized onions and six stalks of parsley, both chopped fine; put the pieces of flounder on the whole, add salt and pepper, and enough good cider to cover the whole. Set on the fire, and boil until the fish is cooked; then dish it, and keep it in the oven. Boil what is left in the dish for two or three minutes longer; then add two ounces of butter, boil and stir until the butter is melted and mixed; take from the fire, beat two yolks of eggs with a table-spoonful of water, and mix them with the sauce, which you turn over the fish through a strainer, and serve warm.

To make the dish more pleasing to the eye, place some small fried fish around the border, such as smelts, trout, perches, etc., according to season, or, instead, some boiled craw-fish or prawns. It may also be prepared as above with white wine instead of cider.

Flounder stuffed.—When cleaned, split a flounder on the back, and remove the bone carefully. Chop fine eight or ten stalks of parsley, as much of chives, six mushrooms, two shallots or two small green onions, which mix well with two ounces of butter; salt and pepper. Fry the mixture very slightly; let it cool; put it inside of the fish in place of the bone removed. Spread a little butter on the bottom of a crockery dish; put the fish in, with a gill of white wine and as much of broth, and set it in the oven; baste now and then until cooked; dish the fish, spread the sauce all over it, squeeze lemon juice all over it also, and serve warm.

It may also be stuffed with oysters and two ounces of butter instead of the above mixture, and then baked and served as the above one. Slices of truffles may be mixed with the oysters, if liked.

Flounder broiled.—Clean, bone, and skin one or more flounders, as directed above; mix well together melted butter, lemon juice, salt, and pepper, the quantity to be according to the amount of fish; dip the pieces of fish in the mixture, roll them in bread-crumbs, and put them in the gridiron on a slow fire; turn over now and then until done. While it is broiling, mix, on a slow fire, in a pan a tea-spoonful of essence of anchovy with about the same bulk of butter, a liquor glassful of white wine, and the juice of a lemon (these proportions are for a good-sized flounder), and turn the mixture over the fish when dished. Butter, lemon juice, chopped parsley, salt, and pepper may be used instead of the above mixture, according to taste.

Should enough fish be left to be served again, fried fish excepted, it is only necessary to put it in a tin pan, which you put in another pan of boiling water. Warm, and serve. But if what is left comes from a fried flounder, it is served cold, with a mayonnaise or fines herbes sauce, and is a good dish for breakfast or lunch.

Lovers of game will find the well-known wood-duck during the month of August. We have given in preceding numbers directions for roasting birds.

Buck venison is in season also in August. In buying venison see that it is fat, and the fat clear and thick, the lean of a ruddy hue. The hoof is not wide open until the animal is past three years of age. It is considered best when from one to three years old, after which it is getting tougher and tougher. The antlers of the buck show its age, counting as many years as there are tines.

Venison has a better taste when somewhat seasoned than if too fresh. It is much improved by keeping it two or three days in the following mixture, especially a leg or haunch: Put in a bowl two or three bay leaves, two or three cloves, two onions sliced, two or three stalks of parsley, same of thyme, a table-spoonful of whole peppers, a gill of sweet-oil, and two of claret wine. Have the leg or haunch in a crockery vessel, and turn the mixture over it. Turn the leg over two or three times a day, wetting it all over by means of a spoon. When in a hurry—that is, when you can not wait so long—put it in the same mixture for a few hours, turning it over every hour.

If roasted on the spit, rub a sheet of white paper with melted butter, wrap up the leg in it, and then roast it, basting often with the mixture in which it has been kept. When nearly done, which you ascertain with a skewer or sharp-pointed knife (it takes about an hour and a half for a middling-sized leg), remove the paper, set it again near the fire to finish the cooking, and serve either with a poivrade, piquante, or rémolade sauce and currant jelly, mixing the gravy from the dripping-pan with the sauce used, skimming off the fat carefully.

If baked in an oven, put the leg or haunch in a cake pan with the mixture in which it has been kept, spread a little butter on the top, and put in a hot oven, baste often, and turn it over once or twice. If the top should get too dry, put a piece of paper on it. When done, serve as the above.

If the venison is wanted cooked as soon as bought, the mixture should be made just the same, and then used for basting. Keeping in the mixture for some time improves the meat a good deal; it has a better taste, and is more tender.

To improve the appearance of the dish the hoof is left on the leg, and the skin also, as high as the first joint, they are well washed and wrapped up in a wet rag, which has to be wetted as soon as dry during the process of cooking.

Venison Steaks.—The taste of the steak is improved by putting it into a mixture of spices as directed for the leg. Envelop each steak in a sheet of white paper, and put some of the mixture (except bay leaves, cloves, and whole peppers) on each side of it, rub a little melted butter on the paper, and broil on a sharp fire. When done, serve with a poivrade, piquante, rémolade, or tomato sauce. They may also be fried in a pan with a little sweet-oil instead of butter, and served as the broiled ones above.

We shall give in another number other ways of preparing venison.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

LACE-STRIPED POLONAISES.

FANCIFUL garments for giving variety to summer toilettes at the watering-places are in process of construction at the modistes'. Conspicuous among these are the lace-striped polonaises. The most dressy models are of the simple belted-blouse shape, formed entirely of length-wise stripes of colored China crape, blue, green, rose, or mauve, with alternating bands of wide white insertion, either yak or guipure. The crape bands are about two inches wide on the body of the polonaise, and are sloped wider as the skirt expands; extra bands are also added below the waist. Each band of crape is lined throughout with thin silk; the edges are turned in and run together, and the lace bands are then overseamed to those of crape. Two or three rows of insertion are in each front of the waist, and four are in the back. The sleeves are coat-shaped, formed of four bands of insertion their entire length, with crape between. A lace ruffle falls over the wrist. A standing ruff of lace trims the neck. The sash is of China crape edged with lace, and the front is fastened by small crape bows. These elegant polonaises are worn over white muslin skirts, or else skirts of black or self-colored silk. Swiss muslin polonaises are also partly formed of lace in the manner just described, and are among the most popular over dresses for completing a summer evening toilette. Point duchesse, in open arabesque designs, spidery Cluny, and the expensive Valenciennes are the insertions most used. The muslin is invariably cut away from beneath the lace, thus forming a striped transparent over dress that is very effective over colored silk. A pretty finish is given to these insertions by bordering them on each edge with the merest scallop of lace. By way of variety, the coat sleeves are sometimes removed from the polonaise, making a sleeveless garment over a light silk. Very stylish polonaises are formed of unbleached yak insertion, with bands of chestnut brown velvet. The pale écru lace alternating with the rich dark velvet bands is very beautiful when appropriately worn over a dress of brown silk. Black guipure insertion bands are used in the same way with several materials, such as China crape, moiré, gros grain, velvet, and also cashmere. A wide flounce of the lace around the garment and at the wrists, and a standing fraise, are considered stylish accessions to all such garments.

INDIA EMBROIDERY.

India embroidery in long loose stitches, such as is seen on the borders of camel's-hair shawls, is used at the fashionable French houses for trimming the redingotes, polonaises, mantles, and jackets that form important parts of watering-place outfits. These slender, feathery stitches describe the outlines of palm leaves, arabesques, and other Oriental figures, which are filled in with firmer seed stitch. The India stitches are especially effective in leaves and vines. This work looks heavy, but, on the contrary, is exceedingly light, and therefore suitable for summer wraps. Thread lace is used to complete the garments now worn, but others in preparation for fall are trimmed with heavier guipure, or else yak lace. A black cashmere polonaise, loose and belted in the blouse shape illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., has just been imported, with elaborate India needle-work border and lace flounce. Another of greenish-gray cashmere has a vine of lilies-of-the-valley in natural white and shaded green leaves. The lilies are tufted, and thus raised from the surface, are as tangible as the veritable flower. Price $150. Long mantles of black cashmere, with round backs and deep square fronts, have the India-work done in black floss. These wraps will, it is said, be the prevailing style in the early fall. Breakfast jackets are wrought in the same stitches with many-colored silks. Dark gray and steel-colored camel's-hair polonaises have the same patterns done in wool and silk floss of darker shades than the material. The dark blue linen redingotes so much in favor at the out-of-town resorts are ornamented in this manner with white linen floss.

RUFFS WITH COLLARS.

A fresh importation of lingerie to be forwarded to Newport shows many beautiful ruffs with collars attached. These are called in foreign fashion reports Medici collarettes. They are made of rose, blue, or green, corded with silk or else velvet, edged below with Valenciennes, and surmounted by a high ruff of doubled Malines or finest silk tulle. For example, rose-colored silk, doubled, is made into a ruff of six double box-pleats, and the band is sloped away to a point in front; below this is a rose silk collar cut in points, corded, edged with Valenciennes lace, and ornamented by coquettish little bows in front and directly in the middle of the back. Above the silk ruff is the Malines pleating, in full, fluffy box-pleats. This dressy collarette is worn with black, white, or blue dresses, and costs, when made with real lace, from $15 to $25; with Italian Valenciennes it is from $10 to $12. It is also made in black velvet, trimmed with black and white lace together, and in black silks and China crape, with colored linings. Another pretty French ruff is very fully box-pleated crêpe lisse attached to an inch-wide band of blue silk, which is covered with Valenciennes insertion. A blue bow closes it in front, and a bow with streamers is placed behind.

BLUE AND WHITE LINEN.

The prediction that blue would be the color of the season has been verified, especially in the dresses of linen, percale, and foulard worn in the daytime. At Saratoga blue linen is almost a uniform, and some pretty costumes of this fabric are sent there daily. White needle-worked bands—Victoria lawn with the merest scallop on the edge—are made in scant ruffles and alternated with blue ruffles for trimming some of these suits; others have Hamburg insertion in open wheel-work laid on the dark blue, row after row. One such suit is a belted polonaise and skirt with Spanish flounce. Three rows of white Hamburg insertion are stitched by machine on the deep scant flounce. The polonaise is single-breasted, with a turned-over English collar of the blue linen, with which a white linen ruff is to be worn. Two rows of insertion are down each front, sloping in prettily toward the waist, and surrounding the garment. The cuffs are deep and square, and bordered with one band of insertion. The redingote of blue linen with a black silk skirt also remains in favor. With these dresses a dark blue umbrella, without hat or bonnet, completes the costume for the morning walk to the spring. White suits are not as generally worn as formerly, but many handsome ones of linen or of bishop's lawn are imported. The trimming for these is also English embroidery in open wheel and compass designs. A white linen suit is prettiest with partly fitted sacque and over-skirt; long bands of wheel-work insertion alternating with linen form the sacque and its coat sleeves. A ruffle embroidered in the same design edges the garment and sleeves, and forms a ruff. The round over-skirt has lengthwise bands of insertion down its three front breadths, and a ruffled border. The lower skirt has three flounces of embroidery headed by insertion. A second suit, similarly made, has a deep flounce edged with embroidery and laid in wide box-pleats, with a broad row of embroidery down the middle of each pleat. Velvet sashes in cross-bars of black and white are worn with white and with blue linen suits. Dark plum-color, deep violet, and Napoleon blue sashes of gros grain ribbon are more stylish with white suits than those of bright blue or pink.

AMERICAN VEILS.

Useful veils of grenadine, in square meshes, made of sewing silk, are new this season. They are far more substantial than the ordinary gauze grenadines, and are woven in square kerchief shape, with a tape border and a fringe of the silk woven in instead of being sewed on, as is usually done. They come in black, gray, deep green, brown, and blue, and are of American manufacture.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and MEYENBERG, PRALL, & Co.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev. Mr. WALKER, minister of the new free chapel of Calvary Church of this city, had some pleasant things to say at the opening services on June 29. Among the liberal donations to the chapel were $20,000 from Mrs. H. D. WYMAN, a $20,000 bequest from the late Mrs. VAN HORNE, and $10,000 from Mr. WILLIAM NIBLO, besides gifts from others of stained-glass windows, organ, etc. Speaking of Mr. NIBLO, who, though well advanced in years, is as bright and cheery as ever, the late Dr. HAWKS, when rector of Calvary Church, used to say that whenever he made a collection where a specific sum was required, if the amount fell short, it was always made up by Mr. NIBLO.

—Few women possessed greater wisdom than Lady PALMERSTON. Her wonderful tact was of immense service to the great statesman; and long experience had taught him that her intuitions were infallible in various matters. If some communication made to her particularly impressed itself upon her, she would say, "You must write that down, and I will show it to Lord PALMERSTON when he comes in; or, stay, perhaps he has not gone out." A simple message, verbal or written, sent to him thus was always immediately answered. He had learned the value of her tact and penetration.

—Miss NETTIE M'KEE, only twenty, living in Alleghany, Pennsylvania, has inherited the whole of her father's estate, estimated at $2,000,000. Young men are now taking the train that stops at that station.

—Longevity is the strong point of the MARBLE family, of Worthington, Massachusetts. SILAS MARBLE is eighty-eight, his wife eighty-one, and they have twelve children, all living, the oldest sixty-three, the youngest forty. Of these children seven are daughters, married, and their husbands are hearty men, with a prospect of the eighties. When the old folks, the young folks, and the grand-young folks get together in front of the house to play marbles, it is a perfect marble-yard.

—Long JOHN WENTWORTH owns seven thousand acres of land within twelve miles of the Chicago Court-house. And yet he is not happy.

—Mrs. MARY A. FLETCHER and Miss MARY FLETCHER have given $20,000 to Burlington, Vermont, for a public library, to be called the "Fletcher Free Library."

—BJORNSON, the Norwegian poet, being poor, proposes to come hither and see if he can not do a little better than he is doing at home. He is vicar of a small church, and finds it impossible to live on a salary of $250 a year. He makes nothing by his books. He is married. For two years he has been studying English, and can now write it very well. The government refuses to increase his pitiful salary, and in sheer inability to live on it, the greatest genius of Norway is about to emigrate.

—If there is a virtue in a newspaper man, it is conciseness. Therefore we regard with admiration the people who have had to do with the Ida County (Iowa) Pioneer. That organ of public opinion having changed hands, W. P. EVANS'S valedictory consisted of one word: "Good-night," and JOHN VAIL'S salutatory was simply, "Good-morning."

—Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, now in his eighty-fifth year, has just published in London a book entitled Why am I a Christian? He perceives and laments that "tendency to a skeptical and irreverent treatment of religious subjects which, even in this Christian country, marks to no small extent the passing age." His lordship's career has been an eventful one. At nineteen he was appointed précis writer in the Foreign Office; at twenty-one, secretary of legation at Constantinople; at twenty-six, minister to Basle; at thirty-two (in 1820) he was sent to Washington to adjust certain differences left unsettled by the Treaty of Ghent, but his government declined to ratify his engagements. Four years later he was sent to Russia to ascertain the intentions of the Emperor respecting Greece, and in the following year to Constantinople as embassador, where he remained mostly until 1858, when he returned to England, was raised to the peerage, and takes an active part in the Lords on foreign questions. He knows all about that; is dogmatic and opinionated; in short, is what is described by the phrase, "a troublesome customer."

—DICKENS seems to have transmitted his elocutionary talent to one of his sons, a bright young man, who has recently been reading some of his father's works for charitable institutions, and has acquitted himself admirably.

—Mr. EDWARD MIALL, founder and editor of the Nonconformist, is fortunate in having a circle of friends with the disposition and funds to present him with a testimonial purse of $50,000.

—Of course the Rev. Dr. CUMMING felt moved to "improve" the visit of the Shah. So he did a sermon in which he referred to Persia, and observed that the ten tribes of Israel were once located there, and that it was not at all improbable they would yet reappear from it, after having been two thousand years hidden from the gaze of nations, and join themselves to the other two tribes. "If such proved to be the case," Dr. CUMMING would consider that the "fullness of the time" might be expected. Dr. CUMMING recognizes in the visits of the Sultan, the Khedive, and the Shah to England the fulfillment of the prophecy that three kings would come forth from the East. But it will be awkward for this idea if, as is probable enough, a fourth, fifth, and sixth Eastern monarch should take a European tour.

—The Rev. Mr. TAYLOR writes from India that the methods pursued by the regular missionaries there are all wrong, that their style of living is extravagant, and their system of evangelization unnecessarily slow, expensive, and fruitless.

—EUGENE SCHUYLER, of this city, a graduate of Yale of 1859, and a good Russian scholar, will be Minister JEWELL'S secretary of legation.

—Mrs. REYNAR, wife of Rev. A. H. REYNAR, of Coburg, Canada, and daughter of Rev. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, died at her residence on the 22d ult., at the age of twenty-two.

—The former Duchess of Sutherland—she who was on such nice terms with Mrs. BEECHER STOWE—was a woman who loved splendor, and kept an army of servants, who were draped in the most gorgeous livery. Before she died, as we are informed by the London correspondent of the Tribune, a great part of her retainers were dismissed and pensioned off. But the pensions were given on condition that the holders of them should return to their old posts on great occasions, and this they do. Without them the household would be counted numerous; with them it presents such an array as few private mansions in the world, or none, can equal, and as they are perfectly drilled and know the ways of the house, there is no confusion, nor any indication that this double retinue is not the ordinary equipment of the house. The effect is princely, and Stafford House is a princely residence, with its broad halls, its great staircase, its noble rooms, its priceless treasures of art, and all the rest.

—Mr. RUSKIN, in one of his late lectures, says that the most complete rest and refreshment he gets in London, when he is overworked, is in seeing a French play. He adds that the sight of the misery in Frou-Frou made him so ill that he was not himself again for a week. A lady to whom he spoke of the play told him about her French maid, who described it as having "amused her immensely." "Amused!" said the lady; "but is not the story very sad?" "Oh yes, mademoiselle, it is bien triste, but it is charming; and then how pretty Frou-Frou looks in her silk dress!"

—The law of demand and supply holds good in music as in money. When prime donne are needed they are forth-coming. The race is not destined to die out. Of those who are rapidly taking prominent position in the vocal world two have recently been mentioned in these columns, Madame CLARA BRINKERHOFF and Madame DE RYTHER. The latter, as we perceive by San Francisco papers, has been having a marked success in California at the WIENIAWSKI concerts, while the former has recently returned from a very successful tour. At one of her concerts in Kentucky, which were attended by the élite of the cities and larger towns of the State, a pleasant incident occurred. During the performance some gallant in the audience let a beautiful oriole fly on the stage, and it alighted at the feet of the cantatrice, who caught it up and tied it to her bouquet. She brought the little creature to New York, and great is the admiration it excites.

—Mrs. SUSAN WALDEN, who died at her country residence at Lake View, near Buffalo, on the 11th July, was one of the pioneers of Western New York, and a lady of varied accomplishments and marked character. Coming to Buffalo before the war of 1812, she had seen its progress from the mere hamlet to the opulent and beautiful city it is—one of the finest in the United States. Her husband, the late Judge WALDEN, a graduate of Williams College, came to Buffalo in 1808, and filled many public positions with honor and to the public acceptance. He was one of the eight lawyers who comprised the entire bar of Erie County in 1808. Judge WALDEN and wife remained on the frontier during the war of 1812, and their residence in Buffalo was used by General SCOTT as his head-quarters. Mrs. WALDEN always retained lively recollections of her earlier years, and recounted them with graphic power. On the return of peace Judge WALDEN resumed the practice of his profession, and after amassing an ample fortune, retired from public life. During his mayoralty of the city the early advantages of Mrs. WALDEN enabled her to dispense the hospitalities of his mansion with superior grace and dignity. As one of the incidents of her life it may be mentioned that she was the first lady in Buffalo who owned a piano, which she used to play to the wonder of the Indians, a tribe of whom lived on a reservation adjoining the city. She was a very religious woman, and largely, though unostentatiously, given to charities. She has outlived most of her early associates, and followed husband and children to the grave, the only survivor being the wife of General A. J. MYER, the distinguished head of the Signal Bureau at Washington.

—Somebody has gushed into a book entitled The Female Lights of Journalism. We skip without comment what it puts down as the ages of the different "lights," and give what it says of their peculiarities. "'Grace Greenwood' is a lovely woman, her eyes piercing and brilliant, her hair flowing, like her style, and her subscribed handwriting hurried and wayward. Such a face would look fine in marble. Its features are regular, its expression almost classic. 'Grace' was the one American female writer who of all others was most admired by CHARLES DICKENS. It used to be said that PHŒBE CARY was the wittiest creature of her sex, but the title always belonged to 'Grace Greenwood.' She is a perfect stunner at puns. Her wits are her chief diamonds, and she wears them every where except at church and at funerals." KATE FIELD "looks arch and mischievous." She is "versatile, accomplished, growing handsomer every day, proud of a touch of mercury in her Irish blood, born of an actor and actress, ought to be herself on the stage, and would make a 'school marm' that no prudent and skin-valuing urchin would ever think of playing truant from." NELLIE HUTCHINSON—dainty little NELL—a perfect violet of unobtrusive modesty—is one of the most delicate and charming of the newspaper reporters and correspondents. Her little head is full of wise thoughts, fresh fancies, and quaint conceits, and her style is graceful, buoyant, and bewitching. She weighs ninety pounds, and wears number one slippers. Her autograph is as large as GEORGE WASHINGTON'S.

Card-Receiver, Figs. 1-3.

THE frame of this card-receiver is of black varnished cane bars. It is twelve inches high, and is ornamented with orange-colored china beads and bronze plates. China saucers for holding the visiting-cards are set into this frame, as shown by the illustration. The stand is also furnished with bead lambrequins, of which Fig. 2 shows a full-sized section. To make it first draw the circles for the upper edge of the lambrequin on a strip of carriage leather of the requisite length, on which white paper is pasted. Then fasten in the centre of each circle a black cut jet plate, and surround this plate first with bronze glass beads, then with gold beads, and finally with white enamel beads, which are fastened on the foundation with single stitches. Before fastening the enamel beads cut away the projecting carriage leather and paper along the lines indicated. Fasten the bead scallops on the under edge of the lambrequin. To do this fasten the thread in the hollow between two circles, take up the requisite number of blue beads, fasten the thread in the hollow between the next two circles at the left, again take up blue beads, twine them about the first bead scallop as shown by the illustration, fasten the thread to the circle first mentioned, and then work three more bead scallops in a similar manner—the next scallop of bronze, the following of gold, and the third of enamel beads. Next fasten the lambrequin on the stand. To do this fasten the thread to the next bead of the cane hoop, * take up twice alternately two blue, two white beads, carry the thread through the middle three beads on the upper edge of the next circle of the lambrequin, again take up twice alternately two blue and two white beads, wind the thread three times around the next bead of the cane hoop, and repeat from *. Instead of this lambrequin, that shown by Fig. 3 may be used for trimming the stand. This lambrequin is worked with blue and bronze glass beads, gold beads, and white enamel beads. The upper edge is worked on coarse perforated board, as plainly shown by the illustration. For the bead scallops on the under edge of the lambrequin fasten the thread to the next point, as shown by the illustration, then take up ten blue beads, fasten the thread to the extremity of the next point, carry the thread back through the last two beads, take up ten blue beads, fasten the thread to the same bead of this point, carry the thread back through the last two beads, take up eight blue beads, fasten the thread to the next point of the lambrequin as shown by the illustration, carry it to the next bead of the same point, and now work from right to left the second bead scallop with bronze glass beads, similar to the scallop just described. The third and fourth bead scallops are worked with gold and white enamel beads, observing the illustration.

Figured Percale Tight-fitting Jacket.

See illustration on page 517.

THIS jacket of white and red figured percale is trimmed with ruffles of the material, and is closed with hooks and eyes. To make it cut two pieces from Fig. 40, Supplement. The straight line partly given on Fig. 40 indicates the front edge of the underlapping front. Cut one piece from Fig. 41, and the sleeves each in one piece from Fig. 42, observing the outlines of the under part. Having sewed up the darts indicated in the fronts, sew up the back from 29 to 30, pleat it at the bottom of the waist, fastening the ×'s on ●, and join Figs. 40 and 41 according to the corresponding figures. Face the jacket on the outer edge, excepting the neck, with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, set the neck on a standing collar seven-eighths of an inch wide, and trim as shown by the illustration. Sew up the sleeves from 33 to 34, face the bottom with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, trim with a ruffle, and pleat them, bringing × on ●. Finally, set the sleeves into the corded armholes, bringing 34 on 34 of the fronts.

Cravat or Barbe End.—Point Lace Embroidery on Tulle.

See illustration on page 517.

To make this cravat or barbe end draw the outlines of the design figures on paper or linen, and on this baste fine white tulle, so that the tulle shall lie very smooth. Run on the point lace braid along the design figures, passing the needle through the tulle only, and not through the foundation; where the design forms a corner or point, lay the braid in a sharp pleat; and at those parts of the arabesques which come together sew the braids on each other. The outlines of the inner design figure are button-hole stitched wide. Work the lace stitches with fine thread over the tulle in the dark parts of the design, and into the tulle in the lighter parts. Having trimmed the cravat end with woven picots on the outer edge, as shown by the illustration, separate it from the foundation, and cut away the tulle foundation underneath the lace stitches which rest loose on the tulle. For the middle part of the cravat, tulle, Swiss muslin, organdy, or any other thin material may be used. The embroidery, which is in the form of a sheaf, is extremely rich and pretty. The illustration gives a very good idea of the general effect, as well as of the manner of working.

Work the embroidery—the stems in herring-bone stitch with green silk, the flowers in point Russe with blue silk, and the calyxes in knotted stitch with pink silk, in the manner shown by the illustration.

CHINESE ALMANACS.

THE Chinese year consists of twelve months (or moons, as they are usually styled) of twenty-nine or thirty days each, but of every nineteen years seven have an extra or intercalary moon, as otherwise their calendar would get seriously out of order. Their months or moons are numbered, and have no names in daily use, though they are sometimes known by what may be called poetical names. The year is also divided into twenty-four periods or terms of about fifteen days each, some of which are known as chieh (joints), and others as chi (breadths). Each "term" has a special name of its own, one or two of which sound oddly to us, but most of them are natural enough; for example, January 21st is called Ta han (great cold); again, toward the end of March, comes Chun fên (spring divider—that is, the vernal equinox), etc. Some of these "terms" are made the occasion of holidays or festivals—such as Li chun, or commencement of spring, Tung chih, or winter solstice, etc.

The Chinese have an elaborate almanac, published under the seal of the Astronomical Board at Pekin, which regulates their festivals, and which may fairly claim to compete with the productions of "Zadkiel" and "Old Moore" of England; it certainly goes much more minutely into the details of every-day life than they do. On this subject Sir John Davis remarks: "The Chinese almanac, like many others of the kind in Europe, contains predictions and advice for every day in the year, and presents the same spectacle of the abuse of a little mystical learning to impose on the ignorant majority of mankind. It even gives directions as to the most lucky days for going out or for staying at home, for shaving the head after the Tartar fashion, changing an abode, executing an agreement, or burying the dead. With this are mixed up, in the same page, a number of useful observations concerning natural phenomena pertaining to the season, though these remarks are interlarded with a number of vulgar errors as to the transformations of animals."

THE SWING.

SWEEP on! the leaves dance to the dirl of her laughter
(A dance they were taught by the midsummer elves),
And, blithe in their trusting, the birds follow after,
As if the wee lady were one of themselves.
Now bright in the sunshine, then duskily hiding
Amid dappled shadow, she daringly swings:
Happy eyes testify to the fancy abiding,
And say she is elvish, and swear she has wings!

Sailing on, crescent-like, in her thistle-down lightness,
From bough scarcely bending to tremulous spray,
One foot peeping forth from the peach-blossom whiteness
O' the gown, making ready for flight; but she'll stay!
A gossamer thread at her girdle would hold her,
Were she Ariel's self, with a will of her own,
Now a mortal hath leaned—how she listened!—and told her
That flight would be folly if taken alone.

Ah! I dimly imagine his joy in the capture
Of her heart fresh and willful, his pride in her grace;
But should not marvel much if I learned that his rapture
Was clouded. Just look at the fire in her face!
Flash defiance, proud lady—or frowning or smiling;
Valiant heart, good at core, none shall grudge thee its fling;
But never be tempted by love of beguiling
To play with his proud plighted love—in a swing!

PLAYING FORFEITS.

THE fust time I ever see Elisha Ferris I thought he was jest the ugliest man I'd ever laid eyes on. Ann Jenkins, who was along with me when we met him, says she, "Lor, Hannah Elizabeth, I s'pose that's the young fellow Phœbe Snelling's engaged ter!" Phœbe 'd bin away ter Bosting to visit her aunt, and hed landed a big catch, as every body in Guilford thought.

"Goodness! Ann," says I, "men must be skurse if Phœbe Snelling's going ter merry that one! Why he's as homely as a hedge fence. I wonder he ain't afeard of his own shadder!"

"Well, if girls will merry," said Ann, "they must take sich husbands as are going." And I s'pose Ann felt the obligation binding, for she merried a widderer with ten children that same year.

"Lor," said I, "I wouldn't merry that man if there wa'n't another on earth!"

"Don't deny before you're asked," said she. And then we turned our heads ter make sure he went inter the Snellings', and, lo and behold! he was jest pulling the knocker at Deacon Thurlow's, and a-looking after us. I felt cheap enough, to be caught staring after a strange young fellow, and he no beauty either.

"He's got a good figger of his own," said Ann, in whose eyes a young man allus hed some redeeming traits.

"He looks like skim-milk," said I. "I should think he might be the ghost of somebody else. I'm surprised at Phœbe Snelling, with all her advantages!" And jest then we come upon Deacon Thurlow himself a-turning of the corner.

"Mercy, deacon, how you made me jump!" said Ann. "I hedn't no thought of meeting any body."

"I s'pose you was that immersed in gossip you didn't hear me a-coming," says he.

"Oh no," says Ann, who never spared nobody; "we don't believe in immersion! No, we was only a-speaking of Phœbe Snelling's young man, who jest went inter your house."

"Inter my house! Phœbe Snelling's young man! There's some mistake. I never see him. I guess you've took Elisha Ferris—him that's bought the Blount Farm—for t'other. Ha! ha! Maybe it was your young man, or Hannah Elizabeth's—leastways it wa'n't Phœbe's."

"Heaven forbid!" cried I, "unless I should chance ter lose my eye-sight fust."

"Ha! ha!" laughed the deacon. "Elisha ain't got no beauty ter spare, but he makes it up in faculty."

It wa'n't long after this when the deacon, what did he do but bring Mr. Ferris in ter talk with our Jack about the crops and stock.

"I knew you'd be pleased ter see him agin," said the deacon, slyly, ter me. "'A thing of beauty is a joy forever,' the poet tells us; and he picked you out in meetin' among all the girls, and asked who you was."

I hated him worse than ever after that; and when he got through a-talking with Jack, and come and set down on the settee where I was busy patching Jack's overalls, I wished ter goodness one of us hed the coat of invisibility I'd read about in the fairy-books; and I wouldn't make no sort of conversation with him, but jest said "yes" and "no." And when he asked if I took any interest in farming, I told him there wa'n't nothing more hateful ter me; and—

"I s'pose you're familiar with my place," says he.

"Oh yes," says I. "You must feel the wind from the four corners of the earth, the situation's so exposed. The Blounts was allus complaining of influenzie, and a-sneezing and shivering over the fires."

And then he laughed good-naturedly, and said, "You seem ter forget that summer pays us a call once a year, and pays up for all old winter's tricks;" and he went on ter tell how much pleasure he expected in watching the spring open, and the leaves unfolding, and the faint breath of bloom deepening day by day, till we find the blossom on the bough and the full blade in the ear.

"You oughter hev bin a preacher," said I.

"I would be," said he, "if there was a chance of my converting you!" And then the deacon said it was about time fur mother ter be looking fur him home, and I never bid any body good-by with a better relish!

Whenever we come out of meetin', there was Ferris a-standing in the porch, staring with all his eyes; and onst he asked ter walk home with me in broad daylight! and I jest told him I was going ter make a call by the way, though it wa'n't my habit to be calling round Sabbath-day; but, you see, it's a good bit of ground from the meetin'-house ter the farm, and I hedn't no mind ter be wasting my time and breath in his service that far!

He hed a house-warming, too, a little later, and invited young and old, rich and poor, and me and Jack among 'em; and nothing ter do but I must go. Jack said there wa'n't no sense in my setting myself up and putting on airs because a fellow wa'n't as putty as a wax doll, when he was good as gold, and the best match for miles around; and I might thank my stars if sich a one looked at me. And so I went; and I wore the ugliest gownd I hed, and devoted of myself ter old-lady Pettigrew, while the young folks was playing games and flirting, and pulling candy in the kitchen. And she carried me all the way through her courtship, and the children's mumps and whooping-cough, and Mr. Pettigrew's blind-staggers; and jest as she was in the thick of soap-making I see Elisha Ferris pushing our way, and my heart begun ter sink inter the hollers of my feet, for I knew he was coming ter take me out ter supper, an' I'd rither hev starved fust! And what do you think he did but walk straight up to us and offer his arm to—old-lady Pettigrew! I was as mad as fire, and glad of it too, if ever you heerd of sich a case. But I made it even with him when we came ter go off. Says he, "Shall I see you home?"

"Thank you," says I; and he begun to crook his elbow. "But I hev company already," I added, after keeping him in suspense a while; and so I hed, only it was nobody but Jack and his girl, Becky Harris! Now Aunt Sophy hed bin making a patchwork quilt, time out of mind—a real Job's trouble; and every time she'd git it out she'd tell you who hed a gownd like this bit, and who hed aprons off of that other; so it was a'most like a story-book, with more chapters than you could shake a stick at. Gineration after gineration was represented in that quilt, so ter speak: here was a scrid that hed belonged ter her great-grandmother, when calico was as costly as delaine, and there was a scrap of her own baby-frocks, and yonder a piece of her uncle's wife's sister's! In fact, 'twas as good as a regular ginealogical tree, root and branch and blossom. And I'd hed no end of trouble with it myself, fur aunt's eyes was failing of her; and if I'd threaded one needle, I hed a thousand and one, and made enough knots an hour ter take me across the Atlantic Ocean in a week. No matter whether I was taking off the butter, or skimming the milk, or trying out lard, Aunt Sophy was at my elbow with thread and needle: ter tell the truth, she was that blind she mistook a fly on the pantry wall for a nail one day, and set ter work ter hang the milk-strainer on ter it. The fly resisted. Well, the Job's trouble was ended at last, and I thought mine hed too, as far as that quilt was concerned; but, goodness! it hedn't only jest begun, 'cording ter some folk's thinking. Nothing ter do but Aunt Sophy must hev a quilting, and ask the young men in the evening ter supper and frolic. I hedn't nothing ter say agin that, for I was as keen after sport as the next one, only I didn't mean that Elisha Ferris should come inside our doors that night; I thought the sight of his ugly face would jest spile the whole fun! However, the folks come in the afternoon, and used their tongues and fingers pretty nimbly; quilted in herring-bone, and gossiped about the good old times, when girls weren't so for'ard, and butter and eggs fetched more, and about Miss Somebody's new fixings, and Mr. Totherbody's house-raising, till it grew dark and supper was ready. Aunt Sophy and I we'd cooked up a sight of nice things—roasted chickens, made pies and jellies and cakes—that did your heart good ter look at, if I do say it. And by-and-by the young fellows begun to pour in in their Sunday-go-to-meetin' best, and standing dickies stiffer'n a Puritan elder. Phœbe Snelling's young man, Tom Comstock, Jim Jackson, and a fine crowd; and in a minute or two who should come along home with our Jack, as big as life, but Elisha Ferris! I jest give Jack a look that was enough ter take an ordinary man's appetite away, but it hedn't the leastest effect on him.

Well, after supper they danced a while. Elisha Ferris played on a cornet he'd brought along with him; and Phœbe Snelling was glum 'cause her young man danced a fore-and-after with me; and Aunt Sophy sat in the corner, and lived over her young days, she said. After a time somebody proposed we should hev a game of rolling the platter, with forfeits, and a great frolic it made, I can tell you; and the best of it was, when Elisha Ferris made such haste ter catch the platter before it got done spinning that he stumbled over Aunt Sophy's cricket, and measured his length on the floor. I was that tickled I couldn't keep myself from laughing right out, though I s'pose it wa'n't mannerly. But I was giddy as a windmill in them days.

"I'm glad I can amuse you so well, Miss Hannah Elizabeth," said he, gitting up very red in the face, and not a whit handsomer than ever.

"Thank you," says I; "you're allus obliging." But, you see, that stumble gave him a forfeit ter pay, and Ben Snelling he was elected judge; and he told Phœbe ter measure three yards of pink ribbon with our Jack, which jest set her young man and Becky Harris on tenter-hooks; and then, ter cap the climax, he sent Elisha Ferris ter Rome with Becky, which sort o' riled Jack, and made me clap my hands.

"Pleasant journey to you!" shouted Comstock.

Now, p'r'aps you dunno what going ter Rome is like, since forfeits hev gone out of fashion consid'rable; but when I was a gal they was all the go. Well, you see, the way they went ter Rome was putty cheap in them days, though, mercy knows, it cost Elisha Ferris dear enough! They jest locked arms together and went round the room, and he kissed all the girls, and the young men they kissed her—if they could! Well, Elisha he give his arm ter Becky, and Becky she blushed up like a peony; and jest then I got up ter look after the fire, and didn't mind how they was gitting along on their journey, till I felt somebody's hand on my shoulder, and looked up ter find Elisha's great mouth within half an inch of my cheek! I give sich a scream that it brought on Aunt Sophy's palpitation, and old-lady Pettigrew thought there was fire; and I jerked myself out of his reach and run for a closet, and he after me!

"All roads lead ter Rome," says he, trying ter pull open the cupboard door. "I'm bound ter git there before I go home!"

"If you come inter this closet," said I, "I'll shoot you, upon honor!" showing him Jack's pistol through the crack. You see, Jack hed bin out shooting at a mark that afternoon, and hed brought it in and left it on the cupboard shelf, and when I'd asked him if 'twas loaded, he said,

"I told Comstock ter fire off the last charge, 'cause it was gitting too dark ter see the mark." And so when Ferris, spite of all I could do, wrenched open the cupboard door, and I found myself at his mercy, I jest p'inted the pistol at him and pulled the trigger. Thinks I, "I'll give him a little start for his pains." And, bless us! so I did! There was a noise like ten thousand earthquakes, seemed to me, a little spurt of flame, and a thimbleful of smoke, and Elisha Ferris dropped like a log! Comstock hedn't fired off the last charge—but I hed!

The girls all screamed like so many catamounts, and I thought I'd killed him for sartin. I leaned against the cupboard shelf a minute ter git myself in hand; but I seemed ter be growing all numb like, and the voices sounded as if they come through a speaking-tube, and the folks all 'peared ter be moving behind a fog; and then I didn't sense nothing more till most of 'em hed gone home, and the doctor was looking after the wound; and I heerd Aunt Sophy saying, "'Twas dreffful keerless in you, Jack, ter leave fire-arms handy;" and Jack, says he, "It's dreffful foolish fur womenfolks ter handle 'em. Hannah Liz has done a putty day's work." And then Elisha Ferris ups and takes my part, as poorly as he was feeling. "She'd no thought of hurting of me," says he; "and it served me right fur pestering of the poor child." And I got on my feet at that, and went inter the room; and says I, "Dr. Motherwort, if you'll be so good as ter hire me fur nurse, I won't ask no wages. You see, I've made him sick, and it's my right ter help cure him."

"I'm 'most cured already," said Elisha, opening his eyes at the sound of my voice, and smiling jest a little.

"Jest so," said the doctor; "only keep him quiet."

Well, Dr. Motherwort said it wouldn't do ter move him, and Jack and I we nursed him together. You see, the ball had gone clean through his right shoulder, and it took time; and while Jack was at his work I hed Elisha on my hands; and I cooked his meals—no great shakes at fust—and fixed his pillers twenty times a day, and bathed his head, and brought him the news, and read the Arabian Nights ter him and the Weakly Twit, and treated him as tenderly as I would hev treated Jack if it hed bin him. And when he was on the mending hand I played backgammon with him, and wrote his letters ter his folks—he hedn't nobody but a merried sister—and laughed at the stories of his school-days till the tears run down my cheeks.

"He's growed quite pale and interesting," said Ann Jenkins, catching sight of him through the open door while she was making me a call, "but he ain't no handsomer than ever;" and, you see, it jest took me all by surprise, but I felt the blood tingling in my face, and my temper a-gitting up; and says I, "Handsome is as handsome does," smart as you please, before I remembered that I'd used ter agree with Ann on that subject.

"Highty-tighty!" says she; "every eye makes its own beauty! If you're satisfied, I sha'n't cry. But I thought you didn't fancy skim-milk-looking men!"

But, upon honor, I couldn't hev told when his looks fust begun ter please me: whether it was when he pitied me fur hurting of him instead of pitying himself fur being hurt; or whether it came about when I blamed myself and he comforted me; or when he spoke of his mother, and the tears filled his eyes; or whether it was when he got talking earnest like, and his eyes grew sort o' blue-black, and as if they'd strike sparks, and his smile was like sunshine on rain-drops; but there was the truth, however I come by it, that I shouldn't never hev knowed him for the same man I met nine months before with Ann Jenkins.

Well, when he got able ter be about house, before he could go out, he used ter help me at the churning, and he did a sight of tinkering about the house fur my sake: he made me a reel fur my yarn, and a new bobbin and shuttle fur my loom.

"Lor!" said Aunt Sophy one day while he was carding the rolls fur me, and I was spinning 'em, "how handy you are about house, Elisha. I don't see how Hannah Elizabeth's going ter git along without you when you go home."

"She hasn't no need ter git along without me," said Elisha, speaking low, and looking hard at me, "unless she's tired of the sight of me. At least," said he, after a pause, when Aunt Sophy had lost herself in her chair, "I can't go home without paying my forfeit, you know."

"You've paid dear enough fur it," I said, "already."

"And so, of course, you won't hev the heart ter refuse it. I said I wouldn't go home till I'd paid it, and I won't, unless you'll go with me."

And so I thought it best ter go.

Wilkie Collins as a Dramatic Reader.—A Link with the Past.—"The Castle" Rooks.

AN event in literature, interesting at least as much to yourselves as to us on this side of the Atlantic, took place on Saturday last in the first dramatic reading given in public by Mr. Wilkie Collins. It is no secret that this popular novelist is using his fellow-countrymen as Molière used his housekeeper—with an eye to that more extensive audience with which he will find himself confronted this fall in the United States. To quote the very words I heard him speak with reference to these experiments, "They are but rehearsals by which I, as an untried public reader, am endeavoring to train myself for my appearance elsewhere. I owe much to my American friends, and wish to do my very best to please them." So we have but his preliminary canter, as our racing friends would say, while you will see him when well in his stride, and going his very best. The scene he selected for his first appearance was the Olympic Theatre, and the result was an unqualified success. Mr. Bellew sat in a front stall, and came afterward to the greenroom to congratulate him upon having proved himself a worthy brother in that art of public reading in which that once-reverend gentleman is certainly facile princeps. Mr. Wilkie Collins does not suit the action to the word so much as Mr. Dickens did, but it is to be remembered that this is an accompaniment that grows with confidence and experience, as was proved in Mr. Dickens's own case, who, as a reader, came in (in exact opposition to the proverbial character of the month of March) like a lamb and went out like a lion; but even at this early stage of his career it is evident that Mr. Collins is in the finest sense a born actor, thoroughly invests himself with the feelings and attributes of the character he is delineating, and never lets slip the opportunity of making all his hearers kin by a touch of nature. The subject he took for his first reading was, perhaps, the best short story he has ever written; the most striking, certainly, of all those excellent tales published under the title of After Dark—namely, "A Terribly Strange Bed." His impersonation of the old soldier was most characteristic and impressive, and in the whole ghastly scene he may be said to have riveted his audience. I remember a great wit and social favorite insisting, on one occasion (in opposition to some advocate of "dry humor"), that a man should laugh at his own joke, since his gravity indicates that though good enough to excite the mirth of his audience, the joke is not good enough to excite his own; and so in dramatic reading it is all-important that the reader should show himself to be influenced by the interest of the scene he represents, and in some measure become a spectator himself. Now this Mr. Collins does in a marvelously natural way, and carries his audience completely with him.

Another link with the far-back past has just been broken by the death of the eldest son of that charming poet and essayist, Leigh Hunt. Thornton Hunt, who has just left us at sixty-three "to join the majority," was the child-hero of those exquisite lines beginning, "Sleep breathes at last from out thee, my little patient boy," addressed to him by his father. Charles Lamb also records in verse Thornton's birth, which took place within the prison to which Leigh Hunt had been condemned when editor of the Examiner for speaking of the Prince Regent in that paper as "an Adonis of fifty." No one, indeed, in the whole history of literature, was probably made so early the subject of public comment as T. H., who, when he was still an infant, figured under those transparent initials in the Quarterly Review in a once-famous article written by Southey. It was long after the latter poet had abjured his radical notions; and the contribution in question was, in fact, an attack upon the freethinkers. To show the evils of bringing up a child without religious belief, Southey had the cruelty to instance the infant offspring of Leigh Hunt as a prey to spiritual terrors and nervous fears in consequence of this neglect in his education: conduct which drew from Charles Lamb, I think in the columns of the London Magazine, a most energetic and indignant remonstrance. What an enormous gulf of time seems to be bridged over in such a fact as that, when joined to this recent death! Hunt, Coleridge, Byron, Lamb, Keats, Shelley—the shadows of all these great men, whom Time has magnified, not lessened, to our view, seem to linger about the death-bed of Thornton Hunt. He could not himself be said to be distinguished in literature—a profession which, but for the paternal training and example, he might perhaps never have embraced—but he was a diligent and clever journalist, the originator of that remarkable organ of free-thought, the Leader, and of late years a constant contributor to the Daily Telegraph. Though by no means of an attractive exterior, he is said to have been called "Listen and Die" (in contradistinction, I suppose, to "Look and Die"), from the popularity his manners and conversation won for him with the fair sex; yet his talents even in that way fell far short of his father's, who charmed both men and women, and caused even those who never beheld or listened to him to fall in love with "gentle Leigh."

of my late letters that our judges of the present day were not so remarkable for wit and repartee as they used to be in old days. Yet some of them are still, at least, the cause of wit in others. On the occasion of the elevation of Lush and Shee to the bench, which took place about the same date, a dinner was given to them, as usual, in the Temple Hall. The man who gave the toast of the evening made the speech describing their excellences in due course; but later on his eloquence was quite eclipsed by a young barrister who proposed upon that particular occasion to substitute for the ordinary bar toast of "Wine and Women," Lush and Shee.

The Shah has gone at last. Next to the telegraph, what pleased him most (as I have the authority of one of his royal hosts for stating) was the foliage and verdure about Windsor Castle, contrasting as it did with the burned-up plains of his own land. He was also much delighted with the rooks, whose monotonous "Shah, Shah," seemed to tickle his vanity, as though they were in reality addressing him by name.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XVI.

SINCE the allusion to the success of Mr. Banting's system for reducing flesh, request has been made for its details in full. The popular idea of the writer whose modest pamphlet has linked his name with the system he tried and puts forward is very like that of the dry modern savant. The severe scientist who keeps his child for years without fire or clothes to demonstrate the superiority of the human race to cold if properly brought up to it, or throws a new-born baby into a tub of water to prove that the race can swim by nature, is not worthy to be mentioned on the same page with the kindly enthusiast of the Letter on Corpulency. There is no evidence in its pages that the writer ever tried authorship before. He was over sixty-six years old when, in a burst of gratitude for his relief from the distressing burden of too much flesh, he takes up his pen to tell his fellow-creatures the help for those who suffer a like infliction. There is a quaintness in his pages which reminds one of Izaak Walton, as in his opening sentences, where he declares, "Of all the parasites that affect humanity, I do not know of, nor can I imagine, any more distressing than that of obesity"—an opinion which all fellow-sufferers will agree with. He seems fond of naming his grievance a parasite, and the term slips out with a frequency which hints at possible objurgations hurled at his infirmity under its pressure. On being called to account for it later, he meekly assures us that the word is used wholly in a figurative sense. But his state might have justified a stronger epithet. No parents on either side, to use his phrase, ever showed a tendency to corpulency, but between thirty and forty he found the habit growing upon him. His physician advised violent exercise, and he took to rowing, to no avail. Finding his flesh increase, he consulted "high orthodox authority (never any inferior adviser), tried sea air and bathing, took gallons of physic and liquor potassæ, always by advice, rode horseback, drank the waters of Leamington, Cheltenham, and Harrowgate"—dose enough, we would think, to have disgusted him with life forever—"lived on sixpence a day, and earned it, at least by hard labor, and used vapor baths and shampooing," without help. The rich gentleman found his position, the good things of this life, his houses, horses, and friends, small enjoyment, save as they lessened the increasing burden life unmercifully heaped upon him. He was obedient and intelligent in using every means of relief suggested, but his medical men were of very small use to him. As he pathetically says, "When a corpulent man eats, drinks, and sleeps well, has no pain and no organic disease, the judgment of able men seems paralyzed." His state was pitiable, and there are too many companions in distress who answer to the same picture. He could not tie his shoe, and often had to go down stairs slowly, backward, to save the jar of increased weight on his ankles and knee-joints. Low living was advised, and he followed it so heartily that he brought his system into a low, irritable state, and broke out in boils and large carbuncles, for which he had to be treated and "toned up" in a way that, of course, brought him into heavier condition than ever. He speaks feelingly, yet with simple dignity, of the trials which stout people endure, of being crowded in cars and stages, uncomfortable in warm theatres and lecture-rooms, besides finding themselves the butt of ridicule, or, at least, the object of remark, which last caused him, for many years, to give up public pleasures. Many persons will have cause to reproach themselves here, for those who are considerate of every other species of human infirmity fail to recognize the real suffering those who carry a load of flesh must go through. A sensitive person encumbered with adipose must feel keenly the glances, if not the smiles, which are sure to follow his entrance into a public vehicle, and it is a test of delicacy for others to appear unconscious of the difference.

When Turkish baths came in fashion Mr. Banting tried them, with the result of six pounds loss after taking fifty baths, which was not encouraging, though they have been of service in like instances. In August, 1862, his case stood thus: he was nearly sixty-six years old, five feet five inches high, and weighed two hundred and two pounds; he went to no excess in eating or drinking, his diet being chiefly bread, beer, milk, vegetables, and pastry; flesh impeded his breathing, his eye-sight failed, and he lost his hearing; yet most of the doctors he went to for relief considered his trouble of no account, as one of the accompaniments of age, like wrinkles and gray hairs. The faculty are much to blame for despising such a foe to human comfort as undue fleshiness. The surgeon of the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Ear, Mr. William Harvey, was the first person wise and considerate enough to prescribe a remedy. He reasoned from M. Bernard's now accepted theory of the product not only of bile but of glucose by the liver. Glucose is allied to starch and saccharine matter, and is produced in the liver by ingestion of sugar and starch. This substance is always present in excess both in diabetes and obesity, and it struck this eminent surgeon that the same dry diet which drains the liver of the excess of glucose in the former disease might be of service in the latter. Abstinence from food containing starch and sugar reduces diabetes, and accordingly he prescribed for his patient this regimen. He was to leave off all bread, milk, butter, beer, sugar, and potatoes, besides other root vegetables, as these contain the largest amount of fat material. Yet the diet allowed was liberal.

Breakfast was four or five ounces of beef, mutton, kidney, broiled fish, and any cold meat except veal and pork; a large cup of tea without milk or sugar, a little biscuit—i. e., crackers—or an ounce of dry toast.

Dinner: five or six ounces of any fish except salmon, herring, and eels, which are too fat; any vegetables but potatoes, beets, parsnips, carrots, or turnips, green vegetables being especially good; an ounce of dry toast, the fruit of a pudding; any poultry or game; two or three glasses of good claret, sherry, or Madeira, but no Champagne, port, or beer.

Tea: two or three ounces of fruit, a rusk or two, and a cup of tea without milk or sugar. Supper, at nine: three or four ounces of meat or fish and a glass of claret. Before going to bed, if desired, a nightcap of grog without sugar was allowed, or a glass of claret or sherry.

This was comfortable compared to his former diet, which was bread and milk for breakfast, or a pint of tea, with plenty of milk and sugar, and buttered toast; dinner of meat, beer, bread, of which he ate a great deal, and pastry, of which he was fond, with fruit tart and bread and meat for supper. Yet on the liberal diet his flesh went down at the rate of more than a pound a week for thirty-five weeks.

He affirms his belief that certain food is as bad for elderly people as beans are for horses, and he calls the forbidden food "human beans" thenceforth. He suffers himself to make a little mirth over the enemy that held him in durance so long. We can well believe he would "scrupulously avoid those beans, such as milk, beer, sugar, and potatoes," after he had groaned a score of years from "that dreadful tormenting parasite on health and comfort." He sensibly writes his opinion that "corpulence must naturally press with undue violence upon the bodily viscera, driving one part on another, and stopping the free action of all." He calls Mr. Harvey's system "the tram-road for obesity," and says, "The great charm and comfort of this system is that its effects are palpable within one week of trial." He protests that he found not the slightest inconvenience in the probational remedy, which reduced his girth twelve inches and his weight thirty-eight pounds in thirty-five weeks. He could go up and down stairs naturally, and perform every necessary office for himself without the slightest trouble; his sight was restored, and his hearing unimpaired. In token of his gratitude he gave the doctor, besides his fees, the sum of £50, to be distributed among the hospital patients. To prove the reality of his dedication of his letter "to the public simply and entirely from an earnest desire to benefit his fellow-creatures," the editions were distributed gratuitously in hopes thus to reach his fellow-sufferers from flesh, whom he was eager should find the relief which to him was rapturous. It must have reached some cases, for more than 58,000 copies had been issued at the date of the last edition. The author was urged to sell his work, even if the proceeds were given to the poor; but with the sensitiveness of a man not used to appear in public, he says, "On reflection, I feared my motives might be mistaken." In giving the credit of this system to Dr. Harvey we are sure of obeying the wishes of the author, who speaks of his benefactor with extreme gratitude, and says, "It is a remedy as old as the hills, he has since been told, but the application is of recent date." He thinks any one who suffers from obesity may "prudently mount guard over the enemy, if he is not a fool to himself." He was so far delivered from his malady as to indulge in the forbidden articles of food, but had to "keep careful watch, so that if I choose to spend a day or two with Dives, I must not forget to devote the next to Lazarus."

No medicine was given with this diet, save a volatile alkali draught in the morning during the first month. This was probably the bromide of ammonia, which is said to be of great use in reducing an over-amount of flesh.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AUGUST is the fashionable season at the White Mountains, and every year there are increased facilities for pleasure travel in that direction. This summer, by the extension of the Mount Washington branch of the Boston, Concord, and Montreal Railroad, the Twin Mountain House can be reached without any staging whatever. From the Twin Mountain House station it is only five miles to the new Fabyan House, nine miles to the Crawford House, four miles to the White Mountain House, and eleven miles to the Mount Washington Railway. The Portland and Ogdensburg Railroad has also been extended, and will eventually run cars through the Notch, and a stupendous undertaking will it be to construct this road. The railway up Mount Washington is in good order, and arrangements have been made to accommodate a large number of travelers. One of the chief sensations of the season will be the new and fine hotel on the summit of the mountain. Though located 6291 feet above the level of the sea, this house of entertainment compares favorably with those on lower and more convenient locations. It is 176 feet long by 38 feet wide, two stories high, with a Lutheran story above, and contains 72 sleeping-rooms, which are carpeted and pleasantly furnished. The whole building is heated by steam—a matter to be considered even in August. The prospect from the hotel windows must be seen to be appreciated. The valleys of the Saco, the Connecticut, the Ammonoosuc, and the Androscoggin lie in view, while the mountains of New England, New York, and Canada form an endless chain of peaks, stretching far away in the distance. Tourists, however, are often disappointed in the view when they ascend the mountain to remain only a few hours or to spend a single night. It is considered a special point always to see the sun rise. Of course the sun does rise every morning on Mount Washington as well as in less noted places, but it is often through mists and clouds, so that his own special glory is dimmed, and all the scenery overshadowed. Visitors must often be patient, if they would obtain a good view of the grand White Mountain scenery, and not limit themselves to a single night.

Tereza Cherra was a little Italian girl only six years old. We often hear the expression "frightened to death" used in a hyperbolical sense; but this child was really frightened to death on a recent Sunday in the streets of our city. Probably she was not unused to crowded streets, such being the sad experience of many of the little Italians in our midst; but evidently she was sensitive, and not accustomed to roughness. For one day she came running home to her parents, wild with excitement, sobbing and shrieking in a hysteric way that nothing could check. All that could be gathered from her wild words was that some man had rudely laid hands upon her. Physicians were summoned, but they could do nothing for her; the child would not allow herself to be touched, but died while they were consulting—frightened to death.

Public health appears to be connected in some mysterious way with the amount of ozone in the atmosphere. A member of the French Academy of Sciences, who has been investigating the subject, finds that the maximum amount of ozone is when the wind is at the west, and the minimum when at the east. Observations show that the outbreak and duration of epidemics have been coincident with periods of east winds, while their subsidence quickly followed a change of wind to the west.

Even the Apache Indians have a touch of delicate romance in them. Every young girl is at liberty to refuse a suitor. Not parents or brothers may interfere in her choice. After a brief courtship the lover makes a formal proposal by offering so many horses. Horses are a standard of value among Indians. As the squaw does all the work, horses are accepted as an equivalent for her labor. When a young warrior becomes enamored, he fastens the horse near the wigwam of the squaw whose hand he seeks, where he is left for four days. If she fails to feed and water the horse during that time, the master is rejected; but if she accepts his offer she grooms and kindly cares for the horse, and then ties him to the wigwam of her lover, as much as to say, "I am willing to be your slave and do your work."

There seems to be no end to the "sayings and doings" of the Shah, if we rely upon the rumors which are circulated about him. Probably many are the production of some imaginative genius—as, for example, that this "king of kings" expressed a wish to see an execution, and was surprised that one could not be got up for him, and that he suggested the cutting off the head of one of his suite who was unhorsed during the Windsor review. A good deal of curious gossip about him, however, is as reliable as gossip generally is. At Trentham a new piano was placed in a saloon, and on the attention of the Shah being directed to it he expressed a wish that one of the ladies present would perform upon it. Bashfulness, however, seized upon all present, and not one would show off before him. The Shah shrugged his shoulders at this act of disobedience to the royal will, and at once left the apartment. When the Shah visited the Queen at Windsor he saluted her Majesty with most perfect delicacy and grace, and said that hitherto he had reckoned his years from the day of his birth, but that in future he should date them from the hour of his meeting the Queen of England. About three hours every day the Shah devotes to writing his diary, and he allows nothing to interfere with this task. It is said that he chafes a great deal under the restraints of etiquette to which he is subjected, and the compulsory regulation of his hours according to a fixed programme, which leaves him no time to do, or hardly even to think, as he likes. On the Continent he was glad to escape from state custody at Berlin to Wiesbaden and Spa, where he could live in rooms of his own, eat when it pleased him, and go about without fuss when fancy seized him. In England he was glad to take advantage of the institution of an English Sunday to claim the privilege of having at least one day to himself during his stay. All that he was to do on Sunday was elaborately marked out for him two days beforehand by the gentleman in charge of him, and he was told he was to go by rail to one place and by boat to another, and to take tea at one duke's house and come home to an assembly at another's. But at the last moment he simply refused point-blank to do as he had been bidden, and said he would spend his Sunday as he liked; and he drove off to the Royal Zoological Gardens.

Fire Island, one of the many summer resorts within easy reach of New York, has a reputation for coolness and healthfulness. The attractions of the place consist of fresh breezes from the ocean, bathing, fishing, and sailing. Bathing may be in the surf of the broad Atlantic, or in the quiet waters of the Great South Bay. Fish of various kinds and game in great abundance are to be found throughout the season. It seems a pity that such a cool, attractive spot should be allowed to retain its fiery name. Its reputation is established, and it is a most popular resort; nevertheless, how could a person with a vivid imagination expect to be cool and comfortable in August on any spot commonly and constantly called Fire Island? The very name brings a hot flush all over one. Fire Island should be rechristened.

The "Geographical Garden" is one of the latest novelties in Paris. The idea seems to be to inform the masses a little more definitely as to the whereabouts of Persia. A space of ground is laid out to represent the "five quarters" of the world; kingdoms are separated by gravel-walks, and continents by rills. The geography of the globe can be learned in an afternoon, and a voyage around the world can be taken for one franc.

No other plant will yield so much food to the acre, with so little outlay of labor, as the banana. A single tree under favorable circumstances will yield three crops in the year, of seventy-five pounds each. In tropical countries where the banana grows it is largely used when green, being roasted in hot ashes. It is also dried in an oven, and used as bread. The fruit is very nutritious, even when only half ripe, and forms a large portion of the daily food of the inhabitants of banana-growing regions. It is a singular and interesting fact that in those tropical regions, where the long-continued heat is so oppressive that labor becomes burdensome, man is supplied with food almost without the need of working. Where bananas grow, people can be lazy with impunity.

A popular preacher in one of the West End churches of London recently issued printed notices that the subject of his Sunday evening discourse would be "Kings of Persia as recorded in the Bible."

Before the Shah reached France the Parisians were hard at work making puns on the royal title. Chat has, of course, entered into the mind of the most facetious.

Quaint Scottish humor is well illustrated by a good story told by Mr. Gough:

Two sparks from London once came upon a decent-looking shepherd in Argyleshire, and accosted him with, "You have a very fine view here—you can see a great way."

"Yu ay, yu ay, a ferry great way."

"Ah! you can see America here, I suppose?"

"Farrar than that."

"How is that?"

"Yu jist wait tule the mists gang away, and you'll see the mune."

A veteran observer sarcastically says that a little baby is an easy thing to love, but a big baby is a hard thing to love, especially if you have married her—or him.

Morningside Park, when completed, will be a place of much interest to the residents on the upper part of Manhattan Island. It is within a short distance of the northwest corner of Central Park, extending from One Hundred and Tenth Street in a zigzag way to One Hundred and Twenty-third Street, its southeast corner touching St. Nicholas Avenue, between Eighth and Ninth avenues, and its northwest corner touching Tenth Avenue.

During the two weeks following the abolition of the franking privilege the receipts of the Post-office Department from the sale of stamps greatly exceeded in amount the receipts for any similar period in the history of the government.

When the Shah of Persia went to the theatre in Brussels he was rather heavily laden with jewelry, being adorned with precious stones valued at 2,000,000 francs.

"Elim" (some of our readers may need to be referred to Exodus, xv. 27, and Numbers, xxxiii. 9) is the name of Miss Smiley's "encampment" at Saratoga. The "palm-trees" are lacking, but the neat little cottage is under a group of oaks, and literally beside "twelve wells of water." A crystal spring bubbles up in her garden. The ground for her cottage was given her by the Quaker owner of Excelsior Spring.

Matilda Fletcher will be the oratress at the Nebraska State Agricultural Fair next autumn, and already she has announced that her subject will be "Farmers' Wives and Daughters." Her father was said to have been one of those close-fisted, "honest old farmers," of which our country boasts, and he raised thirteen children, whose brows were pretty thoroughly sweated by the old gentleman. Matilda has "been there," and knows all about it. Every thing that could be got out of a girl on a farm the kind father got out of her, yet she managed, plucky girl, to educate herself thoroughly, and can tell her Nebraskan sisters much that will brighten them up and encourage them. She is said to be a fine speaker, and you may be sure all the boys will be there to listen and applaud.

Whether the gain of a wife is worth the loss of an eye is a question which in time may be decided by a certain Roman gentleman who has recently made the exchange, though not exactly by his own choice. As the story goes, a young and rich and handsome American lady, resident in Rome, was in the habit (being somewhat eccentric) of taking long walks by herself, reading aloud, and "suiting the action to the word." Not long ago, being utterly unconscious of the presence of a gentleman in her path, in her elocutionary fervor she suddenly raised her umbrella with dramatic force. The sharp point entered the eye of the unfortunate man, who, with a shriek, fell insensible to the ground. For a moment the horrified girl was stunned; then dashing down book and umbrella, she rushed to a fountain near by, and returned with a dripping handkerchief to bathe the face of her unconscious victim. When the injured gentleman revived she ascertained that his carriage was near, and, of course, ran to call it, entered the vehicle with him, drove home with him, and there transformed herself into a Sister of Charity. The gentleman was well educated, witty, and of good Roman family—and the sequel is not difficult to imagine. The American lady has decided to bestow the use of her eyes upon him for life.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

EARLY familiar with all the forms of suffering and death, the life of Charlotte Brontë, from its commencement to its close, may be said to have been one prolonged endurance of agony. Yet the grandeur of her courage must always strike us as one of the sublimest spectacles. When a child she lost those who were dear to her, and there were none who could understand the vast yearnings of her nature. Then came the stirrings of her genius, and she longed to take flight, but her wings were weighted, and she was kept enchained to the dull earth. A few more years and another trouble, almost worse than death, cast its horrible shadow over her path. The melancholy story of her brother Branwell, whom she loved deeply, in spite of his numberless errors and terrible slavery to one master passion, is matter of general knowledge. To his end succeeded that of Emily Brontë, the sister whom Charlotte especially loved. To see her drift out into the great Unknown Sea was trouble inexpressible to that loving soul which had watched her with fostering care, and hoped to have witnessed the universal acknowledgment of her splendid genius. Seldom was the heavy cloud lifted from the head of our author on those dull Yorkshire hills: can it be matter of surprise, then, that her works should bear the impress of the character of her life? The wonder is that the sun should break through at all, as it does in Shirley, with beams of real geniality and cheerfulness. But the life was destructive of that gentler kind of humor of which we are sure Charlotte Brontë must have had originally a considerable endowment. She was necessarily propelled toward the painting of what was frequently harsh, and always peculiar and extraordinary. Her perceptions were keen—as will be admitted by the close student of her works—not only of human life, but of nature, and what she wrote must therefore exhibit the qualities of truth and strength. Severe discipline waited upon her through all her history, and its results are graphically depicted in her works, each of which deals with the experience of some stage of her brief existence. One almost wonders, as we follow her career, where her happiness came from. There was no society, no wealth, none of the common delights of life for her, while death was always approaching with measured but inevitable steps, when not, indeed, already in the house. Doubtless her literary occupations yielded her at times intense enjoyment, but she possessed, in addition, a faith in Providence which must have been like that of a child for simplicity and strength—a faith to which many who boasted of their Christian excellence were perfect strangers, and to whom its existence in her was utterly unsuspected.

The iron will of this truly great woman was never broken till the period came when she must yield up her own life. Then the weakness—if such it can be called—which she exhibited arose not from any fear respecting herself, but for the tender and faithful husband whom she was leaving behind. Desolation, blank and utter, overtook the father and husband, when her heart ceased to beat, such as the old parsonage had never experienced before. Charlotte's spirit had nerved others so long as it was with them, and the tenement of hope was not completely shattered till she died. The picture Mrs. Gaskell gives of the closing moments and of the funeral is very touching. With regard to the latter it painfully reminded her of the scene after the death of Oliver Goldsmith. Mr. Forster thus describes it: "The staircase of Brick Court is said to have been filled with mourners the reverse of domestic; women without a home, without domesticity of any kind, with no friend but him they had come to weep for; outcasts of that great solitary, wicked city, to whom he had never forgotten to be kind and charitable." Such would have followed Charlotte Brontë's remains to the grave, but the survivors wanted not the sympathy of strangers, their grief being too keen to be assuaged. Those who knew her best were the fallen and distressed, into whose bruised and dejected souls she had poured the sweet balm of sympathy.

"THE FAREWELL."

AFTER viewing a picture of this sort some of our readers may expect us to soar into the lofty realms of rhyme; but no, the subject is of too trite a character; we could say nothing that has not been better said a hundred times before. If the gentle reader be musically inclined, let her sit down to the piano-forte and warble forth, "Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath, dass man vom liebsten das man hat, muss scheiden;" or, better still perhaps, because in English, Mr. J. L. Hatton's charming ballad, "Good-by, sweetheart, good-by." Then she will be in a fit frame of mind to sympathize with this damsel, who is placing her lover's cloak round his shoulders while he buckles his belt. The lady can scarcely be called beautiful, according to our Anglo-Saxon ideas of beauty, but she looks honest and good—the sort of girl who will make a man comfortable at home, and that, we take it, was a quality as much appreciated in a wife during the stormy days of yore as it is, or ought to be, now.

CHAPTER XXI.

DANIEL AND THE LAWYER.

It has been said that the Countess, when she sent her daughter down to Yoxham, laid her plans with the conviction that the associations to which the girl would be subjected among the Lovels would fill her heart and mind with a newborn craving for the kind of life which she would find in the rector's family; and she had been right. Daniel Thwaite also had known that it would be so. He had been quite alive to the fact that he and his conversation would be abased, and that his power both of pleasing and of governing would be lessened by this new contact. But had he been able to hinder her going, he would not have done so. None of those who were now interested in his conduct knew aught of the character of this man. Sir William Patterson had given him credit for some honesty, but even he had not perceived, —had had no opportunity of perceiving—the stanch uprightness which was, as it were, a backbone to the man in all his doings. He was ambitious, discontented, sullen, tyrannical. He hated the domination of others, but was prone to domineer himself. He suspected evil of all above him in rank, and the millennium to which he looked forward was to be produced by the gradual extirpation of all social distinctions. Gentlemen, so called, were to him as savages, which had to be cleared away in order that that perfection might come at last which the course of nature was to produce in obedience to the ordinances of the Creator. But he was a man who reverenced all laws, and a law, if recognized as a law, was a law to him whether enforced by a penalty, or simply exigent of obedience from his conscience. This girl had been thrown in his way, and he had first pitied and then loved her from his childhood. She had been injured by the fiendish malice of her own father, and that father had been an earl. He had been strong in fighting for the rights of the mother, not because it had been the mother's right to be a countess, but in opposition to the Earl. At first, indeed throughout all these years of conflict except the last year, there had been a question, not of money, but of right. The wife was entitled to due support—to what measure of support Daniel had never known or inquired; but the daughter had been entitled to nothing. The Earl, had he made his will before he was mad—or, more probably, had he not destroyed, when mad, the will which he had before made—might and would have left the girl without a shilling. In those days, when Daniel's love was slowly growing, when he wandered about with the child among the rocks, when the growing girl had first learned to swear to him that he should always be her friend of friends, when the love of the boy had first become the passion of the man, there had been no thought of money in it. Money! Had he not been well aware from his earliest understanding of the need of money for all noble purposes that the earnings of his father, which should have made the world to him a world of promise, were being lavished in the service of these forlorn women? He had never complained; they were welcome to it all. That young girl was all the world to him; and it was right that all should be spent; as though she had been a sister, as though she had already been his wife. There had been no plot then by which he was to become rich on the Earl's wealth. Then had come the will, and the young Earl's claims, and the general belief of men in all quarters that the young Earl was to win every thing. What was left of the tailor's savings was still being spent on behalf of the Countess. The first fee that ever found its way into the pocket of Sergeant Bluestone had come from the diminished hoard of old Thomas Thwaite. Then the will had been set aside; and gradually the cause of the Countess had grown to be in the ascendant. Was he to drop his love, to confess himself unworthy, and to slink away out of her sight, because the girl would become an heiress? Was he even to conceive so badly of her as to think that she would drop her love because she was an heiress? There was no such humility about him, nor such absence of self-esteem. But, as regarded her, he told himself at once that she should have the chance of being base and noble—all base, and all noble as far as title and social standing could make her so—if such were her desire. He had come to her and offered her her freedom; had done so, indeed, with such hot language of indignant protest against the gilded gingerbread of her interested suitor as would have frightened her from the acceptance of his offer had she been minded to accept it; but his words had been hot, not from a premeditated purpose to thwart his own seeming liberality, but because his nature was hot and his temper imperious. This lordling was then ready to wed his bride—the girl he had known and succored throughout their joint lives—simply because she was rich and the lordling was a pauper. From the bottom of his heart he despised the lordling. He had said to himself a score of times that he could be well content to see the lord take the money, waste it among thieves and prostitutes, and again become a pauper, while he had the girl to sit with him at his board, and share with him the earnings of his honest labor. Of course he had spoken out; but the girl should be at liberty to do as she pleased.

He wrote no line to her before she went, or while she was at Yoxham, nor did he speak a word concerning her during her absence. But as he sat at his work, or walked to and fro between his home and the shop, or lay sleepless in bed, all his thoughts were of her. Twice or thrice a week he would knock at the door of the Countess's room, and say a word or two, as was rendered natural by their long previous intercourse. But there had been no real intercourse between them. The Countess told him nothing of her plans, nor did he ever speak to her of his. Each suspected the other, and each was grimly civil. Once or twice the Countess expressed a hope that the money advanced by Thomas Thwaite might soon be repaid to him with much interest. Daniel would always treat the subject with a noble indifference. His father, he said, had never felt an hour's regret at having parted with his money. Should it, perchance, come back to him, he would take it, no doubt, with thanks.

Then he heard one evening, as he returned from his work, that the Countess was about to remove herself on the morrow to another home. The woman of the house, who told him, did not know where the Countess had fixed her future abode. He passed on up to his bedroom, washed his hands, and immediately went down to his fellow-lodger. After the first ordinary greeting, which was cold and almost unkind, he at once asked his question. "They tell me that you go from this to-morrow, Lady Lovel." She paused a moment, and then bowed her head. "Where is it that you are going to live?" She paused again, and paused long, for she had to think what answer she would make him. "Do you object to let me know?" he asked.

"Mr. Thwaite, I must object."

Then at that moment there came upon him the memory of all that he and his father had done, and not the thought of that which he intended to do. This was the gratitude of a Countess! "In that case of course I shall not ask again. I had hoped that we were friends."

"Of course we are friends. Your father has been the best friend I ever had. I shall write to your father and let him know. I am bound to let your father know all that I do. But at present my case is in the hands of my lawyers, and they have advised that I should tell no one in London where I live."

"Then good-evening, Lady Lovel. I beg your pardon for having intruded." He left the room without another word, throwing off the dust from his feet as he went with violent indignation. He and she must now be enemies. She had told him that she would separate herself from him—and they must be separated. Could he have expected better things from a declared countess? But how would it be with Lady Anna? She also had a title. She also would have wealth. She might become a countess if she wished it. Let him only know by one sign from her that she did wish it, and he would take himself off at once to the farther side of the globe, and live in a world contaminated by no noble lords and titled ladies. As it happened, the Countess might as well have given him the address, as the woman at the lodgings informed him on the next morning that the Countess had removed herself to No. — Keppel Street.

He did not doubt that Lady Anna was about to return to London. That quick removal would not otherwise have been made. But what mattered it to him whether she were at Yoxham or in Keppel Street? He could do nothing. There would come a time—but it had not come as yet—when he must go to the girl boldly, let her be guarded as she might, and demand her hand. But the demand must be made to herself, and herself only. When that time came there should be no question of money. Whether she were the undisturbed owner of hundreds of thousands or a rejected claimant to her father's name, the demand should be made in the same tone and with the same assurance. He knew well the whole history of her life. She had been twenty years old last May, and it was now September. When the next spring should come round she would be her own mistress, free to take herself from her mother's hands, and free to give herself to whom she would. He did not say that nothing should be done during those eight months; but, according to his lights, he could not make his demand with full force till she was a woman as free from all legal control as was he as a man.

The chances were much against him. He knew what were the allurements of luxury. There were moments in which he told himself that of course she would fall into the nets that were spread for her. But then again there would grow within his bosom a belief in truth and honesty which would buoy him up. How grand would be his victory, how great the triumph of a human soul's nobility, if, after all these dangers, if, after all the enticements of wealth and rank, the girl should come to him, and, lying on his bosom, should tell him that she had never wavered from him through it all. Of this, at any rate, he assured himself—that he would not go prying, with clandestine manœuvres, about that house in Keppel Street. The Countess might have told him where she intended to live without increasing her danger.

While things were in this state with him he received a letter from Messrs. Norton and Flick, the attorneys, asking him to call on Mr. Flick at their chambers in Lincoln's Inn. The Solicitor-General had suggested to the attorney that he should see the man, and Mr. Flick had found himself bound to obey; but in truth he hardly knew what to say to Daniel Thwaite. It must be his object of course to buy off the tailor; but such arrangements are difficult, and require great control. And then Mr. Flick was employed by Earl Lovel, and this man was the friend of the Earl's opponents in the case. Mr. Flick did feel that the Solicitor-General was moving into great irregularities in this cause. The cause itself was no doubt peculiar—unlike any other cause with which Mr. Flick had become acquainted in his experience; there was no saying at the present moment who had opposed interests, and who combined interests in the case; but still etiquette is etiquette, and Mr. Flick was aware that such a house as that of Messrs. Norton and Flick should not be irregular. Nevertheless he sent for Daniel Thwaite.

After having explained who he was, which Daniel knew very well without being told, Mr. Flick began his work. "You are aware, Mr. Thwaite, that the friends on both sides are endeavoring to arrange this question amicably without any further litigation."

"I am aware that the friends of Lord Lovel, finding that they have no ground to stand on at law, are endeavoring to gain their object by other means."

"No, Mr. Thwaite. I can not admit that for a moment—that would be altogether an erroneous view of the proceeding."

"Is Lady Anna Lovel the legitimate daughter of the late Earl?"

"That is what we do not know. That is what nobody knows. You are not a lawyer, Mr. Thwaite, or you would be aware that there is nothing more difficult to decide than questions of legitimacy. It has sometimes taken all the courts a century to decide whether a marriage is a marriage or not. You have heard of the great MacFarlane case. To find out who was the MacFarlane, they had to go back a hundred and twenty years, and at last decide on the memory of a man whose grandmother had told him that she had seen a woman wearing a wedding-ring. The case cost over forty thousand pounds, and took nineteen years. As far as I can see, this is more complicated even than that. We should in all probability have to depend on the proceedings of the courts in Sicily, and you and I would never live to see the end of it."

"You would live on it, Mr. Flick, which is more than I could do."

"Mr. Thwaite, that, I think, is a very improper observation; but, however— My object is to explain to you that all these difficulties may be got over by a very proper and natural alliance between Earl Lovel and the lady who is at present called by courtesy Lady Anna Lovel."

"By the Crown's courtesy, Mr. Flick," said the tailor, who understood the nature of the titles which he hated.

"We allow the name, I grant you, at present; and are anxious to promote the marriage. We are all most anxious to bring to a close this ruinous litigation. Now I am told that the young lady feels herself hampered by some childish promise that has been made—to you."

Daniel Thwaite had expected no such announcement as this. He did not conceive that the girl would tell the story of her engagement, and was unprepared at the moment for any reply. But he was not a man to remain unready long. "Do you call it childish?" he said.

"I do, certainly."

"Then what would her engagement be if now made with the Earl? The engagement with me, as an engagement, is not yet twelve months old, and has been repeated within the last month. She is an infant, Mr. Flick, according to your language, and therefore, perhaps, a child in the eye of the law. If Lord Lovel wishes to marry her, why doesn't he do so? He is not hindered, I suppose, by her being a child."

"Any marriage with you, you know, would in fact be impossible."

"A marriage with me, Mr. Flick, would be quite as possible as one with the Lord Lovel. When the lady is of age, no clergyman in England dare refuse to marry us, if the rules prescribed by law have been obeyed."

"Well, well, Mr. Thwaite; I do not want to argue with you about the law and about possibilities. The marriage would not be fitting, and you know that it would not be fitting."

"It would be most unfitting—unless the lady wished it as well as I. Just as much may be said of her marriage with Earl Lovel. To which of us has she given her promise? which of us has she known and loved? which of us has won her by long friendship and steady regard? and which of us, Mr. Flick, is attracted to the marriage by the lately assured wealth of the young woman? I never understood that Lord Lovel was my rival when Lady Anna was regarded as the base-born child of the deceased madman."

"I suppose, Mr. Thwaite, you are not indifferent to her money?"

"Then you suppose wrongly—as lawyers mostly do when they take upon themselves to attribute motives."

"You are not civil, Mr. Thwaite."

"You did not send for me here, Sir, in order that there should be civilities between us. But I will at least be true. In regard to Lady Anna's money, should it become mine by reason of her marriage with me, I will guard it for her sake, and for that of the children she may bear, with all my power. I will assert her right to it as a man should do. But my purpose in seeking her hand will neither be strengthened nor weakened by her money. I believe that it is hers. Nay, I know that the law will give it to her. On her behalf, as being betrothed to her, I defy Lord Lovel and all other claimants. But her money and her hand are two things apart, and I will never be governed as to the one by any regard as to the other. Perhaps, Mr. Flick, I have said enough—and so, good-morning." Then he went away.

The lawyer had never dared to suggest the compromise which had been his object in sending for the man. He had not dared to ask the tailor how much ready money he would take, down, to abandon the lady, and thus to relieve them all from that difficulty. No doubt he exercised a wise discretion, as had he done so, Daniel Thwaite might have become even more uncivil than before.

CHAPTER XXII.

THERE IS A GULF FIXED.

"Do you think that you could be happier as the wife of such a one as Daniel Thwaite, a creature infinitely beneath you, separated as you would be from all your kith and kin, from all whose blood you share, from me and from your family, than you would be as the bearer of a proud name, the daughter and the wife of an Earl Lovel, the mother of the earl to come? I will not speak now of duty, or of fitness, or of the happiness of others which must depend upon you. It is natural that a girl should look to her own joys in marriage. Do you think that your joy can consist in calling that man your husband?"

It was thus that the Countess spoke to her daughter, who was then lying worn out and ill on her bed in Keppel Street. For three days she had been subject to such addresses as this, and during those three days no word of tenderness had been spoken to her. The Countess had been obdurate in her hardness, still believing that she might thus break her daughter's spirit, and force her to abandon her engagement. But as yet she had not succeeded. The girl had been meek and, in all other things, submissive. She had not defended her conduct. She had not attempted to say that she had done well in promising to be the tailor's bride. She had shown herself willing by her silence to have her engagement regarded as a great calamity, as a dreadful evil, that had come upon the whole Lovel family. She had not boldness to speak to her mother as she had spoken on the subject to the Earl. She threw herself entirely upon her promise, and spoke of her coming destiny as though it had been made irrevocable by her own word. "I have promised him, mamma, and have sworn that it should be so." That was the answer which she now made from her bed—the answer which she had made a dozen times during the last three days.

"Is every body belonging to you to be ruined because you once spoke a foolish word?"

"Mamma, it was often spoken, very often, and he does not wish that any body should be ruined. He told me that Lord Lovel might have the money."

"Foolish, ungrateful girl! It is not for Lord Lovel that I am pleading to you. It is for the name, and for your own honor. Do you not constantly pray to God to keep you in that state of life to which it has pleased Him to call you, and are you not departing from it willfully and sinfully by such an act as this?" But still Lady Anna continued to say that she was bound by the obligation which was upon her.

On the following day the Countess was frightened, believing that the girl was really ill. In truth she was ill, so that the doctor who visited her declared that she must be treated with great care. She was harassed in spirit—so the doctor said—and must be taken away, so that she might be amused. The Countess was frightened, but still was resolute. She not only loved her daughter, but loved no other human being on the face of the earth. Her daughter was all that she had to bind her to the world around her. But she declared to herself again and again that it would be better that her daughter should die than live and be married to the tailor. It was a case in which persecution even to the very gate of the grave would be wise and warrantable, if by such persecution this odious, monstrous marriage might be avoided. And she did believe that persecution would avail at last. If she were only steady in her resolve, the girl would never dare to demand the right to leave her mother's house and walk off to the church to be married to Daniel Thwaite, without the countenance of a single friend. The girl's strength was not of that nature. But were she, the Countess, to yield an inch, then this evil might come upon them. She had heard that young people can always beat their parents if they be sufficiently obdurate. Parents are soft-hearted to their children, and are prone to yield. And so would she have been soft-hearted, if the interests concerned had been less important, if the deviation from duty had been less startling, or the union proposed less monstrous and disgraceful. But in this case it behooved her to be obdurate, even though it should be to the very gates of the grave. "I swear to you," she said, "that the day of your marriage to Daniel Thwaite shall be the day of my death."

In her straits she went to Sergeant Bluestone for advice. Now the Sergeant had hitherto been opposed to all compromise, feeling certain that every thing might be gained without the sacrifice of a single right. He had not a word to say against a marriage between the two cousins, but let the cousin who was the heiress be first placed in possession of her rights. Let her be empowered, when she consented to become Lady Lovel, to demand such a settlement of the property as would be made on her behalf if she were the undisputed owner of the property. Let her marry the lord if she would, but not do so in order that she might obtain the partial enjoyment of that which was all her own. And then, so the Sergeant had argued, the widowed Countess would never be held to have established absolutely her own right to her name, should any compromise be known to have been effected. People might call her Countess Lovel; but, behind her back, they would say that she was no countess. The Sergeant had been very hot about it, especially disliking the interference of Sir William. But now, when he heard this new story, his heat gave way. Any thing must be done that could be done; every thing must be done to hinder such a termination to the career of the two ladies as would come from a marriage with the tailor.

But he was somewhat dismayed when he came to understand the condition of affairs in Keppel Street. "How can I not be severe?" said the Countess, when he remonstrated with her. "If I were tender with her she would think that I was yielding. Is not every thing at stake, every thing for which my life has been devoted?" The Sergeant called his wife into council, and then suggested that Lady Anna should spend a week or two in Bedford Square. He assured the Countess that she might be quite sure that Daniel Thwaite should find no entrance within his doors.

"But if Lord Lovel would do us the honor to visit us, we should be most happy to see him," said the Sergeant.

Lady Anna was removed to Bedford Square, and there became subject to treatment that was milder but not less persistent. Mrs. Bluestone lectured her daily, treating her with the utmost respect, paying to her rank a deference, which was not indeed natural to the good lady, but which was assumed, so that Lady Anna might the better comprehend the difference between her own position and that of the tailor. The girls were told nothing of the tailor, lest the disgrace of so unnatural a partiality might shock their young minds; but they were instructed that there was danger, and that they were always, in speaking to their guest, to take it for granted that she was to become Countess Lovel. Her maid, Sarah, went with her to the Sergeant's, and was taken into a half confidence. Lady Anna was never to be left a moment alone. She was to be a prisoner with gilded chains, for whom a splendid, a glorious future was in prospect, if only she would accept it.

"I really think that she likes the lord the best," said Mrs. Bluestone to her husband.

"Then why the mischief won't she have him?" This was in October, and that November term was fast approaching in which the cause was set down for trial.

"I almost think she would if he'd come and ask her again. Of course I have never mentioned the other man; but when I speak to her of Earl Lovel she always answers me as though she were almost in love with him. I was inquiring yesterday what sort of a man he was, and she said he was quite perfect. 'It is a thousand pities,' she said, 'that he should not have this money. He ought to have it, as he is the Earl.'"

"Why doesn't she give it to him?"

"I asked her that; but she shook her head and said that it could never be. I think that man has made her swear some sort of awful oath, and has frightened her."

"No doubt he has made her swear an oath, but we all know how the gods regard the perjuries of lovers," said the Sergeant. "We must get the young lord here when he comes back to town."

"Is he handsome?" asked Alice Bluestone, the younger daughter, who had become Lady Anna's special friend in the family. Of course they were talking of Lord Lovel.

"Every body says he is."

"But what do you say?"

"I don't think it matters much about a man being handsome, but he is beautiful. Not dark, like all the other Lovels; nor yet what you call fair. I don't think that fair men ever look manly."

"Oh no," said Alice, who was contemplating an engagement with a black-haired young barrister.

"Lord Lovel is brown, with blue eyes; but it is the shape of his face that is so perfect—an oval, you know, that is not too long. But it isn't that makes him look as he does. He looks as though every body in the world ought to do exactly what he tells them."

"And why don't you, dear, do exactly what he tells you?"

"Ah, that is another question. I should do many things if he told me. He is the head of our family. I think he ought to have all this money, and be a rich great man, as the Earl Lovel should be."

"And yet you won't be his wife?"

"Would you, if you had promised another man?"

"Have you promised another man?"

"Yes—I have."

"Who is he, Lady Anna?"

"They have not told you, then?"

"No, nobody has told me. I know they all want you to marry Lord Lovel, and I know he wants it. I know he is quite in love with you."

"Ah—I do not think that. But if he were, it could make no difference. If you had once given your word to another man, would you go back because a lord asked you?"

"I don't think I would ever give my word without asking mamma."

"If he had been good to you, and you had loved him always, and he had been your best friend—what would you do then?"

"Who is he, Lady Anna?"

"Do not call me Lady Anna, or I shall not like you. I will tell you, but you must not say that I told you. Only I thought every body knew. I told Lord Lovel, and he, I think, has told all the world. It is Mr. Daniel Thwaite."

"Mr. Daniel Thwaite!" said Alice, who had heard enough of the case to know who the Thwaites were. "He is a tailor!"

"Yes," said Lady Anna, proudly; "he is a tailor."

"Surely that can not be good," said Alice, who, having long since felt what it was to be the daughter of a sergeant, had made up her mind that she would marry nothing lower than a barrister.

"It is what you call bad, I dare say."

"I don't think a tailor can be a gentleman."

"I don't know. Perhaps I wasn't a lady when I promised him. But I did promise. You can never know what he and his father did for us. I think we should have died only for them. You don't know how we lived—in a little cottage, with hardly any money, with nobody to come near us but they. Every body else thought that we were vile and wicked. It is true. But they always were good to us. Would not you have loved him?"

"I should have loved him in a kind of way."

"When one takes so much, one must give in return what one has to give," said Lady Anna.

"Do you love him still?"

"Of course I love him."

"And you wish to be his wife?"

"Sometimes I think I don't. It is not that I am ashamed for myself. What would it have signified if I had gone away with him straight from Cumberland before I had ever seen my cousin? Supposing that mamma hadn't been the Countess—"

"But she is."

"So they say now; but if they had said that she was not, nobody would have thought it wrong then for me to marry Mr. Thwaite."

"Don't you think it wrong yourself?"

"It would be best for me to say that I would never marry any one at all. He would be very angry with me."

"Lord Lovel?"

"Oh no; not Lord Lovel. Daniel would be very angry, because he really loves me. But it would not be so bad to him as though I became Lord Lovel's wife. I will tell you the truth, dear. I am ashamed to marry Mr. Thwaite—not for myself, but because I am Lord Lovel's cousin and mamma's daughter. And I should be ashamed to marry Lord Lovel."

"Why, dear?"

"Because I should be so false and so ungrateful! I should be afraid to stand before him if he looked at me. You do not know how he can look. He, too, can command. He, too, is noble. They believe it is the money he wants, and when they call him a tailor, they think that he must be mean. He is not mean. He is clever, and can talk about things better than my cousin. He can work hard and give away all that he earns. And so could his father. They gave all they had to us, and have never asked it again. I kissed him once—and then he said I had paid all my mother's debt." Alice Bluestone shrank within herself when she was told by this daughter of a countess of such a deed. It was horrid to her mind that a tailor should be kissed by a Lady Anna Lovel. But she herself had perhaps been as generous to the black-browed young barrister, and had thought no harm. "They think I do not understand, but I do. They all want this money, and then they accuse him, and say he does it that he may become rich. He would give up all the money—just for me. How would you feel if it were like that with you?"

"I think that a girl who is a lady should never marry a man who is not a gentleman. You know the story of the rich man who could not get to Abraham's bosom because there was a gulf fixed. That is how it should be—just as there is with royal people as to marrying royalty. Otherwise every thing would get mingled, and there would soon be no difference. If there are to be differences, there should be differences. That is the meaning of being a gentleman—or a lady." So spoke the young female Conservative with wisdom beyond her years—nor did she speak quite in vain.

"I believe what I had better do would be to die," said Lady Anna. "Every thing would come right then."

Some day or two after this Sergeant Bluestone sent a message up to Lady Anna, on his return home from the courts, with a request that she would have the great kindness to come down to him in his study. The Sergeant had treated her with more than all the deference due to her rank since she had been in his house, striving to teach her what it was to be the daughter of an earl and probable owner of twenty thousand a year. The Sergeant, to give him his due, cared as little as most men for the peerage. He vailed his bonnet to no one but a judge—and not always that with much ceremonious observance. But now his conduct was a part of his duty to a client whom he was determined to see established in her rights. He would have handed her her cup of tea on his knees every morning, if by doing so he could have made clear to her eyes how deep would be her degradation were she to marry the tailor. The message was now brought to her by Mrs. Bluestone, who almost apologized for asking her to trouble herself to walk down stairs to the back-parlor. "My dear Lady Anna," said the Sergeant, "may I ask you to sit down for a moment or two while I speak to you? I have just left your mother."

"How is dear mamma?" The Sergeant assured her that the Countess was well in health. At this time Lady Anna had not visited her mother since she had left Keppel Street, and had been told that Lady Lovel had refused to see her till she had pledged herself never to marry Daniel Thwaite. "I do so wish I might go to mamma!"

"With all my heart I wish you could, Lady Anna. Nothing makes such heart-burning sorrow as a family quarrel. But what can I say? You know what your mother thinks?"

"Couldn't you manage that she should let me go there just once?"

"I hope that we can manage it; but I want you to listen to me first. Lord Lovel is back in London." She pressed her lips together and fastened one hand firmly on the other. If the assurance that was required from her was ever to be exacted, it should not be exacted by Sergeant Bluestone. "I have seen his lordship to-day," continued the Sergeant, "and he has done me the honor to promise that he will dine here to-morrow."

"Lord Lovel?"

"Yes; your cousin, Earl Lovel. There is no reason, I suppose, why you should not meet him? He has not offended you?"

"Oh no. But I have offended him."

"I think not, Lady Anna. He does not speak of you as though there were offense."

"When we parted he would hardly look at me, because I told him— You know what I told him."

"A gentleman is not necessarily offended because a lady does not accept his first offer. Many gentlemen would be offended if that were so—and very many happy marriages would never have a chance of being made. At any rate he is coming, and I thought that perhaps you would excuse me if I endeavored to explain how very much may depend on the manner in which you may receive him. You must feel that things are not going on quite happily now."

"I am so unhappy, Sergeant Bluestone!"

"Yes, indeed. It must be so. You are likely to be placed—I think I may say you certainly will be placed—in such a position that the whole prosperity of a noble and ancient family must depend on what you may do. With one word you can make once more bright a fair name that has long been beneath a cloud. Here in England the welfare of the state depends on the conduct of our aristocracy!" Oh, Sergeant Bluestone, Sergeant Bluestone! how could you so far belie your opinion as to give expression to a sentiment utterly opposed to your own convictions! But what is there that a counsel will not do for a client? "If they whom Fate and Fortune have exalted forget what the country has a right to demand from them, farewell, alas, to the glory of old England!" He had found this kind of thing very effective with twelve men, and surely it might prevail with one poor girl. "It is not for me, Lady Anna, to dictate to you the choice of a husband. But it has become my duty to point out to you the importance of your own choice, and to explain to you, if it may be possible, that you are not like other young ladies. You have in your hands the marring or the making of the whole family of Lovel. As for that suggestion of a marriage to which you were induced to give ear by feelings of gratitude, it would, if carried out, spread desolation in the bosom of every relative to whom you are bound by the close ties of noble blood." He finished his speech, and Lady Anna retired without a word.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

DO you wish to know the novelties that are in preparation for the coming autumn? They are dress trimmings of twine—yes, of common twine—such as is used to tie up grocers' bundles, and which is to be used for embroidery, mixed with jet, on the fall wrappings and polonaises. Fashion has such power, and, on the other hand, Parisians have such taste, that, however one may laugh, he can not help seeing that the invention is not so absurd as it seemed at first thought. Besides embroidery, fringe is also made of twine. These I have seen. It is also said that canvas guipure is to be made of the same material; but not having seen it, I can not guarantee it as certain. The suit for which this trimming was prepared was of olive green vigogne. The skirt was embroidered perpendicularly with twine, the design forming stripes a little way apart. The polonaise was of the same material, profusely embroidered with twine, and edged with twine fringe. On black stuffs, jet will be mixed with the twine.

But weeks still intervene before the time when twine will enter the lists in the battle-field of fashion to conquer or die. At present the summer toilettes in preparation for country reunions are those that chiefly engage the attention. The favorite fabrics are batiste of delicate colors—pale pink, blue, or mauve—trimmed with flounces and ruches of vaporous white organdy; and also white nansook suits, made very short, in the following fashion: The lower edge is cut in very large scallops, and trimmed half a yard deep with English (open-work) embroidery, surmounted by a ruche of plain nansook, which is surmounted in turn by a narrow band of English embroidery scalloped on the upper edge. Under the scallops of the lower edge is set a pleated flounce of plain nansook. Over-skirt of the same, trimmed almost the entire length with English embroidery, surmounted by a ruche of plain nansook. A sash of very wide shaded pink ribbon passes under this over-skirt, and drapes it very high behind, so as to form a natural (not fixed) pouf, and is finished in the middle of the back with a large bow. The waist is almost high behind and low in front; but bands of English embroidery placed inside give it the appearance of being open en carré. Long nansook sleeves, trimmed with English embroidery. Around the upper edge of the opening in front is set an upright band of English embroidery, forming a sort of Medici frill.

Natural poufs seem destined to grow in popularity on fabrics of all kinds for autumn dresses. They are called thus because they are not sewed or draped, but are formed by tying up the upper part of an overlong skirt with the aid of a wide ribbon sash. The skirt is generally covered with narrow flounces.

The use of two shades of a color both for suits and for trimmings will continue through the autumn and winter. Fashion has not yet exhausted the numerous effects that can be produced with these combinations. For the moment the darker shade is considered best suited for the base of the composition—the skirt is dark, and the polonaise is made of the lighter shade; or else, if the skirt and polonaise are of the same shade, the trimmings and ornaments of all kinds are of the lighter one. Black faille dresses with pearl gray trimmings, vest, and cuffs will be much in vogue next autumn.

Mantelets are becoming more and more numerous. For the demi-season (September and the first half of October), at the sea-side or in the country, these mantelets, which have hoods, are made of very fine red, black, or blue striped flannel, and are trimmed with écru guipure and trellis-work of écru ribbon. They may be made in a less conspicuous fashion of some woolen fabric, such as serge or vigogne, of a dark color. A very pretty mantelet of this kind, which I have just seen in course of preparation, was of dark bottle green vigogne. The back was shaped something like a burnous. It was slashed very high on each side, and had square tabs, crossing in front. The high slashes of which I have just spoken were masked half-way up by a trellis of pale green ribbon, terminating with loops of the same. The mantelet was bordered all around the edge with a bias fold of pale green silk, embroidered with silk of a darker shade. The back terminated in the middle in two points, each finished with a pale green tassel.

Short double capes of all colors, but principally of dark bronze, are also in preparation for fall. The edge is trimmed with wide cameo embroidery—that is, worked with several shades of worsted proceeding from the color of the ground. The contour of the design, representing leaves, is scalloped, and this forms the edge of each cape.

There is also a new and very graceful modification of the Dolman, called the Dolman mantelet. The back is hollowed out, and consequently naturally adjusted like that of the Dolman; but the front is like that of a mantelet. This is made of blue-black cloth, and trimmed simply with coarse worsted galloon. But I seem to be taking time by the forelock, and speaking only of still distant fashions. Nevertheless, I speak with certainty; for I describe nothing but what I have seen with my own eyes in the hands of the modistes, who prepare in summer for autumn, and even for winter.

At this moment what we see most is suits of coutil, christened Oxford linen; polonaises of dark percale with white figures, worn over skirts of plain percale, or silk of the same color as the ground of the polonaise; and, above all, polonaises of white nansook or muslin, more or less trimmed with insertion and lace, and worn over black or gray silk skirts; for demi-toilette these are trimmed with bows and a sash of black ribbon, and for more dressy occasions with a light sash and bows—pale blue, pale pink, or pale lilac. The prettiest and most elegant of summer and fall dresses is still faille of some light color, trimmed with a multitude of white organdy flounces, pleated and simply hemmed. This forms a light and vaporous ensemble which is singularly effective, and which has met with such favor that it is almost universal. There is hardly a woman in France who has not, when she sets out for her château in September, one or more of these dresses of lilac, blue, pink, or sea green faille, covered with white organdy flounces, and designed to form the chief ornament of the evening at the coming reunions.

Bonnets are likely to be a little larger, though no less eccentric in shape. All the kitchen utensils seem to have been pressed into service: kettles, saucepans, and salad-bowls are imitated in straw, silk, and gauze, and intrepidly worn in the guise of a helmet, with the addition of an aigrette, a plume, or a bunch of flowers.

For very warm weather low shoes, with high heels and ribbon rosettes, are worn even in the streets; for traveling and the country, buff kid boots are in favor; while for evening Louis XV. slippers of the same color as the dress, whatever that may be, are the latest styles. Fans are immense, and are of the color of the dress. Parasols are made with stubby handles, thick and short, with a flattened ball of metal at the end, and have a chain and hook by which to fasten them to the belt. Large agrafes and clasps of chased metal are in preparation for the fall wrappings.

FRENCH MARRIAGES.

WHERE we so ordinarily listen to what we understand by love, to the temptations of the young heart in all their forms (however transitory), to our individual impressions, and to our own opinions, the French consult fitnesses of relative situation, reciprocities of fortune and position, and harmonies of family intercourse. They seek to insure the future, in some degree, in its social as well as its pecuniary forms. They lay it down that passion is no guide to permanent satisfaction, and that other people than the two directly interested have, both in law and reason, a right of judgment in so grave a case. This does not absolutely mean that pre-existing sympathies are considered to be unnecessary for marriage in France; but it does mean, in the distinctest language, that such sympathies alone are not admitted there as a sufficient motive for an association which is to last till death. Sympathies wear out sometimes; new ones grow up from other contacts; eternal attachments are very rare between people who have not managed to get married, and have not the aid of the wedded tie to hold them steadily together. But the necessities of life never fade away; they never weaken; they remain in force with pitiless persistence; and French parents pay more attention to them than to what may be only a passing inclination in their sons and daughters.

And it must be borne in mind that this view of marriage is not solely a development of the national disposition toward prudence: it is also, to some extent at all events, a consequence of the legal enactments contained in the Code Napoléon. The law forbids all marriages without either the consent of the father and mother, or proof that they are both dead. It is very troublesome to get married in France. The operation is surrounded by difficulties and formalities which would make an Englishman stamp with rage. It is true that if parents refuse to allow their children to follow their own wishes, the latter are permitted, provided they have attained their majority, to go through a process called "a respectful summons to consent;" after which, if the parents persist in their rejection of the appeal, marriage may be at last attained. No matter at what age men or women marry, even if they are sixty, they must either produce the written consent of their father and mother, or show that they have applied for it in due legal form and that it has been denied them without sufficient cause, or prove that they are orphans. The object of this legislation is not only to prevent bigamy (which, under such conditions, is naturally rare in France), but even more to maintain parental authority, and to insure a due subjection of children.

H. I. H. MARIE-FEODOROVNA, CZAREVNA OF RUSSIA.

THE accompanying fine illustration gives a striking portrait of the wife of the Czarowitz of Russia, and daughter of the King of Denmark, who, like her sister, the Princess of Wales, is probably destined, sooner or later, to grace the throne of one of the greatest and most powerful of the world's empires. It will be remembered that when Princess Dagmar she was betrothed in early youth to the eldest son of Alexander II., the promising youth whose untimely death was so deeply mourned in Russia. Two years later, in 1865, she was summoned to his death-bed at Nice, when, placing her hand in that of his brother Alexander, he begged, as a dying request, that they might be betrothed after his death. Accordingly in the November of the following year she was married to the present Czarowitz, entering the Greek Church as a consequence of her marriage, and changing her name from Marie-Sophie-Frederique-Dagmar to the more Muscovite-sounding Marie-Feodorovna. The Czarevna has two children. The eldest was born in 1868, and is named Nicholas, and the second, born a year afterward, Alexander, both boys being colonels in the Russian army. It is rumored that her younger sister, the Princess Thyra, will marry Prince Arthur of England, while her sister-in-law, the Grand Duchess Marie, the only daughter of the Czar, is shortly to be married to Prince Alfred, the second son of Queen Victoria.

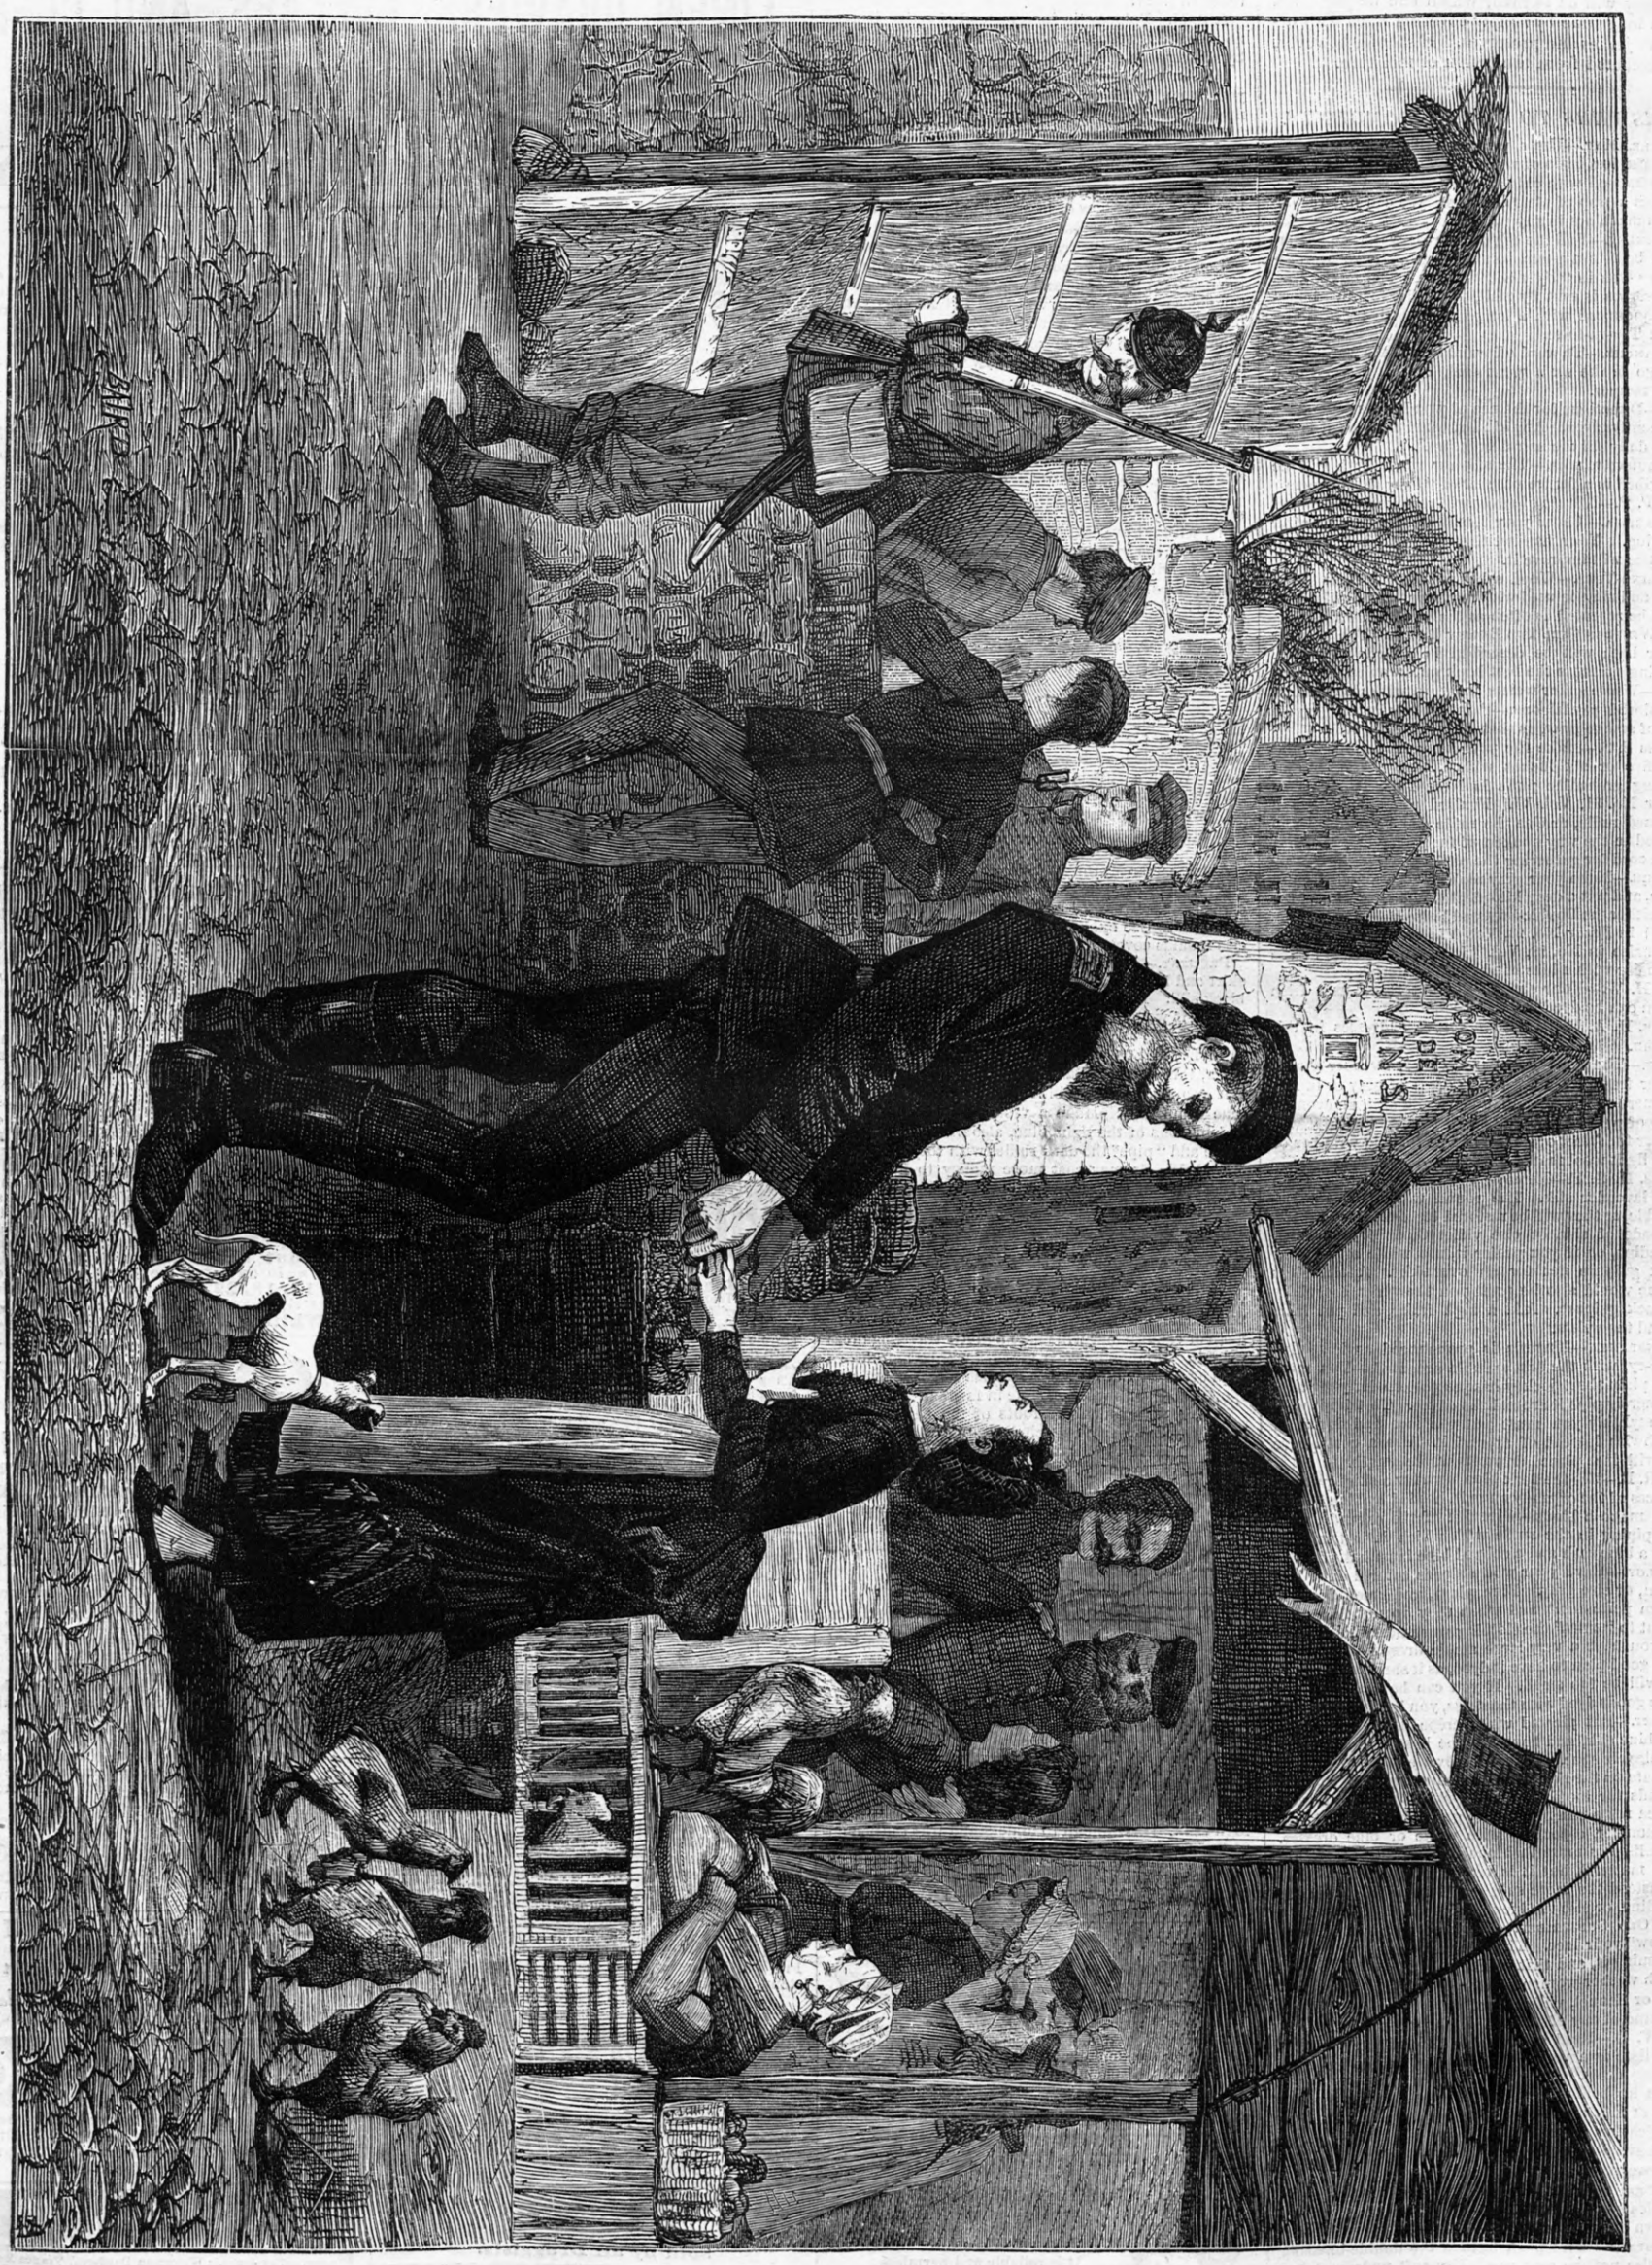
THE PRUSSIAN'S FAREWELL TO FRANCE.

NATURALLY, without doubt, there is bitter animosity between France and Germany at the present time, especially on the part of the country which has been worsted; but, equally without doubt, a good many mutual tendernesses between individuals have sprung up during the occupation of the eastern provinces. How hard it must be in such a case, especially for the woman, when the word of command arrives bidding her lover pack up and depart! Most likely the poor girl has offended all her friends by her unseasonable love affair. How could she be so unpatriotic as to go and fall in love with a detestable, sausage-eating, Champagne-swilling, clock-acquiring Prussian! Celestine smiles a little, secretly, for she knows that her handsome Fritz would not have been so abominable in the sight of the other village maidens if his affections had been fixed on one of them instead of herself. But she weeps bitterly to think that she is almost certain never to see him again, and that she can never call him by the fond name of husband; for is there not a certain blonde Gretchen in that far-distant Brandenburg village, and has he not hinted that he was as good as betrothed to her? So she will sit disconsolate, like the British maiden in Millais's picture, when her Roman lover had been parted from her. Our artist, who is a Frenchman, which accounts for his tendency to caricature the heroes of Deutschland, has taken a somewhat less sentimental view of the parting scene, and we are not at all sure that his Celestine will not begin to turn her gigantic admirer into ridicule as soon as she sees the last glimmer of his spiked helmet. It is very certain that her countrymen will join her therein, in their joy at ridding their soil of the invaders.



THE PRUSSIAN'S FAREWELL TO FRANCE.

CURRANT JELLY.

A LEADING chemical journal in Paris does not disdain to give to the world a formula for the preparation of currant jelly "in the cold," which it considers to be a very great improvement over other methods, as it preserves entirely the natural taste of the fruit. For this purpose we take eleven pounds of white currants and a fourth or fifth part, by weight, of the red, according to the color desired, or the whole may be either red or white, as preferred. If the flavor is liked, one pound of raspberries may be added. The currants are to be stripped from the stems, and the raspberries carefully picked over, those recently gathered being the best. The fruit is to be mashed, and the juice squeezed out, either through a cloth or, still better, by means of a small press.

The juice thus obtained is placed in an earthen vessel, and deposited in a cool place or in a cellar, when fermentation will sooner or later take place. At the end of about twenty-four hours all the froth produced by the fermentation, which will cover the whole surface, is to be removed, and the juice to be strained by means of a flannel bag or a filtering-paper. The juice is then to be weighed, and an equal weight of finely powdered white sugar to be added. If raspberries are used, the quantity of sugar is to be reduced one-tenth. The juice and sugar are to be carefully mixed, and then placed in jars. At the expiration of twenty-four hours a jelly of perfect transparency will be formed, which can be preserved for a long time by simply covering it, as with ordinary jellies and preserves. It should, however, be protected from the action of moisture.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MLLE. MAY.—Use a weak solution of hartshorn, a spoonful to a basin of water, for your hair daily. Perfume hair-oil with extract of lavender and ambergris, or with a drop of attar of roses. We can not recommend machines in any way.

STANLEY.—Boil the egg in the rose-water, and afterward beat to a paste. Full directions have been already given in "Ugly Girl" papers. The Bazar Book of Decorum is sent by mail, post-paid, for $1. Lucca is pronounced with a long u, but softly; Trovatore, thus: Tro-va-to-re.

BLANCHE.—To ward off wrinkles use the warm bath, and go in the air a great deal, besides preserving a calm temper.

L.—Directions for the use of wood ashes have been frequently given. Any kind of wood will do; it is applied daily till the hair disappears.

INQUISITIVENESS.—The sulphur vapor bath will be described in a future number of "Ugly Girl" papers.

P. P. P.—Nitrate of silver will remove warts.

CLARISSA.—Bathe your hands with camphor after washing. Your handwriting is plain, but uneven. Practice will improve it.

SPRING-TIME.—Wood ashes are not injurious to the skin, and may be used with camphor. All depilatories must be repeated as often as the hair grows again.

A WESTERN GIRL AND BETSEY BAKER.—The sulphur vapor bath will be described in a future number. Banting's tract is the best book on corpulency.

M.—White sailor waists are worn with either white or colored pantaloons.—Paint your church gray—a sort of smoke gray, as that does not show soil.

MISS S. S.—Make the puff for your polonaise bias and five or six inches wide. Read description of making grenadine puffs in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 31, Vol. VI. Foulard puffs may have a hemmed ruffle, or else the ruffle can be doubled and gauged in the way spoken of for grenadine. Do not use a cord for gathering the puff.

SUSIE.—Make your gray mohair with a belted polonaise, and put a deep kilt-pleated flounce on the skirt. Use either the Double-breasted Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI., or else the Blouse-Polonaise in No. 28, Vol. VI. Trim the edge of the polonaise with a bias band of the material.

H. H. W.—Your sample did not reach us. Irish poplin can be dyed very well.

MRS. H. A. B.—We do not give addresses in this column.

LOU.—The five dresses for a bride in October should be her traveling and wedding dress of gray or brown cashmere or Irish poplin, a black silk suit, an evening dress of pale silk, an alpaca or woolen suit that will answer for street or house, and a morning wrapper of some light wool material.

MRS. H. G. F.—Remove the satin trimming from your lavender silk. The round waist is not objectionable, as they will be restored to favor. Get a darker shade of silk, or else violet Chambéry gauze or grenadine, or, if you prefer it, use white organdy or black guipure net for an over-skirt. A sleeveless basque would also be pretty on the waist, especially of black guipure. Add a high fraise, and put frills around the wrists.

CONSTANCE.—Lingerie is pronounced as if spelled lan-je-ry, with the first syllable accented.—You must use a plain short jockey basque pattern for your silk, and merely pipe it around the edges. To trim it with lace stylishly you must put the lace and insertion lengthwise instead of around it. Use a coat sleeve also with lace placed down its whole length.

F. R. B.—Use the dark blue lawn for a skirt, putting flounces of the organdy upon it, headed by blue bands. Then make a blouse-polonaise of the organdy, with blue piping in the ruffle with which it is trimmed. Wear a blue sash and a shirred blue lawn hat.

DULCY.—Have your white alpaca colored dark leaf brown, or else gray. Blue, plum, and green dyes are seldom permanent, and when they do not fade they are apt to "smut" the clothing worn next them. Unless you have a very large ample dress pattern, it is not a good plan to have it dyed, as it shrinks in dyeing and will be too small. If you can have a few yards of the goods dyed with the dress, you had better do so.

FLIRT.—Put pleated white crêpe lisse flounces on your blue silk, and have a crêpe lisse over-skirt and sleeveless basque. Cut up the over-skirt for ruffles to alternate on the skirt with the white ones. Wear rose garlands for looping the over-skirt. Pink, crimson, and tea roses mingled in one garland are very stylish this summer, especially with white or blue dresses. Crêpe lisse is more fashionable than any other thin white material, but it is very frail, and many ladies use instead the more substantial Chambéry gauze or grenadine, or else the inexpensive muslins.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Exposure to air will soon "yellow" your lace. There is no other plan without moistening it, and that would undo the labor of your French washer-woman. Steamer hoods of silk, cashmere, or flannel, with a small pelerine cape attached, are found at any of the furnishing stores.

E. W. B.—Read answer above to "Flirt." White crêpe lisse is a very appropriate trimming for your wedding dress. Make a basque and trained skirt, caught up behind by a sash to form a puff. Put a fraise of silk around the neck of the basque, and a side pleating of crêpe lisse inside. If you trim the skirt, have alternate flounces of gathered silk and white lisse covering the front breadth, and around the train. The crêpe lisse should be doubled and laid in small side pleats. If you can not get this material in your Western home, use fine white organdy.

CONSTANT READER.—Lengthen the double-breasted polonaise pattern sent you. Use soft undressed flax linen, and trim like the garment illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI.

MRS. F. S. P.—There is nothing better than sugar of lead for deepening the colors of calicoes. You might also try alum.

MRS. D. M. C.—We have no pattern of sun hats. Any one of the large furnishing stores usually quoted in the New York Fashions of the Bazar will send you one ready-made.

EMMA.—Get enough dark violet or else mauve silk to make coat sleeves, an upper skirt, and sash for your white alpaca. Leave the waist white, giving the effect of a sleeveless jacket. Put bias bands of the silk around the skirt.

M. L. B.—We have no cut paper pattern of the suit illustrated, and will return your money. Neck-ties are still worn. Ruffs made of the dress material require only a colored bow, or else a brooch, in front. Basques are not worn open in the back, but are buttoned in front.

L. S. M.—Polonay is incorrect. Polonaise is pronounced as if spelled polonaze. The plural is formed by adding an s.

MRS. J. W. B.—It will not be out of taste to trim your linen polonaise with black linen, but you will find it difficult to get black linen well washed.

COMME IL FAUT.—Your fraise of black grenadine lined with blue should terminate just below the throat, and should be graduated so narrow toward the front that it will show like the merest ruffle above your brooch or cravat-bow of lace. Put a milliner's fold or a bias band of grenadine at the foot of the fraise pleating. Do not sew the fraise in the neck of your dress, but on it, just below the silk binding that completes the neck. A puff or a band of grenadine should go up the sides of the blue silk vest, and extend around the back if you choose. A simple piping of grenadine should edge the bottom of the basque. Make coat sleeves and trim with a puff, below which falls a frill, like the fraise, on the hand.

MRS. C. L. B.—Put one or two kilt pleatings around your linen skirt.

LIZZIE.—We have no pattern of the Ortolan mantle, nor can we obtain it for you. Use black velvet or else silk to trim your Japanese silk.

NEW SUBSCRIPER.—A black silk for a lady of seventy should be made with a basque and plain untrimmed skirt, without over-skirt or flounces. The cut paper pattern of the bathing suit illustrated in Bazar No. 30, Vol. VI., will be sent you for 25 cents. Full hints and descriptions of bathing suits are given in Bazar Nos. 29 and 30, Vol. VI. The shirt sleeve with flaring cuff like that on pattern of pleated waist illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., is pretty for pleated waists, also the sleeve with a pleated frill falling over the hand.

CHOBBY.—A loose belted polonaise and skirt trimmed with bias bands is the suitable model for a linen traveling dress for a girl of sixteen. Make the front double-breasted, with pockets and two rows of buttons. Wear a Russia leather belt and bag. Get a Mackinaw rough straw sailor hat, turned up on one side, with flowers under the brim. Wear your long hair braided down behind and frizzed on your forehead.

A PERPLEXED MAIDEN.—Make a double-breasted English sacque of your cloth, and trim with bias black corded silk. This will be far more stylish than fringe and braid. Use oxidized silver buttons if you like, or else moulds covered with the silk.

PRUDENT.—An untrimmed skirt with a long over-skirt and basque is probably the best model for your black silk. If you do not need it badly for the present season it would be well for you to wait until fall before making, as there are rumors of coming changes in styles, and as you do not get a "best black silk" often, this should be taken into consideration.

A BLONDE.—The sky blue shade will trim your dark blue beautifully. Make a vest, cuffs, pockets, sash, and buttons of the light blue, also line the dark blue fraise and "pipe" the dark ruffles with the pale shade.

L. P. W.—It may cost more money to have your black silk suit made to order, but it will be more satisfactory than if bought ready-made. $100 is the smallest expense for a handsome stylish suit of black silk worth $3 a yard, and without lace.

CARO.—A basque and skirt simply trimmed is all you can make of twelve yards of silk. Make a vest of watered silk, with lengthwise bands on the skirt, a watered flounce, sash, and cuffs. Gray or brown cashmere or camel's-hair will make a pretty traveling dress for fall. Double-breasted sacques will be more worn than ever. Standing ruffles, English linen collars, and spotted neck-ties will continue in fashion.

MOUNTAIN.—Touch the roots of the hair on your hand with a fine sable pencil dipped in weak muriatic acid. Repeat daily till the skin is clear.—Offer the left arm usually to a lady, changing, however, to give her the inside of the walk, i. e., next the wall.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—A fall traveling dress for a bride in mourning should be a redingote of black or else very dark gray camel's-hair, with black sash and black woolen or silk skirt.

THE PREMIUM MACHINE.—Visitors at the Northern Ohio Fair, last autumn, will remember the long, arduous struggle between the eight or ten leading Sewing-Machines on exhibition there for supremacy in family sewing. The samples exhibited were valued at thousands of dollars, and, taken together, made up a display which was alone worth a trip to the fair to see. After full consideration the committee unanimously awarded the first premium to the Wilson Improved Machine, which was pronounced superior to all others in family work. We refer to this grand triumph to remind the ladies that this same Wilson Machine is the cheapest first-class machine ever offered, costing $15 less than any other machine of its high rank. It is difficult to understand why the people of this section should purchase or use any other machine. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR. Repository of Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

FACETIÆ.

THE gentleman who asserted that his friend never opened his mouth without putting his foot in it, being called upon to apologize, said he was very sorry, but when he made the assertion he did not see the size of his friend's foot.

AGRICULTURAL.—A mower who can't mow might as well be no mower.

The next worst thing to raining pitchforks must be hailing omnibuses.

AN IRISHMAN'S BROGUE—Pat-ois.

GOOD TASTE.—At a late polo match a graceful girl was seen in a polo-naise (the naise out of compliment to the dear ponies, of course).

Amidomonochlorobenzenesulphonic is the name given by Italian chemists to an acid which has just been discovered. Italian is a soft language.

A FIG FOR YOU.—A journal reports that Lavacca County, Texas, produces figs measuring seven and three-quarter inches in circumference. We have all heard about "In the name of the Prophet, figs!" here, we imagine, the sellers of the fruit have, in the name of the figs, profits.

"Where are the men of '76?" shouted a patriotic orator.

"Dead," responded a sad-looking man in the middle aisle. The orator seemed to be disturbed by the information.

What vegetable is any thing but agreeable on board a ship?—A leek.

"HIGHER UP."—The ladies do their hair up so high now that they have, it is said, to stand on something to put on their hats.

PANES AND PENALTIES.—When a naughty little boy breaks a window he should be punished, on the principle that panes and penalties go together.

"What is that, children?" asked a young pastor, exhibiting to his Sunday-school a magic-lantern picture of a poor sinner clinging to the cross towering out of stormy waves in mid-ocean.

"Robinson Crusoe!" was the instant reply.

A WIFE'S APOLOGY.—A woman appeared at the shop where her husband is employed a short time ago, and apologetically said: "Jim is not well. You must excuse him from coming to work to-day. He and I had a little difficulty at the breakfast-table this morning, and he won't be able to work this week."

REVENGE IS SWEET.—A green young man, who was working for a farmer as "hired man," felt himself slighted when the girls of the neighborhood had a party to which they did not invite him. After sulking about for several days, he finally hit upon a mode of revenge, and said to his employer's daughter, "You can tell the gals that I'm a-goin' to have a par'y of my own, and I won't invite nobody."

YACHTING SKETCHES.

AN ENGLISH WIFE.—It is well known that two stout German women from Vienna were attached to the Shah's suite and registered as "seamstresses," and also that he admired very few of the English ladies, using in regard to them his favorite expression, "too thin." But one day, in the course of his progress through Oxford Street, he caught sight of the old painting left outside the shop formerly used as the exhibition-room for Mrs. Heenan, the Fat Lady. At sight of this the Shah became unusually animated, and inquired if that were the portrait of a real woman; and being informed that it was, he ordered her to be sent for, saying that he would make her his wife. When it was explained to his Majesty that this was impossible, as the Fat Lady was under contract to the person who exhibited her, and that even Manager Baum, of the Alhambra (one of the Shah's favorites), could not procure her for him, the Shah plaintively replied that it was no wonder they exhibited her, as she was the only really handsome woman he had seen in England.

STRANGE DISEASE.—Physicians hear some queer diagnoses from amateurs sometimes. Our friend Dr. D—— was called recently to see a sick man, and upon inquiring of his wife how he was affected, received in reply, "Well, you see, doctor, the things what he eats gets sorter tangled around his heart, and he suffers awful."

ABSURDITIES AT THE VIENNA EXHIBITION.—The firm providing the English refreshments is not English. The thing is well managed, and so forth, but it is not so entirely British as it ought to be. For instance, the bill of fare this "dai" includes "Sir Loine" of beef, "Chees and Salade," "Sherries Goblers," and "Pastry-aux-fruits." The bar-maids are got up in an overdone British style, some of them with exaggerated tow-like mounds of head-dress or hair, whichever you like to call it, that look as if they had been made to clean out an Armstrong gun, but do not give intelligent foreigners a real notion of the normal bar-maid.

Thomson, the poet, had an uncle, a clever, active mechanic, who could do many things with his hands, and contemplated James's indolent, dreamy, "feckless" character with impatient displeasure. When the first of The Seasons—"Winter"—had been completed, Jamie thought, by a presentation copy, to triumph over his uncle's skepticism; and to propitiate his good opinion he had the book handsomely bound. The old man never looked inside, or asked what the book was about, but, turning it round and round in gratified admiration, exclaimed, "Is that really our Jamie's doing now? Weel, I never thought the cratur wud hae had the handicraft to do the like!"

A Kentucky editor speaks of a local genius who has been a persevering contributor to the office waste-basket for several years.

PROVERB FOR THE HOUR.—The course of true love never is kept clear.

A MATTER OF DOCTRINE.

MAMMA. "Do you know what will become of Naughty Little Girls who tell Falsehoods, Gerty?"
GERTY. "No, I don't. My Religion ain't the same as yours!"

A MODERN PHARISEE!

MRS. JINKS. "Isn't his Long Hair very Uncomfortable this Hot Weather?"
MRS. BROWN. "Well, perhaps it is for the poor little Fellow himself; but it's such a Comfort to Me. I don't have to Wash his Neck and Ears nearly so often."

GUARANA FOR CURING NERVOUS HEADACHE.

DR. DE LISLE, in the Medical Times, warmly recommends the use of powdered guarana (Paullinia sorbilis), a well-known Brazilian drug, for cases of headache arising from nervous exhaustion, or for a depressed state of the system. The dose commonly given is ten grains. Occasionally, however, a larger quantity is required, especially after frequent use. The beneficial effect is usually manifest in from ten to fifteen minutes, and in less than an hour the affection generally disappears. When the headache arises from neuralgic or rheumatic causes, or from a disordered state of the stomach and bowels, the administration of the powder is useless. In Brazil the guarana is frequently used like chocolate, and as it contains a considerable quantity of theine, it has, to some extent, an effect upon the system similar to that of tea and coffee, with this additional one superadded.

WINDS FROM SEA.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

SOFTLY the winds come singing in from sea,
Singing to nothing but the moon and me—
The moon, half risen, lingering and late—
From lands long leagues away come singing free,
From lands where Summer holds her shining state.

Lately on snowy orange stems they slept,
Among a palm-tree's billowy branches crept,
And rustled in a red pomegranate bough;
Then, rich with heavy spices shoreward swept,
And brought their balms to fan my eager brow.

O midnight winds! that through such splendor fly—
The hollow of a sapphire in the sky,
The paved work of a sapphire on the sea—
How soon your warm deliciousness might die
Could you but stay and swell one sail for me!

HOW TO EXERCISE CHILDREN.

THE thirst of children for amusement is almost insatiable, and it seems essential to their vigor of growth and fullness of development that it should be abundantly gratified. The activity of body and mind natural to a child of a sound organization requires to be called into perpetual play by ceaseless provocatives to its instinctive desire for diversion.

There can be no wholesome exercise of the bodily organs of childhood without that ease which the sense of pleasure alone bestows. The flexible limbs and expanding lungs, as well as, in fact, all the other parts of the pliant frame of youth, must be kept in constant and unconstrained motion. This is best secured by what are ordinarily termed the amusements of children. All attempts to substitute for these the formal systems of the teachers of gymnastics and calisthenics we regard as unwise. Such have undoubtedly their uses, but must be subordinated to the spontaneous exercises of childhood. The gymnasium is, no doubt, a useful part of the school, especially for the more advanced youth, but it never should be accepted as a substitute for the play-ground. The shouting, the running, the jumping and tumbling of boys and girls, when set free to indulge in their own instincts of pleasurable movement, are far more effective in supplying that exercise which is essential to the vigorous growth and development of the youthful frame than any marching, posturing, or rope-hauling devised by the teacher of gymnastics.

Most kinds of systematic exercise imposed by parents and instructors are apt to be regarded by children as bores, to which they submit as unwillingly as if they were so many additions to their school tasks. However well adapted they may be to the natural needs of the body, they have not the zest to provoke the pleasurable emotions of the mind, and without this they can not but fail of their object. All physical exercise under such circumstances must be more injurious than beneficial. When there is a feeling of aversion or indifference to the muscular effort required, languor quickly ensues, so that the result is weakness rather than strength.

It is believed that a false sense of becomingness is depriving the children of the present generation of much that is essential to their health and vigor. The "Schools for Young Ladies," as they are termed, where, by-the-bye, there are such precocious juvenile dames that in any well-ordered household they would be still kept to pap and pinafore in the nursery, are doing much mischief in this respect to the children, as we venture to call them, under their charge. Their conductors, with great professions of attention to "the physical as well as intellectual culture of those intrusted to their care"—we quote from a brilliant pink-tinted, musk-scented circular on our table—seem to think that a stiff walk of an hour or so, under the eyes of Miss Gorgon, when the girls—"young ladies," we beg their pardon—have as much freedom of motion as a chain-gang, is all the exercise children require. Of course it would not be genteel to run and skip and jump; and how would they look if they did! Their blue silk perhaps torn, their laced cuffs and collars soiled, their curls awry, and faces—oh, monstrous red! What would mamma say to see them such frights! All we have to say in answer is that the freest exercise is essential to the healthy development of the young, and if fine dress and fine manners prevent, then let them be torn and discarded.

We are told, moreover, that even the boys of our superfine families are taught to show at the earliest age a genteel scorn for all the old-fashioned amusements, and that it is possible to find lads still in jackets who are unconscious of the traditional delights of marbles, tops, and foot-ball. These amusements, in fact, are incompatible with the delicacy of kid gloves and the gloss of French boots, without which, of course, no juvenile dandy can be complete. The superfineness of dress and the overnicety of manners with which parents often strive to give an air of distinction to their children, to mark them out from the common herd, are restraints to the mobility which is natural to youth, and essential to its healthy growth. The fear of spoiling a pretty suit of clothes, and a too great anxiety about decorum, have prevented many an innocent and health-giving gambol. Finery of dress and formality of behavior are, however pleasing to the parent, only painful to the child, who must have ease of motion and a sense of freedom of restraint for the exercise of all his functions, whether bodily or mental. It is both cruel and dangerous to attempt to stiffen the flexibility of youth into the genteel primness of fashionable dress and behavior. The boy or girl thus decked and drilled is hardly a more natural object than the showman's monkey, which doffs its laced hat and mimics each form of gentility at every tug of its galling collar by its master's cruel hand. He becomes by the process, we must confess, a very fair copy of the object of his imitation, but he loses all the grace and essential character of his kind; and whether monkey or child, it is certain that his present comfort and future advantage are seriously damaged by this outrage against nature.

WHAT FOR DINNER?

OF the small annoyances of the household there is none more worrying than the ever-recurring question, "What shall we have for dinner?" The scope of the edible animal and vegetable kingdoms is, indeed, not so restricted, but the culinary knowledge and inventive faculties of our housekeepers and cooks are so limited that amidst all the abundance of Nature's supply of food they have rarely art and ingenuity enough to contrive and prepare a fresh dinner for each day in the week. Beef, veal, and mutton succeed mutton, veal, and beef week after week, until the palled appetite cries Enough, and demands, with the accent of exhaustion, "What shall we have for dinner?" To answer this question satisfactorily should be regarded by every wife or housekeeper as one of the essential duties of her position.

We here protest against the habitual shifting of the dinner question by the wife—to whom it properly belongs to consider thoroughly and settle judiciously—to the husband, who ought to have nothing more to do with it than enjoy the result and pay the cost. What can be more preposterous than to ask a man replete with beefsteak, eggs, and buckwheat cakes, the question, "What shall we have for dinner?" What, moreover, can be more impertinent than the intrusion of the prospective beef and pudding upon the eager man of hardware or dry-goods, whose imagination, with the first puff of his cigar, has already floated "down town" in advance of his own hasty footsteps, and has called up visions of the day's competition for falling pig-iron or rising huckaback.

The provisioning of the household and all contingent preparations are essentially, in a private family, the woman's duty, and she has no right to shirk it. The various pleas by which she ordinarily shifts to the already overburdened man of business a large part of her own especial work we are not disposed to admit. Our American women among the prosperous classes have already little enough to do, without calling upon their fathers and husbands to help them to do that little. It is quite evident that going to market, the grocery, and huckster's stand, testing the succulence of tenderloins, experimenting on the taste and odorousness of butter, and inspecting the convolutions of a cabbage, are, or should be, functions of the wife, and not of the husband. The indolence of our fine women, or their false sense of the decorous, causes them, however, frequently to delegate these appropriate duties of their own to the man, to whom they are in every respect unbecoming. As a mere matter of economy, we would advise the wife not to trust to the husband the daily negotiations with butcher, grocer, and huckster. He being presumed to be unacquainted with the art of preparation in all its complications, can hardly be supposed to be capable of judging of the varied adaptabilities of the raw material. He does undoubtedly, from his forced experience, learn to distinguish the high in price, and may thus generally secure by his liberal payments a fair quality of the kind he buys; but, knowing nothing of the process of cookery, he can not venture to purchase any thing the excellence of which is not guaranteed by its expensiveness. The skilled and thrifty cook will take the parings and leavings, and concoct them into a more appetizing and nutritious repast than is possible with the less manageable and more costly mass for which the ignorant and prodigal buyer has paid so heavily. We dare not presume, however, upon the kitchen knowledge of our wives. We have as yet much to hope for from them in regard to the improvement of our food, appetite, and digestion. If, however, we can not boldly pronounce skill in cookery to be an attribute of our women, we have no hesitation in insisting that it should be; nor need they all make scullions of themselves in the course of its acquisition.

We do not doubt that much of the prevalent complaint of the expensiveness of the household is justly to be referred to the unsatisfactory solution of the question, "What for dinner?" To solve it properly—and not only economy, but health and comfort demand that it should be so solved—requires a knowledge of the essential qualities of edible products, and a skilled experience in preparing them for food. Here is a scope wide enough for the unoccupied faculties of our women, who are stretching out their hands, vainly demanding to be lifted to other spheres of duty, while they have within reach a neglected vocation which yields to none in utility, and, when properly fulfilled, to few in dignity. Science has a natural relation with this question of food, and even the strongest-minded woman might find in the study of the chemistry of the subject full exercise for her most vigorous faculties. The feeblest, moreover, might greatly increase her usefulness by devoting herself to the obvious and easily acquired practical parts. With no doubt about its pertinency to the health and happiness of all, we call upon the women of the household every where diligently to study the subject, that they may be able to give a satisfactory answer to the question, What for dinner?

BENEVOLENT ADVICE TO THE DRY-GOODS MEN.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

SHOPPING would be divested of half its horrors if dry-goods clerks would be kind. Is it too much to ask? They have all the advantage of situation. They are familiar with the locality. They know exactly where the black silks are to be found, what is the lurking-place of the sheetings, what corner is haunted by the hosiery. The quality, the price, the style of goods—they have it all at their fingers' ends. They are barricaded by the counters and supported by ranks of acquaintances. You, constitutionally timid, full of misgiving concerning your own skill and taste, with but a vague idea of what you ought to want, enter a palace of splendor and confusion, to encounter, single-handed, these veterans of the yard-stick. If they are civil, friendly, reassuring, it is as much as you can do to keep your wits well in hand, and choose from the distracting variety the one little supply that you demand. If they are insolent, curt, indifferent, what remains but retreat?

There are different species of objectionable clerks. One is voluble, familiar, and altogether abominable. You never willingly approach him, but, accosting him unawares, you feel as if you were instinctively and constantly holding him by a tight rein to keep him from open impertinence, and not always successfully. To the severest simplicity of address he will sometimes respond rudely. In novels, ladies are majestic, impressive, all-powerful. They repress manifestations of ill-breeding in others by the overpowering grandeur of their own ladyhood. But in real life real ladies are quite as likely to be modest, shrinking, easily subdued by brutality, and capable of offering to aggression no resistance but flight. Such swiftly succumb to the bold and blatant clerk—succumb by flying, not buying. There is the teasing clerk, who leaves you no quiet for reflection and no space for comparison, but imagines the way to secure your custom is to urge you without intermission. There is the indifferent clerk, who says he has not the goods you want before you know yourself what you do want; who throws the parcel down on the counter as if it were to take or to leave, but manifests not the slightest interest in ascertaining your wish or accommodating or assisting you. There is the snapping-turtle clerk, who brings you to the point, readjusts your somewhat incoherent question, and answers you with a quick, impatient directness that quite humiliates you. Him, though some condemn unmeasuredly, I can tolerate.

Honest human petulance, born of fatigue, is the least unpardonable of mercantile ill manners. I can consider that the man has been the target for all sorts of questions, wise and foolish, through long hours. If I had been in his place I doubt not that by this time I should greet an angel with a growl. But remember this, O long-suffering dry-goods man! you have made your bed, and you must lie in it. You are tied by the tape-measure of your own free-will. It is your business to answer questions. You are paid to display goods. Doubtless there may often be before the counter stupidity, selfishness, unreasonableness, lack of principle; but these do not justify or excuse the display of such traits behind the counter. Still less do they excuse their outlay upon the modest, the moderate, the upright. When clerks have been teased by women who do not examine goods with frank intent, but simply to idle away a superfluous hour, to gratify a morbid and frivolous taste, to bear off surreptitiously some imported idea for domestic manufacture, it is not absolutely unnatural or impossible that they should be betrayed into irritation; but it is unbusiness-like and unwise. They will never thus repress the idle or the curious, but they will often offend the unoffending. Let them remember that the shopping as well as the selling world is a much-tried and long-suffering world. Does the woman, under pretense of buying a gown, merely take note of its style that she may make her own flounces after the same pattern? Be not too harsh upon her, outraged dry-goods clerk, who will have no percentage from your sales to her. Doubtless she would be only too glad to buy your robes outright, but her husband can not or will not furnish the means, and she is forced to use her own fingers. Do not begrudge her the small help of your lay figure. It would be, indeed, far better that she should be honest and frank, and express her intention, not attempt to carry it out by deceit. I am glad to avow that I never asked permission to examine goods without receiving a courteous and prompt assent. But the poor thing is not unused to brutality, and has unhappily learned too much indirection. You, dry-goods clerk, are young and strong, and a man. Do you, by kindness and helpfulness, further her aims, and so win her over to confidence, ease, and outrightness, not repel, frighten, and wound her by your demeanor.

By far the great majority of women shop honestly. They go to many places, they overturn many goods, they postpone and hesitate; but they have a serious object in view. One little ingrain carpet does not amount to much. In a great warehouse piled with the wealth of the loom it seems ridiculously small, and the clerk naturally wishes my lady would buy her strip and be done with it. Softly, magnificent Sir! The poor little ingrain will lie before her eyes for many a year. Her husband's tastes are to be consulted. Her purse is of cast iron. Her children are to grow up on that carpet, and learn from it color and contour. Will it harmonize with the paper and the chintz lounge? Will it fade prettily, and will it cut over well into a bedroom carpet when its race is run in the sitting-room? To the purchaser the cheap ingrain is a more momentous matter than the costly Moquette, for it must last longer and be more looked at: so let her hesitate and compare and reflect without impertinent haste, urgency, or impatience from you. And even if she makes up her mind to nothing, and leaves the carpet on your hands, let her not be condemned for insincerity or vacillation. The probability is that she knows her own business a great deal better than you do, and the doubts she expresses are but feeble representatives of the doubts she feels. Moreover, if she does not buy the carpet now, be you sympathetic, obliging, patient with all questioning and objections, and very likely in three or four weeks she will come back to you and buy one twice as good!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

HINTS OF FALL STYLES.

SOME early hints of the styles to be worn in the fall are gathered from the letters written home from Europe by buyers for the large wholesale houses. These report that double-breasted garments have by no means seen the height of their popularity, but will continue in favor for the fall and winter. The English walking jacket, similar to the garment of that name worn last year, but more closely fitted, will dispute favor with mantillas as fall wraps. A pretty garment, showing a compromise between these two wraps, is already illustrated in French magazines of fashion. The front has long square mantilla ends, the back is a snugly fitted jacket, and the sleeves are coat-shape. This composite garment is stylish and new, and will be made of black cashmere or camel's-hair, to be worn with various dresses. The double-breasted front will also be retained in polonaises and redingotes, of which fresh varieties are promised. The sleeveless basque and the jockey basque are still in vogue abroad, and will be found among importations for next season. For illustrations and patterns of stylish basques the reader is referred to Nos. I. and VI., in the Supplement of Bazar No. 33, Vol. VI. The latter number, with tight back and open front, closed only at the throat, and finished around the neck by a ruff, is especially handsome. We commend it to those who are preparing their fall wardrobes as an avant-coureur of next season's fashions.

The puffed skirt is another Parisian suggestion for fall dresses. This is merely an amply long basque and a single skirt; but the skirt is so elaborate that an over-skirt would be superfluous. A long walking skirt of cambric is made, and plainly covered with silk from the knee down. On this is sewed the silk skirt, held in lengthwise puffs from the waist down, gradually widening toward the bottom, and forming below a hollow box-pleating that gives the effect of a flounce around the skirt. The puffs are separated by ruches, and a bow conceals the end of each ruche. The basque is deeply pointed in front and behind, and is quite short on the hips. It is trimmed by a ruffle of hollow pleats, graduated narrower on the sides, and quite deep in back and front. This skirt is new, but is the outgrowth of the fashion now prevalent of long puffs in the three front breadths. Over-skirts on many imported dresses are open in front and lapped from side to side just below the belt. There is a deep point on each side, and the back is caught up by a sash almost to the belt.

ALPACAS.

Alpacas, which are underestimated here, have again come into great favor in Europe for country, sea-side, and traveling dresses. Clear gray shades are most used, and are trimmed with black velvet or else gros grain of the shade of the material. Sleeveless basques of the silk or velvet are worn with alpaca suits.

NEW JEWELRY.

The Exhibition at Vienna has brought to light the novelties in jewelry prepared for the coming fall and winter. Among the unique jewels chronicled are those of finely cut jet, associated with garnets or other bright red stones. These are said to be very effective, and popularity is predicted for them. The Persian jewelry is also much admired. This is a combination of brilliant stones of various colors set in one brooch. The designs are miniature copies of the intricate figures represented in Persian scarfs, shawls, carpets, etc. The journeyings of the Shah and his gorgeous display of jewels have probably brought this fashion about. The silver mixed with gold we have already mentioned. The oxidized silver now most in vogue is almost as dark as iron. Highly polished platinum, it is said, will take the place of the dark silver, and will be fashionably combined with gold.

BOWS FOR RUFFS AND COIFFURES.

A welcome importation at midsummer, when spring lingerie has lost its freshness, consists of novelties in bows, neck-ties, ruffs, and kindred articles. Ruffs do not require a neck-tie passed around the neck, but merely a bow to close them at the throat. Prettiest among such bows are those made of colored China crape in irregular loops, folds, and fringed ends, arranged with French taste, and inclosing a dainty jabot ruffle of snowy crêpe lisse. A smaller bow made to match is worn in the coiffure. As the summer waxes and wanes into autumn, these accessories of the toilette take on a deeper hue, and appear in dark violet or ponceau red, or else are made of the palest tint of blue combined with sapphire, Nile green with dark cypress, or two shades of the peacock combination of blue and green. The pair of bows costs $3 or $3 50. Single bows for the ruff are shown in two shades of China crape, in fanciful loops, with French needle-worked ends: price $4. Fresh Windsor neck-ties of China crape, bias, with pointed ends, are shown in white, black, and the deep colors that give character to pale suits: price $1 25. More dressy ties are of folded China crape, an inch wide at the back of the neck, and shaped wider toward the front, with Valenciennes insertion set in the ends, and a wide lace ruffle on the edge. These cost from $3 50, according to the quality of the lace.

NEW JABOTS.

Very long narrow jabots of lace are still worn, and the height of style is to continue them down the entire front of the basque, or even the polonaise, with which they are worn. The fancy is to have an insertion band down the centre, and arrange the lace in waves on each side. Valenciennes and Malines lace are both used for jabots, and their cost ranges, according to their length and fineness, from $3 to $20.

RUFFS, COLLARETTES, ETC.

New ruffs, or collarettes, are very high behind, coming low at the throat, and covering so much of the corsage front that any waist trimming is superfluous. They are made of China crape folds of two extreme shades—the palest and darkest of any color—an embroidered crape band, and a ruff pleating of crêpe lisse. Price $6. Stylish ruff-chemisettes are Pompadour squares with a high double ruff of muslin edged with Valenciennes, made very full, and flaring out from a band of needle-worked insertion. These cost $3; sleeves with a close double ruffle to match make the set $5. Crêpe lisse sets of ruff-chemisettes and under-sleeves made in the style just described are $4. Double ruffs of crêpe lisse in wide full pleats for basting inside the dress neck cost $2 a yard; narrower ruffs of this kind are also sold by the yard for $1 25; single-pleated ruffs are 75 cents a yard. Wide double ruffs of illusion are $1 25, but are so frail that they are seldom good for a second wearing, especially in warm weather. Wash net is more substantial, and may be laundried; edged with lace and made up in double ruffles, this costs $1 a yard. The prettiest muslin ruffs have lengthwise bands of Valenciennes insertion separating very full double or treble box-pleats. The edge is then scalloped and finished with narrow lace. The price is $2 50 a yard. For morning wear are double ruffs of linen with a tiny edge of Valenciennes.

CHEMISETTES AND UNDER-SLEEVES.

The long chemisette covering the shoulders and tied down to the belt back and front is considered an essential item of ladies' lingerie, as it protects the fine corsets, and also absorbs the perspiration on the shoulders that would otherwise soil the dress lining. Many fastidious ladies never leave off this garment even in warm weather, and at the present moment, when open-throated double-breasted garments are in vogue, it is doubly convenient, as it covers the neck and throat. This chemisette is now found attached to pleated linen and percale ruffs, or to the standing English collar with turned-over points in front. Neatly made unlaundried sets of plain linen chemisettes and under-sleeves cost $1 75. Those with hem-stitched ruffs are more expensive; with tiny English collar, these are pretty for breakfast. Hair-striped linen sets for traveling cost $4. The sleeve is duchesse shape, rounded at the wrists, and ruffled; or else it has square cuffs cut off at the corners, or the wide flaring cuff. Scarlet diamonds and polka dots of color are shown in these sets.

Pleated blouse-waists are shown in various designs of figured linen for $4 each.

MORNING HANDKERCHIEFS.

Another novelty is linen and lawn handkerchiefs, with colored hems, made of the India silk that washes like linen. They are chosen with reference to the dress worn, and are shown in Napoleon blue, violet, poppy, and many paler shades. With plain hem, they cost $2; with brier stitching on the hem, they are $2 50. Others have striped buff and scarlet hems, or else blue and buff, or blue and white. There are also hems of fine batiste doubled to wear with batiste costumes, or else to accompany collars of batiste worn with black taffeta silks. A variety of these has rows of narrow Valenciennes laid on the hem, and wider lace on the edge. The prices range from $3 to $4 50 each. Another fancy is a fluted ruffle of spotted linen, like that of the chemisette, put around white handkerchiefs. With plain ruffle, these cost $1; edged with lace, they are $1 50.

LADIES' NORMANDY CAPS.

The Swiss muslin caps worn to breakfast by married ladies are now made in the shape worn by Normandy peasant women. They have stiff, high-pointed crowns, with ruffles falling around the face. With lace insertion on the crown, and bows of ribbon in front and back, these cost $3 75; with plain crowns, $3.

French nurses' caps, made fancifully with crowns or without, cost from $1 to $2 50.

MISCELLANIES.

A loosely waved tress of false hair is now worn across the head, just above the forehead. This pretty fashion is welcomed by ladies who have burned or worn off their front hair in frizzing it, as this enables them to smooth away their own front hair out of sight, and let it grow long enough to be parted in the middle and drawn back in classic style.

A novelty in vogue abroad is rough-looking gimp and fringe, said to be made of common twine. It is used for trimming Turkish toweling, bamboo, flax linen, and other écru fabrics.

Mosses are much used for trimming ball dresses of white tulle or tarlatan. Other summery garlands are of green leaves and intertwined vines with a deep fringe of white hyacinths, harebells, or lilies-of-the-valley. The fringe edges over-skirts and heads flounces.

For protecting the facing of skirts that drag on the ground an inner facing is now used of dark oil-cloth or morocco bound with braid. It is more substantial than the pleated wigging, which is so soon discolored and worn out. It costs twenty-five cents a yard. Two yards are sufficient for a skirt, as it is only placed on the back breadths.

Belts with pockets attached, and traveling bags made of alligators' skins, are the most novel importations of the week, and are said to be the caprice of the season abroad. This leather is a light écru-color, with many irregular indentations, and is mounted with gilt, oxidized silver, or Russia leather.

Scarfs of thin white India cotton and of bamboo, with gay Roman bars for borders, are tied around black or white hats, worn in the country by young ladies. Those with black striped borders and fringe are also very stylish.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and SHAW & EATON.

PERSONAL.

WHEN the Shah presented to Earl GRANVILLE his photograph set in diamonds the earl extracted the picture, pressed it to his heart, and returned the diamonds, explaining that, much as he thanked him, his position as an English minister forbade his receiving a present from a foreign monarch. It was rather tough, but he did it.

—Mr. WARNER, author of My Summer in a Garden, was not at all tempted by the bait of that "snapper up of unconsidered" lecturers, Mr. REDPATH, to enter that literary prairie called the "lecture field." Mr. WARNER observed to the seductive REDPATH, "It seems to me that the older I grow the wiser I grow." So he grows on in wisdom if not in stature, and sticks to home and Hartford.

—Soon after the return of the Rev. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON from Canada to England he preached in City Road Chapel, London, a sermon in aid of the liquidation of the Westminster Chapel debt. The collection taken up on the occasion exceeded $10,000.

—Of Dean ALFORD's personal appearance and habits the Sunday Magazine gives a pleasant description: "Of stately and impressive presence, there was in him a freedom and spontaneity of communicativeness which charmed those brought into contact with him in society. He was to the last young in heart. He delighted in simple pleasures. To escape from his books for a quiet ramble in the woods or on the beach, or by the stream-side, was all the relief he needed. He would sit and sketch familiar or beautiful objects with a patient assiduity. He loved long rambles on foot, and had a keen eye for the aspects of nature. His wanderings in France and Italy were specially memorable to him because of the enfranchisement he then experienced from many rules and conventionalities from which he scarce could escape in England. He was personally without many faults of a positive kind. His ambitions were bound up closely with his self-respect, and therefore he had but slight experience of poignant disappointment. He had lived the studious life which he had loved, and had met with but few great trials. Yet his sympathies were always warm, and prone to take the most practical form."

—Professor WISE, the aspiring man who proposes to balloon himself across the Atlantic, is an angular, firmly knit, fine-looking, elderly gentleman of agreeable address, and of such fatness of body as to carry him to the locker of the estimable David Jones in case he should be spilled from his airy vehicle.

—Mr. GLADSTONE has asked the Jubilee singers to give a warbling at his house, and invited WALES to be present.

—Mr. WILLIAM BARNES, for many years the able superintendent of the Insurance Department of this State, has recently received, through the Russian minister at Washington, a diamond ring from the Emperor of Russia, commemorative of his services last year as a delegate from this country to the International Statistical Congress in St. Petersburg. The Albany Journal describes it as a perfect gem of art. The gold of which its massive hoop is composed comes from the Caucasus, and is of peculiar color and beauty, and eight large diamonds of perfect lustre form an appropriate setting for a shield of blue enamel, upon which is raised the imperial cipher, and above it the imperial crown, each set in smaller diamonds. While in St. Petersburg Mr. BARNES participated largely in the active work of the International Congress, was intrusted with special and responsible duties, and was made a member of the Permanent Commission, which sits at Vienna during the coming month for the purpose of arranging and organizing the work of the next session. It will be remembered that the President in his last message recommended that this important body should hold its next meeting in the United States, and it was through the earnest and energetic efforts of Mr. BARNES that a resolution to that effect was carried through both Houses of Congress last winter.

—We must keep telling about the Shah, for he's going away pretty soon, and then will be of no more use for "personals" or newspapers. That man has absolute control over the whole revenue of the country, and can tax his subjects as much as he pleases. He is worth about $20,000,000, one-half of which is in jewels.

—Mrs. BEECHER STOWE has returned to Hartford, as bright and cheery as ever. Not the least interesting of her literary treasures is a collection of the almost innumerable translations of Uncle Tom's Cabin, which is said to have been translated into more languages than any other volume ever published, unless it be the Pilgrim's Progress.

—Miss CLARA M. BABCOCK, daughter of the pastor of Warren Street Unitarian Chapel, Boston, having finished her studies in the Divinity School of Harvard University, has officiated twice in her father's pulpit. She is about to visit Germany for a year of study, after which she will return to this country and enter upon active service in the ministry.

—The Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE is fortunate in his friends. One of these has had the good taste to present Mr. HALE with a cottage at Narraganset Pier.

—The Hon. HENRY VILLIERS STUART, formerly an Episcopalian minister, is the first reverend not a Dissenter who has been in Parliament since HORNE TOOKE. He has forsaken the Church for politics.

—A majority of the female clerks in the Treasury Department at Washington come from what we popularly term "the best families." Governor FAIRCHILD, of Wisconsin, there found the fair child who became his wife. She was the daughter of a distinguished public man. The present United States District Attorney for South Carolina "pressed his suit" in the Treasury for beautiful ALICE INGERSOLL, daughter of a former Attorney-General of Massachusetts. Mrs. JOHNSON, daughter of Colonel ABERT, formerly for many years head of the bureau of Topographical Engineers, has for ten years been a clerk in the Treasury. Mrs. TILTON, sister of General ROBERT OULD, formerly United States District Attorney for the District of Columbia, is there also, as are the widows of Captain RINGGOLD and Major HEAP.

—Mr. JOHN C. CLOUD makes a small bid for notoriety. A few days since he started from near Philadelphia on a rowing excursion to New Orleans in a small boat, his daily pull to be not less than twenty miles. His first point was Bristol, where he was to enter the canal, and continue rowing until he reached the Ohio River, thence down until he reached the Mississippi, and then away down to New Orleans, stopping at cities and towns on the route to play in a piece written for him.

—In a Pennsylvania grave-yard may be seen a stone bearing this inscription: "Here lieth the body of AMY MAJOR, who departed this life March 20, 1792. Suffice it to say she was an honest woman—the second noblest work of God."

—The press of Lowell, Massachusetts, seems to us to be conducted on principles of levity. The Courier, for example, alluding to the fact that the Hon. ASA PACKER had given a million of dollars and fifty-six acres of land to the Lehigh University, asks, "How is that for Lehigh?"

—EDMONIA LEWIS, our colored sister, who is doing so well in Rome, says she means to make as beautiful an exposition as she can, and send it to the Philadelphia exhibition anonymously, in order that it may be judged fairly, and without favor or prejudice. At the International Exhibition of Sculpture and Paintings at Naples Miss LEWIS obtained gold medals for her "Sleeping Children" and "Love Caught in a Trap."

—It is reported that before sailing for Europe a few days since Mr. A. T. STEWART made a new will, in which it was thought proper to make a schedule and valuation of his real and personal estate, and that to the surprise of himself and those engaged in the details, it was found that he was worth about one hundred millions of dollars. That Mr. STEWART will prove himself a good steward of this vast fortune can scarcely be doubted. Already he has commenced administering on his own estate by the erection of the stately "Working-Women's Home," in Fourth Avenue, and it is scarcely probable that he will content himself with that work of benevolence. We were told a few days ago by an experienced railway superintendent that the road bed, ties, steel rails, etc., of Mr. STEWART's railroad to Hempstead were by far the best of any railroad in America.

—"Grace Greenwood" is always relating something that opens the eyes and relaxes the facial muscles. Of the extravagance of New England humor she instances that when a young farmer's wife made her first boy's pants precisely as ample before as behind, the father exclaimed, "Goodness! he won't know whether he's going to school or coming home."

—That superior ruler, the Mikado of Japan, has issued orders that all men of certain social and political rank shall subscribe for the new Japanese newspaper or have their heads cut off. No compulsion—only they must.

—The first part of BLANCHARD JERROLD'S Life and Times of Napoleon III. will be issued about Christmas. It has the special sanction of the Empress EUGÉNIE.

—When in Paris the Shah visited the establishment of one of the most extensive jewelers of that city, and purchased for $120,000 a collar of pearls, and for $17,000 a diamond bracelet, for the wife of Marshal M'MAHON. Every thing he bought was first placed on the person of the Grand Vizier to enable the monarch to see how it looked.

—Mr. THOMAS HOLLOWAY, one of the pill-ars of English patent medicinery, having already put aside $500,000 for the erection of a hospital for middle-class lunatics, has recently decided to erect two or more hospitals in the vicinity of London—one for the reception of incurables, another for convalescents, the estimated cost of the land and buildings being $1,250,000. He does not propose to endow the hospitals, leaving to the philanthropic of the present and future ages the duty of maintaining them.

—Professor HORSFORD, accompanied by representatives of several American journals, has been on a visit to Prince SCHWARZENBERG, and his grand domain of 75,000 acres, near Vienna. The population of the domain is about 30,000 people, who inhabit ninety-nine villages. Every thing about this princely estate is done in the most thorough and liberal manner, and the income to the property is only about three per cent. on the capital invested. The old prince, who is seventy-two, has all the heartiness and simplicity in his bearing of a genuine American farmer, and the hereditary prince is as active and intelligent a young fellow as can be found in any country. His face is not of the German type; he might be English or American. He is straight and broad-shouldered, dark-eyed, and with dark, closely cut hair. He is ruddy and in perfect health; has white teeth shining out from under a slight mustache as he smiles good-naturedly to every one. He did more work that day than any one in the party, and was undoubtedly the least fatigued. He speaks French and English well, to say nothing of several patois in use in the Austrian empire. His wife is his counterpart; tall and graceful, her manners at the same time polished and perfectly frank, she converses with her visitors without waiting for the formality of introduction, and wins every body's heart by her sympathetic smile and honest handsome face. She is the same age as her husband, I should judge, and both are on the sunny side of thirty-five. And yet they look ten years younger. She replied to any one who asked her about her two fine young girls accompanying her, that she had seven more children at home, speaking of it with evident pride. She, with her daughters, walked from the village to the station, and enjoyed it. Disease can take no hold on such a family, and the race of people they build up will be the bulwark of the empire. Such a sight as this family is rare in Europe, and is a living monument to the virtues of air and exercise, pure blood, and contempt for the injurious customs and costumes of modern society. No one has a more magnificent palace in Vienna than Prince SCHWARZENBERG; no family certainly fills a palace better.

Border for Dress Trimmings.—Venetian Embroidery.

See illustration on page 532.

THIS border may be worked on Swiss muslin or nansook, or else on faille, gray linen, etc. Having run the outlines of the design figures, work the bars and scallops between the design figures, stretching the working thread back and forth, and then overcasting it. In order to form the picots on the scallops, twist the thread close underneath the last stitch at the corresponding point, and let it stand in a loop. Button-hole stitch all the outlines of the figures, cut away the material between the figures as shown by the illustration, and then work the wheels.

WOMEN PHYSICIANS IN CAIRO.

AMONG the many reformations carried out in the domestic administration of Egypt during the sovereignty of the present Khedive, one of the most praiseworthy, yet perhaps the least known, is the vast improvement which has been effected in female medical education. While in England the faculty, as a rule, have set their faces against the admission of women into the profession, the doctors in Egypt have not only encouraged them to study medicine, at least as far as the diseases of women and children are concerned, but, with the approbation of the Khedive, have drawn out and established for them a curriculum of professional education, including chemistry, botany, physiology, and female anatomy, which are carried to a degree fully on a par with a pass examination at Apothecaries' Hall, in London.

The result of this has been that while in London a large proportion of the women of the working classes, and nineteen out of twenty of the female paupers in the work-houses, are attended by women whose principal recommendation among the medical profession seems to be that they have received no scientific education whatever, in Cairo, even among the lowest population, the women and children are attended by well-instructed female practitioners. These, in point of ability and devotion to their particular branch of the profession, will perhaps not be inferior to the average male practitioner in any part of the world.

My attention was first called to this subject about two years since. When dining one day at the table d'hôte in Shepherd's Hotel, Cairo, I accidentally seated myself beside a French gentleman, Dr. X——, who, I shortly found, had resided some twenty years in Egypt, and was a member of the Viceroy's army medical staff.

The conversation turned on the state of the medical profession in Egypt, in the course of which he adverted to the extreme difficulties which attended the introduction of the study of medicine into the country; this not solely arising, as was erroneously imagined, from the fatalism which forms so vast a portion of the Mohammedan creed, but from the great aversion they had to allow male medical practitioners to attend their families.

Indeed, so great was their repugnance to a system of the kind that when, during the viceroyalty of Mohammed Ali, the attempt was made to establish a medical school after the European fashion, so determined were the Mussulmans to refuse all medical aid for their families, it was at first feared the attempt would prove abortive.

The small-pox, however, at the commencement of Clot Bey's endeavors to form a medical staff, broke out with great violence in Cairo, and all efforts of the native doctors to control it proved even more ineffectual than usual on occasions of the kind. The Mohammedans, when the disease broke out in their families, dreading the visits of the medical men, concealed the fact with so much tenacity that at last the epidemic reached such terrible proportions as to necessitate very stringent measures being adopted to suppress it.

An order was given that every house should be visited by the medical men (principally French) attached to the government staff. Against this order the inhabitants rebelled, and some of the medical men who attempted to enter the most populous and infected portions of the town were severely maltreated.

Mohammed Ali suppressed these rebellious symptoms in a very energetic, though perhaps somewhat too "Turkish" a manner. The morning after the news of the disturbance had reached him the quarter of the town in which it had occurred was surrounded by the troops of the Viceroy. The chief of the police established in the centre a court of inquiry, and a multitude of the rioters were brought before him. Of these he hanged six on the spot, and bastinadoed fifty others with so much severity that they were obliged to be carried out of his presence. This energetic proceeding had the result of calming the disturbance for the time, and things went on more smoothly for the future. Still, in spite of despotic ordinances and severe police regulations, the Mussulmans continued their prejudice against male medical practitioners attending their wives and families. This state of things continued till the accession of the present Khedive, when, on the suggestion of Burguières Bey, the present head of the medical staff in Egypt, a school was established for midwives. In this they were to pass through a regulated course of study before they should be allowed to practice, and that of sufficient severity to insure for the female population of Egypt a proper and scientifically educated body of women, capable of taking, in all cases excepting those of extreme severity, the medical charge of their own sex.

The next day Dr. X—— took me to witness the examination of the female medical students who had passed through their course of study. On a sort of dais or throne sat the president of the medical staff of Egypt, and head physician of the Viceroy, Burguières Bey. Before him was a table, on which were three vases, and below on the floor of the amphitheatre was a long table, on which lay a skeleton and several herbs.

I inquired of my conductor what the vases contained, and he told me there were in them a number of slips of paper containing questions to be asked. In one vase were those on botany and materia medica; in another, questions on anatomy, especially of the female subject; and the third, on diseases of women and children. A certain number of these questions would be drawn out at hazard from each vase, and the candidates expected to answer them. After each department had been gone through, the question was put to the council of physicians for their decision as to the correctness of the replies, each in his turn being invited to ask any question he pleased on the subject under consideration.

Behind the medical council, who were seated in a semicircle at a little distance from the table, were a number of medical students and others, tempted by curiosity to be present on the occasion; and behind these again, on the top row of benches lining the wall, were some sixteen or eighteen women, but whether old or young, handsome or ugly, it was impossible to say, for they all wore the long, white, opaque veil, leaving their eyes only visible, while their persons were covered with long, loose, black silk dresses. On remarking to my conductor the singular uniformity in their dress, he told me it was their habitual costume, and, moreover, that when called out to attend any case they always rode on donkeys with red saddle-cloths, so that the mission they were bound on should be known, and all persons make way for them—a practice which, though adopted voluntarily, is as faithfully respected as if it had been an order from the police.

Burguières Bey having made a sign that the examination should commence, one of the candidates was led down to a space in front of the table. To judge of her appearance, as before stated, was impossible. The only conclusion I arrived at (though I afterward heard she was twenty years of age) was that she was a Nubian, and this from the coal-black color of her hands, the only portion of her visible. The examination commenced by a series of questions on the anatomy of the female subject, especially on osteology and myology, or, to speak in more common phraseology, on the bones and muscles. After the first question, which had been drawn from the vase by the president, had been satisfactorily answered, each of the council in turn put others to her. Although the questions and answers, being in Arabic, were unknown to me, the pupil seemed to answer all to the perfect satisfaction of her questioners, and with an amount of aplomb fully equal to that of any self-assured pupil passing an examination at the College of Surgeons in London. These questions, which lasted about twenty minutes, being over, she was next examined on the diseases of women and children, and the different operations which might come under her notice; the whole of which were answered in as satisfactory a manner as those on anatomy.

The president now rose and drew from the vase a question on materia medica. This she answered equally well, and the subject was then taken up by the professors, and her medical examination was concluded. Before, however, putting the question of her admission to the vote, Burguières Bey asked if she would like to pass an examination in any foreign language. She might do so if she pleased, but it was not compulsory. She immediately selected French, and a professor of the French language being present then wrote on a slate:

"Le premier devoir de l'élève est de garder, toute sa vie, une profonde gratitude pour ses maîtres."

This phrase she translated and analyzed word for word in the most perfect manner, and was examined on other subjects connected with the French language and literature, all of which she answered with so pure an accent and in such correct grammar as to call forth the compliments of all present.

The question was now put by the president as to her reception into the Faculty of Medicine. The unanimous decision was that she should be received into the obstetric branch of the profession, and was entitled to the customary honors for the examination. I was on the point of asking my companion what those honors were, when the military band outside the building commenced playing the Egyptian national air with such vigor as to drown my voice, and I was obliged to rest till it concluded. I then inquired what were the honors to which the candidate was entitled.

"You have just heard them," he replied.

"Heard what?" I asked.

"The honors offered to her. Whenever a woman passes an examination in a satisfactory manner, the Viceroy's military band, stationed there for the purpose, plays the Egyptian national air in her honor."

I thought a better method might have been introduced, and one more appropriate to the subject, but I kept my opinion to myself.

Another student was now called down, who, judging from the lighter color of her hands, was probably a Copt. The same formalities were again gone through, she passing her scientific examination as satisfactorily as the former. When asked whether she would like to pass the examination in any other language, she selected Italian, and although it would hardly be correct to state that she succeeded as well as the Nubian did in French, it was, after all, very creditable. When reading, she translated very fluently into Arabic, but somewhat halted in her conversation.

All passed in a satisfactory manner, some remarkably so, several having the military band play the national air in their honor. About one-half passed examinations in foreign languages, most of them choosing French.

CHAPERONING.

IF ever I do it again! If ever I undertake again to matronize, patronize, chaperon, whatever you may call it, a set of giddy young girls! To be sure, Flossy Dunbar was one of the sweetest, quietest little maidens in all the world, who had never given her parents or governesses a day's anxiety in her life—perfectly docile, you would say; and Lotty Helmar was a high-spirited, independent girl, full of brave glad visions of life, and with "no nonsense about her." These two were pets of mine, and I was heartily glad to have their company. And then Ella Floyd somehow slipped into the party, making a third, but Ella didn't count for much one way or the other, I thought.

John drew a comically long face when I told him we were to take the girls.

"This is what you call rest and freedom from care, is it?" he asked. "How are you going to keep watch and ward over three romantic young ladies and their lovers, and at the same time sing lullabies to Rose Pose every hour in the day?"

"They haven't any lovers," I assured him, "and they are not romantic, but nice, good-natured girls, who will be company for me while you are gone, and, besides, will help me take care of Rosie."

So with confidence and a light heart I packed our trunks, not forgetting one thing, from John's fishing-rods down to the baby's rattle-box, and at the appointed day and hour we rode gayly off in a hack to the wharf, arriving there just as the first bell rang, denoting that the steamboat was in sight. Early as we were, Lotty Helmar was there before us, her bonny brown hair waving in the wind, and her clear eyes looking seaward. Her father was with her, having come down to see us off and say good-by. Five minutes later the Dunbar carriage arrived, and Flossy sprang out with a gay salute, followed more slowly by Ella Floyd, for whom she had called on the way. Mrs. Dunbar was in the carriage, and while the trunks were being handed down she beckoned me to her for a moment of low-toned conversation.

"Just a last word, Mrs. Houghton," she murmured. "Mr. Dunbar and I are very grateful to you indeed for being willing to take charge of our daughter during her vacation. Nothing but my sister Saltonstall's illness prevents my journeying with her myself. But of course we have no fear in trusting her to your care. There are so many things—a young girl, you know—and of course our hopes are all bound up in our child's future, but I believe there is very little gayety at the island, not many gentlemen, certainly no adventurers. A quiet place for families, I am told. I know you will take every care of Flossy, Mrs. Houghton."

The last trunk was off; there was no more chance for private talk. The steamboat was at the wharf, and Mrs. Dunbar, sitting back in her carriage, watched our embarking with benignant stateliness.

"Don't she look like a dowager empress, with her grand air and iron gray curls?" whispered Lotty, and I agreed, feeling, however, a little inward amusement at the dowager's cautions. You see, Rosie being only a baby, I couldn't be expected to understand all the feelings of mothers with grown-up girls.

Mrs. Dunbar's keen eyes might scan the little crowd of passengers as they liked, there was no one among them to excite her fears, for John was the only good-looking man that went aboard, the rest of them being an elderly, invalid-looking set enough. John had an acquaintance here and there among them. I saw him speaking to a clergyman, a seedy professor, and others of that ilk.

My girls and I nested ourselves among our water-proofs at the forward end of the deck, and Rosie, wrapped in her little blue hooded cloak, crowed and laughed in our midst. The damp salt wind blew in our faces; the sky and water reflected each other's changeable hues; our native town behind us grew small in the distance. We were fairly out at sea. Outward-bound, outward-bound! And quite in the direction of France, some one said. "Ah, if we were only going there!" we murmured. But while the next six hours lasted we should be just as much at sea as if it were to be weeks instead of hours.

"I wonder if we shall be seasick," said Flossy, in a tone of delighted awe, as if she thought it would be a great experience. This was Flossy's first voyage.

"Not a bit!" exclaimed Lotty. "I never am, and I have been around Point Judith, and off Watch Hill in a storm."

"Lemons are good if you are seasick," said pale little Ella Floyd. "I have some in my bag, enough for all of us."

But they were not needed. The steamboat plowed steadily on her way, the shores we had left were barely visible, while ahead a low dark line along the horizon indicated the island. That was where we were going pleasure-seeking, a friend of John's having offered us his cottage, close by the hotel, for the rest of the season.

"Only think!" cried Lotty, in a rapture. "Six weeks of sea and rock and sky! What blessed mortals we are!"

"What man is Mr. Houghton bringing this way?" whispered Ella Floyd.

"A man!" was my dismayed thought, remembering Mrs. Dunbar; but on glancing down the deck, I saw only the seedy professor with John.

"My old friend, Professor Brown, ladies!" said John, with an air as if he were introducing a prince. I made room for him, feeling immensely relieved. The girls grew quiet as mice, and the professor, looking tranquilly across the sea, discoursed upon certain algæ he expected to find around the island.

And now the long white hotel was plain in view, with its little entourage of cottages. There were the bathing-houses, with clothes of many colors spread out drying in the sun; there was the long, rough pier of stone, the shore of sand and rock, the smell of sea-weed, and a score of little boats dancing up and down by their stakes.

At last we were there, at last our eager feet trod the shore, and gathering up Rose Pose and all the bundles, we made our way up the sandy path. The very first cottage we came to wore a look of emptiness and expectation. John tried his key, the door opened, and in we flocked and established ourselves. There was time for only the slightest preparation when the gong sounded, summoning us to the hotel to dinner. When we returned we chose rooms, and became fairly settled.

The rooms were charming: sitting-room, hall, and library on the first floor, and three or four pleasant chambers above. There was a grate for a wood fire in the library, and a few books on the shelves, which our friends had been kind enough to leave.

"We shall be perfectly happy here!" chorused the girls, full of sea-dreams and fancies.

They made a tour of the island that afternoon, pushing their way through huckleberry bushes and bull-briers up to the highest points of view; while I, rummaging farther through the cottage, found a child's carriage—rather a forlorn one, to be sure—with a broken seat and loose wheel, but feminine ingenuity mended it, and baby throned herself in it; so we, too, went off for a jaunt. There were a great many other babies out with their nurses and mothers, and plenty of larger children running up and down the green. Evidently, as I had heard, the place was chiefly patronized by families seeking health and not gayety. A group of young ladies had gathered for a chat on the piazza steps, and as I passed them I heard a discontented beauty say:

"We leave to-morrow without fail. Mother is going to take me to Long Branch, where I can see a little of life. Just think! there has only been one dance here since we came, and then there were not gentlemen enough for half the sets!"

"Mrs. Dunbar need not be alarmed," I thought, complacently.

Meanwhile John was down on the pier choosing a sail-boat and skipper. He had only a week to stay with us before going back to the mainland and business, and he wanted to make the most of his time. We must do all our sailing while he was there, he said; after that it would be time enough to take up bathing and basking.

So we spent one wild breezy week of delight, sailing hither and thither, trying every wind, flying and tacking, fishing and trolling, and visiting every thing there was to visit, namely, a low black reef of rocks a mile out, and practicable only at low tide; a desolate, slippery place enough, but abounding in the most rare and delicate sea-mosses, the very idols of Professor Brown's heart, and we often took him there as we went sailing, leaving him for an hour or two to clamber over the weed-bound rocks, and grope in the water with his net.

"Well," said John, when the day came for him to leave us, as he packed his valise, "you must get along the best you can, wifie, and write to me every day. Go bathing and huckleberrying till you are all brown as nuts, and don't let the girls get into mischief!"

We all went down on the pier to see him off, when the boat was ready to start. She had come in about an hour previous, but we had been too busy to notice what passengers she brought. John went aboard just before they drew the plank in, and in a moment more the waves were widening between us. I cried—I always do, and can't help it, when John has to go away from me—and I walked off by myself to the end of the pier, so the girls should not see the worst of it.

When I turned around again, there was a young fellow in a velvet shooting-jacket shaking hands with Lotty in a most rapturous manner. Had he dropped out of the skies? I asked Ella Floyd, in a whisper, who he was. She has the knack of always knowing every body.

"Why, it's Bob Ainsleigh," she said. "All the Ainsleighs came in the boat this afternoon."

Bob Ainsleigh! Was ever any thing so unfortunate! For I remembered now that his absurd devotion to Lotty the year before had already been the theme of gossip, and he was a mere boy, not twenty. He had met her at the mountains first, carried her camp-stool for her, and joined her in all her madcap climbs with a boyish zeal that won her favor, till he wound it up by falling madly in love. Lotty laughed at him good-naturedly, and thought no more of it till after her return to town, when he followed her about so persistently that the Ainsleighs were terribly annoyed, and sent him South for the winter.

And now here he had turned up again, just when I had the whole responsibility of Lotty, too! And what would the world say, and the proud old family of Ainsleighs, if there should be any imprudence? Lotty was no slave to etiquette, either: she would do right, but it must be in her own way. Pondering these things in a coward heart, but with a brave face, I walked up to Lotty, and let her give me an introduction. We then started together along the homeward path, Ella and dear little Flossy following demurely behind with the baby-carriage.

"You'll go sailing with me this afternoon, Lotty?" asked the Ainsleigh boy, confidently. My hand was on Lotty's arm, and I gave her a little warning pressure. She looked up and laughed.

"Why, no, Bob, not to-day," she said. "It is too late. And to-morrow you go duck-shooting. But next day, or next, maybe, I'll give you a race—a rowing match, you know. I am longing to touch the oars."

His willful, handsome face, which had grown dark at first, brightened at that, and he took off his hat to us gracefully as he left us at the cottage.

"Now, Lotty!" I exclaimed, as soon as we were fairly inside, "don't! please don't!"

"Don't what, Clara? You know I am not a flirt," she replied, almost indignantly. "Bob owns he behaved ridiculously last year, and wants a chance to redeem himself. I shall treat him, just as I always have, as a good-natured boy."

Well, Lotty was not a girl to be very easily led or commanded, and I could only fervently hope that the Ainsleighs would soon leave the island, and that, as every thing always did come out right with Lotty, this thing might too. But I could not watch her much, because of Rosie. While John was with us we were always off together in the sail-boat, Rosie and all; or if at home, and the girls wanted me to promenade with them in the hotel piazza, or visit the music-hall, John was always ready to have a frolic with his baby daughter, and stay with her till we came back. But now my little despot made great demands upon my time, often drawing me away from the others, and almost daily wanting her nap just at the bathing hour, so that the girls had to go down to the beach without me. However, there was no harm in that, for there were none but nice, quiet people at the hotel, mostly ladies, and there seemed to be no necessity for severe chaperoning. Here was this new arrival, Bob Ainsleigh, though, to be sure, and for him I meant to keep a bright look-out.

The day that he went duck-shooting passed quietly. We spent most of the time in the sitting-room, fanned by sea-breezes through the open windows, dipping our fingers in plates of salt-water, arranging sea-mosses under the professor's supervision. He had kindled us with some of his own enthusiasm for the pretty things, and we worked over them patiently—all but Ella Floyd. She took no interest in our work, and sat most of the time out in the porch reading Guy Livingstone.

But the next morning Bob Ainsleigh did not fail to waylay us, on our way from breakfast, to tell Lotty that he had two good boats ready at the pier.

"Very well," said Lotty; "I'll be down there at nine. Now mind you choose me good stout oars, Bob."

"Ay, ay!" he said, and whistled a sailor's tune as he walked gayly away.

"Now, Lotty," I ventured, anxiously, "is this quite the proper thing? I do wish you had not agreed to go!"

"Father would not object," said Lotty, confidently. "Father taught me to row himself, and he and I used to have a race every morning in the bay at Nantucket when we were there. He is proud of my rowing."

"It is not the rowing—it's Bob!" I insisted. "Lotty, please promise me that you won't race with him again, nor go in a boat with him while we are here. I don't want people talking while you are in my care."

"Oh, you are getting to be such a duenna, Clara!" she exclaimed, laughing. "I will promise willingly. But you must not object to something else I am going to do, for father gave his consent before I left home; and that is to hire a little boat for myself for the season, and go out rowing in it at least an hour every day alone, except when either you or one of the girls wants to go."

That I assented to, feeling rather proud myself of Lotty's prowess. She was a true Helmar. Every one knew the Helmars, and that they acted always honorably, always independently, and did every thing in a strong, brave, vigorous way.

"Still, I am glad my other girls are of the quiet sort," I thought, looking at Flossy and Ella, who were listening with all their ears.

The boat-race came off, and it was very exciting. We went down on the pier to see them start. The hotel guests got an inkling of the affair, and flocked to the shore just as they pushed off, giving them three rousing cheers. Lotty was dressed in her usual boating costume of dark blue, with a cable belt, and she looked like an ocean Hebe. A few strokes took them out into clear water, and then they bounded along side by side, both good rowers, and well matched. Bob Ainsleigh's oars went deeper into the water, but Lotty's long, steady stroke kept her even with him.

"How far are you going?" cried some one after them.

"Round the island!" Bob shouted back.

At that the crowd scattered, and went strolling in all directions for good points of view. But I staid with Rosie in a sunny corner near the pier, and let Flossy and Ella come and go with reports.

It was three miles around the island, and the boats were more than two hours making the circuit, fighting against wind and tide. There was a throng of people down on the pier to cheer them as they came in, so nearly side by side that neither could be fairly declared victor after all. Bob helped Lotty ashore, and I was on the spot at once to take her home. I suppose he had expected to walk up with her himself; for as I drew her away he frowned and walked off sulkily, his hands in his pockets.

"Nothing but a headstrong boy!" I exclaimed to my flushed and exultant charge, as we marched up the path. "Now, Lotty, neither his mother nor sister came out with the rest, and I have overheard chance remarks that make me heartily wish you had not gone."

"Oh, well, we won't go again," said Lotty.

"Now see here, girls," I continued, addressing them all, "we are to have no more of these young gallants around, mind that! I am your dragon to guard you, you know. We will just keep ourselves to ourselves after this, and if at any time we absolutely need an escort, we will have no one but the professor—for he's scientific and safe!"

The girls laughingly agreed, and as the next few days passed decorously by, I forgot my uneasiness. We settled down into a sort of routine, and had a real good time, doing all our bathing and strolling in the mornings, and in the afternoons taking naps, reading, or working, as we liked. Flossy and Lotty each determined to fill an album of mosses to take home for a souvenir, and their bottles of specimens stood in every corner. The professor helped them to choose the finest, and himself contributed some rare beauties to the collections. The library was turned into a press-room—the presses consisting of smooth boards with great heavy stones placed on them. Whenever we went down to the shore, Flossy carried her pole and net, to catch any pretty mosses that might come floating up by the rocks. And Lotty—who had carried out her plan of hiring a boat and rowing an hour a day—was equally zealous, and seldom came home without a dripping handful. Ella held aloof from all this. She said she saw no beauty in sea-weeds, and preferred to read novels or to go calling on some of the young married ladies at the hotel whose acquaintance she had made. There was a Mrs. Myrick in particular whom she thus favored.

Meanwhile Lotty was behaving beautifully about Bob Ainsleigh. He invited her to sail again and again, but she steadily declined. He came to the cottage to call on her three or four times; but finding us all together in the sitting-room, with the professor—who chanced each time to be present—discoursing on science and other lofty things, he became ill at ease; and as Lotty would not go out in the porch with him, he left very soon, evidently in a huff.

Ella Floyd fell into a habit of lingering with the Myricks after supper, and returning to the cottage later than the rest of us, sometimes even after dark, but as she was always in when I came down stairs from getting my dimpled darling to bed, I did not pay much attention to this fact, till one evening Rosie went to sleep sooner than usual, and I got down just as Ella was saying good-night to a gentleman at the door. She said it was Mr. Myrick, and that he always came home with her if it was late. I told her then she must never be late again. It was all very well to go and sit an hour or so with Mrs. Myrick, who was a plain, lady-like person enough, but her husband was decidedly flashy-looking and fast, not at all to my taste.

The next night there was to be a hop in the hotel parlors, the first entertainment of the sort since we had been on the island, and of course the girls wanted to go. But how was it to be managed? for of course I could not let them go by themselves, neither could I leave my sleeping baby. But at last it was settled, by Flossy, with her usual sweetness, offering to give up going, and to sit with Rosie while I matronized the others. I agreed to this the more readily because her mother's caution still now and then rang in my ears, and who could tell what a hotel dance might lead to? So I went up with Lotty and Ella; they were each other's partners, and danced very prettily together. Bob Ainsleigh stood with lowering brow in the corner: I had made Lotty promise not to dance with him. I watched the graceful motions for a while, and then, feeling a little homesick for Rosie, I went to a window and looked down the darkness to where a single light shone star-like from the cottage chamber. Here the professor found me, just as I was growing remorseful over Flossy's isolation; and on learning how the case stood, he at once proposed to escort me home, if I felt anxious about baby, and to bring Flossy back in my place. I consented to this, if he would promise me to bring all the girls home in an hour, for to so respectable an escort as our grave professor no parent could object.

Arriving at the cottage, I put my mantle around Flossy and hurried her off, then took my place by the table where she had sat. The book she had been reading lay open at a sonnet beginning:

> "The face of all the world is changed, I think,
> Since first I heard the footsteps of thy soul."

I closed it with a smile. So this demure little maiden was beginning to prepare her heart already for the love which might come in the future, as some flowers wake up before the sun rises.

The time slipped rapidly by while I was writing a letter to John detailing all our doings, and I was startled, as I finished, to find that it was after ten o'clock.

"Where are those girls?" I exclaimed, springing up and going to the door to look out. There was no moon, but it was bright starlight. I dimly saw two figures coming down the path, but as they approached the cottage one disappeared. The other came slowly forward, and as I lifted my lamp I saw it was Ella Floyd, looking paler than usual and a little frightened.

"Ella, who came home with you?" I demanded.

"Mr. Myrick," she replied.

"Ella!" I began, sternly, but she interrupted me with a sort of petulance.

"Well, what was I to do? You went off with the professor without saying a word to us, and then I lost Lotty, and I don't know what I should have done if it hadn't been for the Myricks!"

"At least you might have ended your perplexity sooner by coming home an hour ago," I said, coldly; but my reproaches were cut short by the sudden appearance of the professor and Flossy, coming not from the direction of the hotel, but from the shore. They both looked excited. Flossy's eyes were big and shining, and her hair was tumbling out of its net.

"Why, where is Lotty?" I exclaimed.

"We don't know where she is!" said Flossy, breathlessly. "We have looked and looked, and can't find her any where!"

"I suppose it is partially my fault," said the professor, humbly. "When we went up to the hotel we did not go into the parlor at once, as I was tracing out some of the constellations for Miss Dunbar; and when we did go in, Miss Helmar was nowhere to be seen."

"But you inquired? you searched for her? Where is she?" I cried.

"Those of whom I inquired," he replied, "had last seen her promenading with young Ainsleigh. The surmise is that they went out for a stroll on the rocks."

"Then you have set the whole hotel to surmising!"

"Oh, Clara!" broke in Flossy, eagerly, "I am sure Professor Brown has been very kind; and he has gone with me down on the pier, and to the grotto, and up to the cliff—all Lotty's favorite walks—but we could not find her."

"You dear little white kitten!" I exclaimed, "should I ever have let you take such a tramp? Go into the house, child, and let me hear the rest from the professor."

"There is nothing more," he said, soberly. "We thought she might have got back before us. As she has not, I will go again at once in search of her."

And off he strode down the sandy path before I could even think to offer him a lantern.

I went into the sitting-room with the two girls, and there we sat and waited. My distress and excitement were almost uncontrollable, but the girls took the matter quietly enough after the first surprise, and even played and sang. I suppose when one is just entering the romantic period, starlight escapades and the like seem quite the natural thing, and not to be worried over.

I can not say the time dragged—it flew rather; it really seemed to me that I could see the hands on the clock moving steadily and quickly ahead, hurrying on the time to a later and still later hour. How soon it would be midnight, and Lotty no one knew where! The wind had been for some time rising with a desolately sad sound, and now, to crown our woes, the sky blackened and it began to rain.

Midnight at last! Just as I was springing up, feeling that I could endure it no longer, the door burst open, and there was Lotty, dripping wet, her eyes flashing, her face all aglow, and no one at all with her.

"I never had such a time in all my life!" she exclaimed. "Dear me, how wet it is! Clara, have you been worried? It is all Bob Ainsleigh's fault. He invited me to walk out on the rocks with him, and as the family are all to leave to-morrow, I consented, thinking I had treated him rather shabbily of late. Well, he wanted me to go to a place where he had discovered a sort of echo, so on we walked and walked till, if you believe it, I found myself halfway round the island, in a rocky fissure, with the ocean roaring at my feet! There is rather a curious echo there, Clara. I must tell the professor about it. Well, then the foolish boy began to talk again about the old subject, you know, that I had absolutely forbidden him to mention again, and he was so persistent I was obliged to be severe at last, and I told him his conduct was contemptible, and he had lost all my respect. That stung him, and he turned in a passion and strode rapidly away. I called to him to wait for me, for I did not want to be left alone at night among those dark slippery rocks. Well, he did not take the same path we went by, but the other, quite round the island, and never so much as offered to help me once! But at one point he did call back, 'Have a care there!' and I stopped short, and found myself on the very edge of a steep rock that went down as much as ten feet! Did you ever hear any thing like it? I can tell you I was glad enough to see the light streaming out of these windows!"

This was Lotty's account of her mad adventure. What the rest of us said, and how haggard and pale Professor Brown looked when he got back and found her there, are matters of no importance. I hurried my charges off to bed with few words, thinking I would have a serious talk with Lotty the next day.

But, dear me! she scattered all I had to say before I had hardly begun.

"I am sorry I kept you up so late, Clara dear," she said at once; "but truly that is all the harm I see in it. I shall tell my father all about it, and he will not blame me. Really, instead of scolding me, dear, you ought to scold Ella, for it is the common talk of the hotel how she flirts with Mr. Myrick."

"What!" I exclaimed, aghast.

"Bob told me so. She walks with him every evening, leaning on his arm with such an air of devotion; and poor Mrs. Myrick, they say, is ready to tear her in pieces."

This was enough. I went hastily to find Ella, and called her to account. What do you think? She looked up at me quite pertly and said:

"Why, what have I done wrong, Mrs. Houghton? Is it any more harm for me to walk with Mr. Myrick than for you to receive calls from Professor Brown every day?"

"You wicked girl!" I cried, "you know he is one of my husband's best friends, and John especially requested him to call here every day to see if we needed any thing."

"Oh, well," continued Ella, obstinately, "then why don't you talk to Flossy? I am sure if ever a girl was dead in love, she is!"

But I was not to be thus diverted, and after an hour of serious conversation I had the satisfaction of leaving Ella in tears of contrition. Poor, miserable girl! She had thought because Guy Livingstone flirted, so could she!

But what was that nonsense about Flossy? and, by-the-way, where was Flossy? I asked Lotty, who sat playing with little Rose in the porch.

"Oh, she went down to the shore half an hour ago," she said, "along with the professor, to catch algæ off the rocks!"

So after them down to the shore I sped in sudden anxiety. There they sat together on the rocks, and as I approached I heard him saying something about "most rare and lovely Flora."

"Oh, gracious!" I exclaimed, mentally, "I hope it is sea flora he means!" But it was not sea flora he meant—it was our Flora, the sweetest, choicest Flora on earth! I saw that, as soon as I reached them and met their happy eyes. It was all over: they loved each other, and were leagued against the whole world!

Well, what could I do? A letter to John, sent out by that night's boat, brought him to the island the next day, and as soon as might be he took his flock of culprits home. And if ever I go chaperoning again!

I have not seen Ella Floyd since, and I don't think I want to see her. As to Lotty Helmar, I love and admire her, but I don't want to have charge of her. A girl who finds it as natural to receive a declaration of love on black, slippery rocks at midnight by the roaring sea as others do in a parlor or conservatory is more than I can manage.

The Dunbars are furious. I took them home a loving, loyal woman in place of the sweet dreamy child they lent me. They see in the professor only a plain, inelegant, poor man, and they have forbidden her to see, speak, or write to him. She obeys, and is not cast down. She is willing to wait, and I see the light of a love and faith in her eyes that many waters can not quench, and many fires can not consume. She believes that one day they will see him as she sees him, and recognize the pure and lofty soul, the great intellect, and the true, tender heart. So they will, perhaps, for meantime the professor is winning laurels in the scientific world, and laurels count higher than dollars sometimes among these fine old families.

But may I never again be a chaperon!

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

FLIES—considered individually, the subject is small, but it is very numerous. In fact, of all small creatures not absolutely vicious, the common fly is the most vexatious. Mosquitoes bite—they must, to get their living; bees sting—to defend themselves; cockroaches run away when you attack them—they are afraid; but flies nibble upon you in an aggravating manner, never getting enough, and nothing will drive them away: they return with fierce persistency after cruel and constant rebuffs. You commence to read your newspaper in a comfortable arm-chair, or to write, for the sake of friendship, fame, or daily bread, at your desk. In the middle of the first sentence soft footsteps begin to tickle the top of your left ear. You shake your head emphatically, without lifting your pen. The intruder flies off a few inches, and re-alights on the back of your neck. Another shake, and again he settles on the top of your head, and begins to promenade up and down the parting of your hair. You give your head a vigorous slap, never by any chance hitting the fly. He is equally content to crawl over your forehead, and you meekly brush him away, hoping that gentle measures may prove effectual. He tries your right ear, and with calm resolution you wave him away. The creature sees his advantage, and audaciously alights on your nose. Resolved to keep your temper, you think you will let him take his own time to leave, hoping it will be soon, and forever. He pecks with gentle but restless persistence, and you write vigorously, resolute not to be disturbed by trifles. Suddenly down goes your pen, making an ugly blot on the fair sheet, and you employ both hands in giving your nasal organ a good rubbing. Patience, as in a moment, is exhausted. You meditate murder; you plan it deliberately—murder in the first degree. You lean back in your chair, and set yourself as a trap. The bait is good; the expected victim approaches; you wait breathlessly; your hand falls with a blow that makes your cheek tingle—but you look up to see him securely fluttering above your head, ready to try again. You will be more cautious and give your mind to the business. You take your handkerchief, double it judiciously, and hold it ready to descend with swift vengeance. The fellow is on your left hand—such a little creature to disturb your equanimity! Slowly, slowly, and you will get him! With sudden and tremendous force you pounce upon him—and he sails away unharmed! You feel most uncomfortably irritated—conquered by an insignificant fly! And you reflect (while brushing away the swarm which by this time, attracted by the confusion you have made, have come to see what is the matter) upon poisons, medicated fly-papers, and all the cunning devices advertised for enticing flies into the house with malicious intent. Shall you provide the neighborhood (of flies) with deadly food or submit to be nibbled alive? That is the question. And you fall into a mental discussion concerning the comparative annoyance of dead and of living flies, in the midst of which you drop into what would be a comfortable doze except for the audacious return of the identical fly you have been fighting, which lights on the tip of your nose, and you awake feeling absolutely cross.

Students on Penikese Island have been studying spiders. Illustrations were drawn from the spiders' webs with which the walls of one room are curtained, and which are kept inviolate for that special purpose.

July 27, 1856, is remembered by residents of New England as "the hot Sunday." The two preceding days had been unusually warm, and many were tempted to resort to watering-places which were supposed to be comparatively cool. A Boston paper of that date says that about a thousand persons went from that city to pass the Sabbath at Nahant. The day proved a most distressing one, the thermometer rising to ninety-seven degrees, and the air being perfectly still. No special preparation had been made for such a crowd of visitors; not only the ice but the drinking water entirely failed, and all supplies of food. The suffering experienced by many will never be forgotten.

The immense amount of unripe fruit with which our markets are now filled accounts in great measure for the recent increase of mortality among children. The increased heat and close, sultry weather weigh heavily upon the infantile population of a great city; but unripe and decayed fruit causes more deaths that is generally supposed.

The phylloxera, which first made its appearance as a vineyard plague in France during 1865, has again commenced its ravages on the grape-vines. It is said the insect never abandons a vineyard until it is absolutely denuded.

After church one Sunday a little girl living in Newburyport, Massachusetts, inquired of her mother who the "siggerbuggers" were. She was informed that there were no such creatures, but persisted that there must be, as the minister had prayed especially for them that day. It happened that the reverend man had some peculiarity of pronunciation, and after considerable investigation as to what the child had mistaken for the "siggerbuggers," it was discovered that the intended subjects for prayer were "the sick among us!"

Another poor little church-goer asked his mother where the "cattle with a thousand tails" lived.

"Cattle with a thousand tails, child!" exclaimed the astonished parent, "there are no such things."

"Yes, there are," returned the boy; "the minister said the cattle with a thousand tails were the Lord's!"

Is it surprising that little children do not understand sermons and enjoy church-going?

Deprivation of sleep is one of the many capital punishments in use under the Chinese criminal code, and generally proves fatal in about ten days. Five foolish young Belgians lately tried this experiment upon themselves, with more or less disagreeable results. They had a wager that they would remain awake for seven days, on condition that they might use all possible means of keeping off sleep. They arranged the employment of their time in the following manner: the night was spent in dancing and drinking quantities of coffee; during the day they rode, fenced, or shot at a mark, taking coffee every half hour. One of these young men won the wager, but lost twenty-five pounds in weight; two fell asleep after remaining awake 130 hours; one was seized with inflammation of the lungs; the fifth was overcome by slumber while on horseback, fell, and broke his arm; and thus ended this very unnecessary ordeal.

A good deal of sickness has been caused in many places by eating fish. It is held that trout is unfit for food two days after it has been killed, and that there is no process by which it can be kept good. Not long since a family in Cincinnati were made seriously ill by eating smoked trout. And several persons in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, were taken violently sick, recently, after partaking of smoked white-fish.

Travel to the Yosemite seems to have rapidly diminished since June. There is something wrong in the management of things, it is said. Charges are too exorbitant. The experience of the Viennese should be a warning to our country. Sometimes people refuse to submit to undue exactions.

Several wealthy Boston ladies have been raising a fund to be devoted to giving rides into the suburbs of the city to invalids whose limited means do not allow them to procure any such indulgence. Various methods of arranging excursions for poor children, mothers with infants, and invalids are being carried out in many of our cities. The charity is worthy the consideration of every one during this warm and sultry weather.

In Europe there are establishments where professional waiting is taught as a business. Wealthy hotel proprietors on the Continent, desiring to have their sons continue their occupation, send them to learn the art of a professional waiter. Without such knowledge and training they are considered incompetent to manage a first-class establishment. It is proposed to have such a school in New York.

A Tennessee young lady is getting discouraged. She does not mention how old she now is, but when she first "came out" in society she made up her mind that she could only marry an Episcopalian, being herself of that denomination. Finding not the man, she modified her views, and concluded to marry no one who was not a Christian. All she is looking for now is a man who does not drink whisky.

Wonders never cease in this progressive age of the world. It is now announced that a new novel by Charles Dickens is forth-coming. Dickens, to be sure, is dead, but, according to report, he yet speaketh through a spiritual medium living in Brattleboro', Vermont. This favored individual is described as a young machinist, about thirty years of age, who has had no training whatever for literary work. Every body will be delighted, of course, that in another state of existence Dickens continues his accustomed employment, and is willing to give the result of his labors to the inhabitants of this mundane sphere. This new development of the powers of deceased authors creates one difficulty, however: we can never have any complete set of the works of any writer; there will always be the liability of a new book being dictated by him to some spiritualist, which will necessitate our having it bound up to match our "green and gold" set, or whatever it may happen to be. To be sure, a new novel by Scott, Cooper, or Bulwer would always be very welcome; but then one sometimes likes to feel that he really has the whole of a thing! The anxious public must patiently await the completion of this "new novel by Dickens."

THE DOMESTIC MOTHER.

THE DOMESTIC MOTHER.

COME, baby, my darling! and like the sweet bird
That hies to its leaf-hidden nest,
Do thou in thy helplessness seek mamma's arms,
And nestle to sleep on her breast.
The sound that falls last on thy half-waking ear
Shall thy mother's soft lullaby be;
And baby, while wandering in dream-land to-night,
The face of his mother shall see.

O mothers! whose arms have forgotten the weight
That is surely more precious than gold,
How little ye know of the sweet inner life
That is slipping so fast from your hold!
Nor laces nor satins can ever atone
For the joys ye are thoughtlessly yielding:
And what of the dangers around the young life
Of the baby your love should be shielding?

THE FASHIONABLE MOTHER.

OH, not by the arms that are daintily decked
In the richest of satin and lace
Must baby expect to be lulled to his rest:
'Twould be shockingly out of place!
It never would do for the dear tired head
Mamma's fancy collar to crumple;
And what would she do if her baby should chance
That stylish silk garment to rumple?

But nurse—she is paid for her motherly (?) care
Of the child of a fashionable mother;
And baby is learning as older he grows
To love one as well as the other!
Oh, poor little child! you are robbed of the rights
Your infancy daily demands;
And mamma robs herself of the dearest of joys
When she yields you to hireling hands.

A RAY OF SUNSHINE.

THE TABARD INN, SOUTHWARK, LONDON.

THIS ancient English hostelry has recently attracted considerable attention on account of the announcement lately made that it was to be sold by public auction, and that in all probability it would be pulled down, and a modern building, probably devoted to the interests of leather or hops—two paramount borough industries—erected on its site. At first people thought that this was the veritable tavern in which Chaucer represented the assembling of his Canterbury Pilgrims 500 years ago, and it was not unreasonably asked that such a precious relic of the Middle Ages should be preserved, as the Hôtel Cluny has been preserved in Paris, and not sacrificed to the prosaic necessities of utilitarianism. But it has since been shown that, though the existing Tabard undoubtedly stands on the site of Chaucer's hostelry, it is not the same building. There was a terrible fire in the borough in 1676: 600 houses had to be destroyed in order to arrest the progress of the flames, and among them the inn visited by the Canterbury Pilgrims perished. Yet the present Tabard is sufficiently quaint to be worth saving in a city which possesses very few specimens of antique architecture. "It is," says the Daily Telegraph, "a poor little tumble-down odd mediæval structure, with carpentry like that of Noah's ark, and gable ends sorely out of symmetry, while inside it opens up one of those old court-yards lined with wooden galleries, characterizing the hostelries of mediæval times, and of which perfect examples may still be found in Holborn, Bishopsgate, and Gracechurch Street." In Urry's edition of Chaucer, published in 1721, there is a view of the Tabarde, or Talbot (the original name was for a time thus corrupted), as it then stood, the yard apparently opening upon the street, and it is constantly mentioned in books of anecdotes in the last century as a place of popular resort for carriers' wagons. The word "tabard" signifies a sort of jacket or sleeveless coat, with a square collar, once worn by noblemen, but latterly the distinctive dress of the heralds. The first foundation of this inn—which we ought to say is situated in the Borough High Street, within sight of London Bridge, and near the Hop Market—would appear to be due to the abbots of Hyde, who, when the bishops of Winchester had their palace near St. Saviour's Church, actually fixed their town residence close by. The land on which the old Tabard stood was bought by the Abbot of Hyde in 1307, and on it he erected a hostelry, which has continued to be a place of public entertainment up to the present time. Our engraving shows the Tabard Inn in its present state.

A WONDERFUL BOX.

WHAT strange stories you would hear if the furniture in your house could speak and tell its adventures!

Why, there's one curious box—on legs—that I dare say is in every house where this paper will go, that could tell stories of every part of the world. One part could tell of the frozen lands of the north pole, of icebergs, snow-houses, and fur-clad people; another part could tell of the hot countries at the equator, of fuchsia-trees thirty feet high, and wonderful forests filled with chattering monkeys and parrots; another portion of the box could take you to the deserts of Africa, tell of elephant hunts, and long caravans of men and camels; and still another might take you to dark mines hundreds of feet down into the earth.

To collect these different articles from their homes, prepare them for use, send them to market, and finally to unite them in one beautiful and useful box, took—I can't tell you how many hundreds of men. And all that you may have a nice piano!

You have no idea how many things help to make your piano. In the first place, there's the wood—twenty kinds of it.

You think one kind would do? Well, that's because you know very little about it. Long years of experiments have proved that the wood used for the cover won't do for the keys, and the wood put into the frame would be utterly unsuitable for the sounding-board. By thousands of trials they have found out exactly what kind of wood is best for each part. Now you must remember that each of these twenty kinds of wood has to be cut down in the country where it grew, sawed into plank, hauled to the seashore, and sent by vessel to our country. And it grew all over the world, from Norway to Brazil. Even then it isn't ready. It has to be dried. The lumber is piled up and left for years, and then put for months into a fiery place, called a steam-drying room, to take out the last spark of a desire to warp.

But there's something else in your piano besides wood. There's leather, nine or ten kinds of it; and I could show them to you if I could see you. Now nine or ten animals—buffaloes, calves, seals, and so forth—have met their deaths for your pleasure. Nine or ten hunters have been fitted out with guns and other weapons, have gone out, killed their animals, taken off the skins, dried them, and sold them to the leather-maker. The leather-maker has cured and tanned them, and sold them to the piano-maker.

And now we've only got to the metals, and of those there are five or six. Each metal must have taken a small army of men to get the ore out of the ground, melt it up, separate it from rocks and dirt. Then come the iron-founders, the brass-workers, the wire-drawers, the coppermen—I can't even guess how many.

Now I suppose you think we've got to the end of the materials; but I'm sure you don't want wooden keys to your piano. So we must have elephant hunters, and the ivory brought to our piano-factory; and glue and bees-wax—you'd count the bees as workmen, wouldn't you?

Then there's the felt to cover the hammers, the woolen cloth. That comes from a sheep's back, and goes through I don't know how many hands before it gets to be cloth.

To go on with our list, there's emery, oil, putty powder, and lots of other things that I forget; I can't remember every thing.

When all these materials—each of which could tell such an interesting story if it could speak—are cut, and gathered, and cured, and melted, and drawn, and rolled, and spun, and woven, and got into the factory, the real piano-making is not yet begun.

In large factories there are five or six hundred men, and machines that do the work of five or six hundred more. There are steam-engines doing the work of two or three hundred horses. And all these men and all these machines can only make ten pianos a day.

Did you ever notice how all these things are put together in that wonderful box? If you didn't, you just go now and open the piano, put its top back against the wall, or high up on the rests.

At the bottom of the case, or box, there is a frame of planks glued together very solid and tight. It is four or five inches thick, and is made so strong to endure the terrible pull of the wires. You'll have to take my word for that, for you can't see it.

Did you ask if the wires pull much? I should think they did; they would pull that iron frame to bits in an instant, but for the wood to which it is screwed. The iron frame, you see, is quite thin, and, by-the-way, it is a great deal of work to get this frame ready. It has to be cast, and then lots of holes bored in it, then japanned, and then baked. You didn't think your piano had been baked, did you? Then it is bronzed and gilded. Over that, you see, is the sounding-board, the most important thing in the whole instrument. Some one has called it the "soul of the piano."

The sounding-board is a thin piece of wood right under the strings. Then comes the action; that's the machinery by which the little hammers are made to strike the wires.

Strike a key. Did you see that hammer fly up, hit the wire a tap, and then go back? I don't suppose you can see very well if you strike it yourself, but get some one else to touch the notes, first one by one, and then with both hands, and you'll see a very funny dance of the little leather-headed fellows who live in that dark box.

Even when the works are all in, the piano isn't near done. It has to be polished, and that takes months, because they want to get such a beautiful polish, and one that will last forever. First, the case is made smooth with sand-paper; then it is varnished, and left eight days to harden. Next, a workman takes a tool and scrapes off all the varnish, except what has got into the pores of the wood: that is to make a good solid foundation for the polish. Then it is varnished again, and again scraped off; then it is varnished again, and not scraped off this time, but allowed eight days to harden. After this it is varnished four or five more times, each coat having eight days to dry. When all is done and dry, the workman finishes it up with his bare hands; that gives it a better finish than any thing else.

Over forty different trades are called into use in making a piano.

If you had lived when Mrs. George Washington was a girl, you would not have had such a splendid piano as you have now, for they were not made. The best they could make then was called a "spinet." The strings were struck by pieces of quill instead of hammers. It had but few octaves, and its case was rough and unpolished. The legs were square—in the kitchen-table style—and the sound was simply a horrible twang. If you had lived in Queen Elizabeth's time you would have been still worse off. She had only what was called a "virginal." And it was merely a box of strings on four legs. Yet it was the best Queen Elizabeth had. It has taken hundreds of years and thousands of experiments to make the piano.

I wonder if you think it's very hard to learn piano playing, and that practicing is very dull work? Well, other girls have thought so before you; but you must remember how many hundreds of men have worked hard and got tired to give you the piano. And then, when you get very tired, just remember that one of those poor little fellows inside gets a bump on the head every time you touch a note. To be sure, they have good leather caps on their heads, and, to tell the truth, I don't suppose they care a bit.

TRESPASSES AGAINST ETIQUETTE.

ALMOST every magazine or journal that one takes up contains some one's views, more or less lengthily expressed, upon etiquette and social observances. I know of no topic, outside of time-honored religion and politics, that is more frequently discussed. The code that governs our drawing-rooms is contrasted with those of France and England, and we are alternately praised and censured. Young girls are ridiculed for dressing like their mothers and married sisters, and young gentlemen are admonished to emulate Frenchmen in attention and deference to their elders. Point after point of etiquette is taken up, and the "bad habits of good society" are dilated upon; but with what result? So far as I can judge, very slight, if any, impression is made by the long newspaper columns devoted to the topic, and we might almost decide that society says,

> "Writers may come and writers may go,
> But I go on forever,

in the way that I likes best."

And now in what points of etiquette are we most lacking? In what slight observances do we most frequently fail?

"In none, for my part," is the prompt inward response of a petted young belle of one season.

Do not be too confident, my dear. Let me scrutinize every movement, and weigh each sparkling word that falls, like the diamonds in the fairy tale, from your rose-bud lips, and I much fear that I shall detect something amiss—some trifle, the result of thoughtlessness, perhaps; but still a young girl so pretty and charming as you should be perfection in every respect, and especially in style and etiquette.

I shall now imagine you in a drawing-room, where a dozen intimate friends are assembled to pass a social evening sans façon. This style of entertainment does not, however, in the least presuppose sans façon manners, although it is possible that, unrestrained by the presence of a large assembly, you may carelessly commit several of those little blunders to which I have alluded.

For instance, a young gentleman enters whom you know very well. You are glad to see him, and greet him as he passes on his way to his hostess. He stops to chat a moment, both of you perhaps, quite unconscious that you are guilty of a gross rudeness—he for speaking to any other lady before saluting his hostess, you for usurping the position of the lady of the house by bidding one of her guests welcome before she has done so. I hope that you are not so lacking in good taste as a friend of mine (whose parents, nevertheless, move in the highest intellectual circles of New York), and who, in my house, has often stepped to the door of the salon, and intercepting my guests on their way to me, received them herself.

It is in Paris that the breeding of our American girls appears to the most striking disadvantage. I have often smiled to see the astonishment of French matrons at their perfectly unconscious breaches of etiquette. The most amusing contretemps took place at the receptions of Madame C——, a very aristocratic Englishwoman, brought up from girlhood in Paris, and married to a French diplomat of high standing. Her salons were always filled with the cleverest of French talent—musicians, dramatists, actresses, and the last sweet thing in prodigies, blending harmoniously through Madame C——'s rare tact, with some members of the clergy, violent "Reds," and the noblesse of the old and new régimes. Americans had rarely entered her salons, but a few bearing warm letters of commendation were invited to her Friday evenings. I watched once, not without amusement, the ennui of a young New York girl, beautiful as only an American can be, and evidently accustomed to adulation. Madame C—— was thoroughly French in her mode of receiving, and the young gentlemen conversed together in a sort of distant exile near the door, or made their way unintroduced to the side of some married lady. Meantime the young girls were being entertained by the married gentlemen; and very charming the French Benedicts are. I never found any ennui in their society. However, my young belle, whom I will call Loulou, soon commenced to weary of the society of the Chevalier X—— (a very gifted and intellectual man, by-the-way), and tapping her hostess unceremoniously with her fan, said, in English, "Dear Madame C——, I am so tired of talking to married men; do introduce me to some of those handsome young gentlemen near the piano, will you not?"

For a moment Madame C—— looked aghast, then answered, with dignity, "You ask of me an impossibility, my dear. I have two sons of my own to marry," she added, lightly, as if to turn the rebuff into a jest. "I am not looking for wives for those other young men, so I could not think of interfering with the prospects of my own family."

With an air of disappointment, Loulou returned to the society of her chevalier; but in a few moments her face lit up with smiles, as a young Englishman, whom she knew very well, entered the room. Without reflection, she crossed the salon, greeted him cordially, and seating herself, chatted gayly for the remainder of the evening.

This action did not pass unnoticed by Madame C——, and the next time that I saw her she commented upon it severely. "Do tell me how your American girls are brought up," she said; "to me they are an enigma. Not long ago, at one of my Friday evenings, I observed Miss Lina D—— cross the salon alone, and help herself to the contents of the cake-basket, which had already been twice passed about." Then relating Loulou's little escapade, she continued, "Truly the etiquette of your country is strange. Of this, however, I am very confident. Mesdemoiselles Lina and Loulou have made their last appearance in my salons."

"But let me assure you, dear Madame C——," I said, apologetically, "that it was mere thoughtlessness on the part of those young girls. They are accustomed at home to the constant society of young gentlemen, and perhaps did not know the rules of French etiquette. I can assure you that they are ladies by birth and education. Loulou is the daughter of a prominent intellectual man in New York—a man eminent for reforming ideas."

My excuses were quite thrown away upon Madame C——. "It is a pity," she remarked, dryly, "that Mr. —— did not commence his reformation with his own family."

But it is not only ladies who fail in etiquette; gentlemen have quite a varied list of peccadilloes of which to repent. I will leave to their own consciences the number of times that they have saluted some charming young lady before noticing their hostess, and give a glance at their conduct while in a drawing-room.

You take a seat—yes, as I expected, you select the easiest arm-chair available. Are our American young men so sickly or effeminate that they require easy-chairs, or is it merely a habit? I hope the latter; but if so, it is one which they should correct. It is quite a common occurrence in good society to see young girls sitting upon stiff-backed chairs, and gentlemen occupying arm-chairs or sofas. And then their position in them is not sans reproche. Now lolling upon a sofa, not without danger to its delicate shade from contact with their ambrosial locks; now spread out in a daintily embroidered low chair of very fragile make, which they balance upon its back legs, regardless of consequences. I only wish that they would pay my upholsterer's bills for repairs occasioned by their carelessness. It is really refreshing to see a foreigner enter a drawing-room, deliberately choose the stiffest-backed chair at hand, and sit in it as erect as though in a cavalry parade. To see a man who has some backbone, says M——, is an agreeable novelty.

I have often met in society a young gentleman who is in personal appearance an Adonis, of very good family, well-educated, and the best partner in the German. In conversation he is most agreeable, and he is not without some pretensions to literary merit. An admirable Crichton, you will think. In all respects save one—when any thing strikes his sense of humor he explodes (no other word can describe it) into a burst of laughter that could be heard I fear to say how far, and that only resembles the laughter I have heard in country bar-rooms. This trait, I think, unfits Adonis for a lady's drawing-room.

One last word to my own sex. Young ladies often take their card-cases to parties, that they may give their addresses to any agreeable young gentleman to whom they are introduced. The propriety of such an action—the gentleman being entirely unknown to their parents—is a matter of taste. I will merely mention the effect it once produced at my own house. A young Englishman came to me at an evening reception, saying that he was much embarrassed, having just received an invitation from a young lady, whom he had met for the first time, to call upon her. "You know I am a stranger here," he said, "and do not know your customs; but in England such a thing is unheard of; invitations are extended only by the parents." I told him that the young lady was not acting in opposition to New York customs, although it was by no means the way that I had been brought up. My excuses were ineffectual; he never called upon her.

THE FACT-MONGER.

I AM about to warn the public of the existence among us of a species of mental garroter who walks at large ready to throttle us conversationally, to rob us of our opportunities, and by whom the unsuspecting might be choked off at any moment but for this timely note of warning, which may, perhaps, put them on their guard.

This being is the Fact-monger, who, in consequence of a life spent in the accumulation of disjointed matter, has become what Dr. Maudesley calls "a mere sense machine" for registering observations, which he pours out upon one at the first chance, tripping one up with an anecdote, strangling another with a fact, and murdering every body's enjoyment whenever a glimpse is caught of his sharp, peering face, or the sound is heard of his penetrating voice, laden as it always is with unnecessary information, which we struggle against as being as unwholesome for the human intelligence as overfeeding is for the stomach. Against being interrupted in our own ideas, and crammed with pointless facts, we would utter an indignant protest, appealing, if necessary, to Mr. Bergh, who will permit no animal to suffer unjustly.

The Fact-monger knows every thing, which is one good reason for hating him, and he seldom knows it correctly, which is a still better cause for complaint, being always in such a desperate hurry to disgorge any bit of knowledge which he has imbibed that he never waits to see whether he has got the matter straight or not.

A passion for exaggeration possesses him. To tell a bit of news is his hobby, and he is sure to present it in the most sensational form. He will ring up your household at midnight to rehearse a Herald poster, will give you all the frightful details of the last harrowing murder, or will scream under your windows, rousing you from your first slumbers, that Boston is burned to a cinder, and that not one soul is left to tell how the fire originated, taking the imaginative sketches of the newsboys for solid information. Indeed, he would take genuine satisfaction in informing you of the death of your nearest relation if he only believed that you had not heard of it before.

The Fact-monger has always that most objectionable of qualities—an instructive manner. His information is imparted with an off-hand air that implies that the Eleusinian mysteries are old stories to him, though you probably never heard of them before. If he alludes to Athens, he adds "the capital of Greece, you know," and never mentions the Vatican without explaining that it is the home of the Pope.

However ignorant and uninformed one may be, there is a certain subtle flattery in being talked to as if you might possibly know a thing or two yourself, which is very soothing to the sensitive soul; but such weak truckling to human vanity the Fact-monger disdains. It is always the part of pedagogue that he performs; and if he questions, it is merely to elicit your ignorance, and to find some point on which he knows a trifle more than you do. A trifle, say I? rather he is always on the look-out for an opportunity to furnish you with a dissertation.

Another way in which he contrives to render life intolerable is by pouncing upon you just at the critical point of your best story, when you are fondly hoping to be rewarded for having narrated it with spirit by an approving peal of laughter from the company. Arresting the burst at its outset, he rushes to the front, saying, "Stop a moment; you were all wrong, you know: the wall the man climbed was not eight feet high, but seven and a half, to be exact; and the woman's dress was not black, but invisible green; besides, the grocer's name was Smith, and not Jones, and it didn't happen in Twenty-second Street, but in Thirty-first." At such moments you feel that coffee and pistols for two would alone be a comfort to you.

He is always determined to know a little more than any body else on any given subject. If there is any one idea that you have purposely kept back, any portion of a narration that you have designedly thrown into shadow, it is his perfect delight to supplement your relation with that fact, and to coolly destroy all your fine aerial effects. Indeed, the great lack in his nature is a want of moral perspective, and every thing looks of the same size to him.

He is always being taken in by the hoaxes that go the rounds of the press, for it never occurs to him to reflect upon an incident, to discuss its probability, to consider its bearings. He imagines a diamond in every clod he picks up, and never stops to test his nugget before proclaiming its possession to the world; consequently, when carefully sifted, his treasure proves but a sham and a delusion. Exposure in his case, however, never prevents a recurrence of the same credulity, and the mare's-nests that he finds are innumerable.

Indeed, a close examination leads us to believe that the pernicious habit of fact-devouring really affects the brain and deprives it of all power of assimilation. The mind under this process becomes a perfect sieve, the holes for information to run out of growing larger in proportion as more facts are poured in. In an intelligence thus affected knowledge no longer serves as a fertilizer to develop the seeds of character and thought, but simply percolates through a sandy soil, leaving it as dry and barren as before. Should you seek here a crop of ideas, you will find nothing but a few unsightly weeds, while loose facts lie around like stones upon the surface —a pure accumulation of undigested information.

Another peculiarity of the Fact-monger is that he never gets what he knows from original sources, but prefers to receive it through the medium of another mind. He revels in newspapers, but turns his back on archives as fusty and undesirable reading. He is not even valuable to be used like an old file, for the events of last year have sifted through his intelligence and left not a wreck behind, and he is even a little misty about the things he told you a month ago. He cares for nothing but what can be caught flying. The patient delving after truth characteristic of the earnest worker is abhorrent to his soul. The fact itself has nothing to do with his researches: what he desires is simply an item to communicate.

Indeed, we have heard him aptly likened to that traveler who, too lazy to seek the great springs which lie back from the highway, slakes his thirst instead from every puddle by the roadside, and then splashes the passers-by.

The Fact-monger is the bête noire of the man of ideas. His self-confidence, his arrogance, his impatience of contradiction, his passion for setting one right on every subject and having the last word in every argument, utterly distract the reflective mind which has learned that conclusions are apt to be fallacious, and that there are few topics on which something more may not be said.

The genus bore is divided into many species, which, like weeds, flourish best under high cultivation. What "pusley" is to the distressed "summerer in a garden," the Fact-monger becomes to the student and thinker. He is omnipresent, all-devouring, ready to fatten on the best, and yet good for nothing. You pull him up at one point only to see him crop out at another, pervading every walk, and hampering the desired growth on all sides. Helpless, useless, and obtrusive as he is, what shall be done with him?

CARNATIONS AND PINKS.

THESE flowers have been universal favorites in our gardens for time out of mind, and being of comparatively easy cultivation, and readily crossing, hybridizing, and breaking into varieties, have always been objects of special care and cultivation among gardeners and florists. So numerous have the varieties become that the catalogues of some of the European cultivators who make their cultivation a specialty contain the names of over 2000 varieties. As they have become so crossed with each other, it is somewhat difficult to classify them; yet it is necessary to attempt it, in order that cultivators may be able to make suitable selections from the catalogues, in which great confusion in regard to them exists. We shall follow the French florists, who have divided them into the following classes:

Grenadin (pomegranate) or ratafia pinks, so called because they are used to color and aromatize liqueurs. They have red or rose-colored flowers, with toothed or fringed petals, and are generally very fragrant. They are not much cultivated except for the above purposes and for perfumery. The flowers are generally single, although there are double varieties; these last will exist many years, and when cultivated in pots, and protected in frames or a cool greenhouse, become almost woody. The single ones are raised from seed, and treated as biennials when grown out-of-doors.

Picotees, fancy pinks, and German pinks are the various names given to a class of carnations. The petals of the flowers are generally indented or toothed, but sometimes they are entire. They are free flowering; the flowers are very double, often more so than those of the carnation; the combinations of colors are very remarkable and often bizarre. The French divide them into three classes, viz., those with a white ground color, or English picotees; those with a yellow ground; and those with a slate-colored ground, or German picotees. Sometimes the flowers will be self-colored, but most generally the petals are edged with some other color, which breaks into the ground color in feathers, stripes, spots, lines, and splashes. These colors are of very numerous shades, comprising all shades of red from flesh-color to carmine and vermilion; violet to purple, lees of wine, chestnut, slate, amaranth, dawn-color, and chamois. Again, the ground color will be washed or flamed with one or more of these shades; so that no other flower presents such a remarkable variety of colors.

The seeds produce a large proportion of double flowers, which are generally more double than carnations.

These last are sometimes called Flemish pinks. They have the petals entirely smooth on the edges, and regular, like a cockade. Florists require that the ground color should be pure white, and that the stripes should run continuously from the centre of the flower to the outer edge of the petals, and be sharply defined, without any feathering or breaking of the edges. These stripes or ribbons of color are as various as those of the picotee; sometimes the stripes are all of one color, but generally there are two, sometimes three, and more rarely four. They are not as robust in growth as the picotee, and the seeds do not often produce perfectly shaped and perfectly marked flowers, even when gathered from prize flowers.

Remontant, or perpetual flowering, carnations are those that bloom not only in the summer season, but also during the winter, when placed in the greenhouse; they comprise both picotees and carnations. They are very beautiful, but are not equal to the summer-blooming varieties in variety of color and symmetry of form. In some parts of France they have a class of ever-blooming carnations called Mahony pinks, that have long, straight, glaucous foliage, and are almost arborescent. The petals are fringed or dentated, and the flowers are self-colored in white and shades of red. Besides these there is also an arborescent form of the true carnation which grows very strongly, with hard, woody stem, requiring to be trained on small frames or trellises four or more feet high. The flowers are very large and double, generally striped with scarlet or crimson on a white ground.

The name of Verviers or Verviétois pinks is given to a race of dwarf carnations. The flower stems are of feeble dimensions, and rarely elevate themselves above the leafy branches of the plant. They are not readily raised from seeds, and are therefore generally propagated by layers or cuttings. They are very desirable for pot culture in window gardening, and are largely grown for this purpose in many parts of England and Belgium.

Lap-dog or ladies' pinks is the name given to a section which contains a small number of varieties remarkable for their delicate colors. They are much more fragrant than the other varieties; the ground color is generally white, washed or painted on the upper side of the petals, or through their centre, with some light shade of color; the petals are sometimes dentated and sometimes entire. There are also ever-blooming varieties of this class. Another class, resembling these, is called by the French sanded pinks, because the secondary color, instead of being washed on the ground color, is thrown out in such a way as to make the flowers appear powdered or dotted with it.

Mignardise, English, Scotch, Paisley, and laced pinks are the various names given to our common garden pinks, of which the pheasant eye is a familiar example. The petals of the flowers are almost always fringed or fimbriated; the ground color is generally white or rose-colored; sometimes, but rarely, they are self-colored; the centre of the flower is banded with shades of crimson, cherry, purple, or brown-black, and sometimes there is a band of color on the edges of the petals.

Hybrids, such as the variety found in the catalogues under the name of Anna Boleyn, have been raised by crossing them with picotees, by which means the habit of growth of the picotee has been given them, while retaining in the flower nearly all the characteristics of the pink. Some of the varieties, such as optima and Laura Wilmer, bloom freely in the greenhouse during winter, when taken up in the fall and potted.

Flon pinks, May pinks, St. John's pink, and mule pinks are the names given to a class that is the result of hybridizing and crossing several other classes, and in which some of the characters of Dianthus hispanicus and D. sinensis are evident. They bloom all the year round, and are admirably adapted for greenhouse cultivation. The flowers are double, of medium size, and generally white, rose-color, or crimson, sometimes striped or spotted with deeper shades. The well-known Sarah Howard pink is an example of this class. The seeds produce but a small number of double-flowering plants; hence they are generally grown from cuttings.

When grown out-of-doors all of the above will do well in any good friable loamy soil, moderately enriched with well-rotted manure; cow manure appears to suit them best. When grown in pots they should have a well-rotted turfy soil, mixed with about one-third or one-fourth of well-rotted manure. They are very impatient of fresh manure and wet soil. Carnations and picotees, when not intended for winter blooming, should be potted, and kept over winter in cold frames, which should be protected from severe frosts, and well aired on bright sunny days. Many varieties of English pinks are better grown in this way, as some of them are rather tender out-of-doors, suffering from wet during the winter. All may be planted out-of-doors in the month of April, when they bloom in July. All may be grown from cuttings when they have done blooming; they require to be kept under glass, and well watered; they root in about three weeks, and should then be potted off in fresh loam, without manure, in small pots, be kept slightly shaded for a few days, and as they establish themselves and fill the pot with roots, should be shifted into the next larger size. When grown in the greenhouse, cuttings may be made from October to March. This is the best time for the monthly carnations.

Carnations and picotees are also propagated by layers, which should be done when they have done blooming out-of-doors. A slanting cut with a sharp penknife should be made just below the third or fourth joint of the shoot, nearly half-way through; the incision should be continued about half an inch above the joint. The shoot should then be inserted in the ground, pegged down to hold it in its place; if the operation is properly done it will be rooted by the middle or end of September, when it should be taken up and potted. It will bloom the next season.

ODD PAINS AND PENALTIES.

THE fool's cap is obsolete; at least it is to be hoped so; for whatever we may think about the infliction of physical pain as a punishment (and to the majority of those who have the management of boys laid upon them it appears not only legitimate but beneficial), there can be little doubt that it is a mistake to employ ridicule for educational purposes. What, for example, could be more injudicious than the discipline of a lady who kept a first-class girls' school some ten years ago, and made her untidy pupils carry their boots slung round their necks when they went out?

Public shame is not reformatory, it only hardens. The child who was often advertised as a fool would soon accept the position, and act up to the character. It is the same with criminals: if you were to brand a thief on the forehead, a thief he must remain till the end of the chapter.

I am speaking, of course, of our own age and country; for upon no subject is it so rash to dogmatize as upon punishment. In the case of people who are degraded, so far as their finer feelings are concerned, by tyrannical institutions, an amount of exposure and obloquy which would ruin the moral sense of a freeman forever may merely rouse a wholesome sense of shame. All depends upon the thickness of the skin; the turpentine blister which would flay a man, only acts as a gentle irritant upon a bullock.

Yet it is not so very long ago since punishments which were principally calculated to hold the offender up to ridicule were so rife in England that one might almost suspect that they were intended to amuse the people, in the days when there were no comic periodicals, rather than to deter from the offense. For instance, few villages were without their cucking-stools, or ducking-stools, for scolds, one hundred and fifty years ago. Nay, the Chelmsford Chronicle for April 10, 1801, contains the following paragraph:

"Last week a woman notorious for her vociferation was indicted for a common scold at Kingston; and the facts being fully proved, she was sentenced to receive the old punishment of being ducked, which was accordingly executed upon her in the Thames by the proper officers, in a chair preserved in the town for that purpose; and as if to prove the justice of the court's sentence, on her return from the water's side she fell upon one of her acquaintance, without provocation, with tongue, tooth, and nail."

The drunkard's cloak was a barrel with holes in the top and sides, through which the intemperate man's head and arms were passed, and in this helpless condition he was obliged to walk through the streets of the town, the sport of the idle boys. The Chinese have a similar punishment.

A seat in the stocks can not have been pleasant for a proud and retiring disposition; but apart from the moral element, the severity of the punishment must have varied somewhat unduly with the time of year. On a fine but cloudy July day a philosophic culprit who had no personal enemies in his village might have borne his sentence with considerable equanimity, solacing himself, perchance, by watching the fluctuations of a cricket match in progress on the green; while in a frosty February, with a keen northeast wind blowing, Riccabocca himself would have found the hour of his release a weary while in striking.

To stand in the pillory must have been an exceedingly humiliating as well as exasperating punishment. A man could not well be placed in a more ludicrous position than with his head and hands protruding through holes exactly fitting them, and his body hid away behind the planking. Flies might wander about his nose and ears; gnats might sting him without his being able to drive them off, save perchance by a hideous grimace, which would only dislodge the tormentors for an instant, while it added considerably to the grotesque absurdity of the culprit's appearance.

The severity of this punishment, as well as of the stocks, was, of course, dependent upon the amount of popular indignation excited by the offense. When this ran high, the wretched man's unprotected face was in the position of a live and sentient Aunt Sally's, an object for every description of missile; while in such a case as De Foe's, where sympathy was on the side of the sufferer, "public exposure became a public ovation."

When a Cairo merchant is detected in using false weights and measures, or in adulterating his goods, he is placed against his own doorpost, standing on tiptoe, and nailed by the ear to the wood-work. It is important that he should get free without amputating the member, for that is the penalty for theft; and probably the smart tradesman would be horrified at having his little tricks confounded with vulgar inartistic stealing. For a second offense the thief loses his other ear; for a third, his nose. By-the-bye, perhaps I am wrong to use the present tense, for these penalties may be obsolete at the present day. They may have a model jail and a reformatory at Cairo by this time.

Naval and military punishments seem to have been very generally framed with the idea of rendering the offender ridiculous in the eyes of his comrades. Picketing was one of these; a man was so suspended by his wrists that his heel rested on a wooden peg driven into the ground. Riding the wooden horse was another; the back of this penal steed was very narrow, and weights attached to the rider's legs rendered his seat all the more painful. These punishments were not only humiliating and extremely severe, but they too often inflicted permanent injury on the sufferers, on which latter account they were abolished, and for many years the cat-o'-nine-tails ruled supreme; though the use of that instrument of torture was carried to an extent which excited dread and sympathy, instead of mirth.

The practice of stopping a sailor's grog for minor offenses seems a funny punishment for grown men; it sounds so much like depriving a naughty child of its pudding.

The question of military punishments is by no means so simple a one as many people seem to suppose. At home, and in time of peace, indeed, fine and imprisonment will suffice to preserve discipline; but how can you imprison men during a campaign? It is a serious thing to have a swarm of armed men wandering about a country, and the lives and property of the civil population, even when hostile, must be protected by some rough-and-ready means. If you do not flog insubordinate or plundering soldiers in the field, you must put them to death. It is very barbarous; but every thing connected with war must be shocking to humanitarian feelings. However, though severity is a sad necessity, there is no need to mix up mockery with it, for that is wanton cruelty.

The institutions of riding the rail, an evident imitation of the wooden horse mentioned above, and tarring and feathering, show that the old admixture of cruelty and humor has not yet worked out of the Anglo-Saxon constitution. It must be owned that the man who invented the latter penalty was very ingenious; one wonders how the idea ever came into his head.

Really, it is very shocking to have such a feeling, I own, but supposing one disliked some person very much, and despised him to boot, would one be able to help laughing if one saw him all over feathers, like a Cochin China fowl?

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

FROM "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS."

THERE is no sense of ease like the ease we felt in those scenes where we were born, where objects became dear to us before we had known the labor of choice, and where the outer world seemed only an extension of our own personality: we accepted and loved it as we accepted our own sense of existence and our own limbs. Very commonplace, even ugly, that furniture of our early home might look if it were put up to auction; an improved taste in upholstery scorns it; and is not the striving after something better and better in our surroundings the grand characteristic that distinguishes man from the brute —or, to satisfy a scrupulous accuracy of definition, that distinguishes the British man from the foreign brute? But Heaven knows where that striving might lead us, if our affections had not a trick of twining round those old inferior things —if the loves and sanctities of our life had no deep immovable roots in memory. One's delight in an elderberry bush overhanging the confused leafage of a hedge-row bank, as a more gladdening sight than the finest cistus or fuchsia spreading itself on the softest undulating turf, is an entirely unjustifiable preference to a nursery-gardener, or to any of those severely regulated minds who are free from the weakness of any attachment that does not rest on a demonstrable superiority of qualities. And there is no better reason for preferring this elderberry bush than that it stirs an early memory—that it is no novelty in my life, speaking to me merely through my present sensibilities to form and color, but the long companion of my existence, that wove itself into my joys when joys were vivid.

If people are to quarrel often, it follows as a corollary that their quarrels can not be protracted beyond certain limits.

The feeblest member of a family—the one who has the least character—is often the merest epitome of the family habits and traditions.

We perhaps never detect how much of our social demeanor is made up of artificial airs until we see a person who is at once beautiful and simple: without the beauty, we are apt to call simplicity awkwardness.

It is a wonderful subduer, this need of love—this hunger of the heart—as peremptory as that other hunger by which Nature forces us to submit to the yoke, and change the face of the world.

Secrets are rarely betrayed or discovered according to any programme our fear has sketched out. Fear is almost always haunted by terrible dramatic scenes, which recur in spite of the best-argued probabilities against them.....Those slight indirect suggestions which are dependent on apparently trivial coincidences and incalculable states of mind are the favorite machinery of Fact, but are not the stuff in which imagination is apt to work.

There is a chill air surrounding those who are down in the world, and people are glad to get away from them, as from a cold room.

Confidences are sometimes blinding, even when they are sincere.

There is no feeling, perhaps, except the extremes of fear and grief, that does not find relief in music—that does not make a man sing or play the better.

A TRIP IN THE AUSTRIAN TYROL.

AMONG THE DOLOMITES IN THE AUSTRIAN TYROL.

AT this holiday season we illustrate some of the principal features of the Austrian Tyrol for the benefit of American tourists abroad. Let us make Botzen our head-quarters. Botzen is a town of some 12,000 inhabitants, on the Brenner line, about midway between Innsbrück and Verona; but, excepting a fine church with a quaint old portico and an elegant open-work tower, and an inferior hotel, has no peculiar charm of its own to attract the tourist. It is, however, the best starting-place to visit the picturesque Dolomite rocks, which derive their name from the geologist Dolomieu, and embrace a considerable tract of country in the South Tyrol. Dispensing, therefore, with all superfluous luggage, and knapsack on shoulder, the tourist should take train to Neumarkt—an uninteresting Austro-Italian town, with streams running through the streets, and houses with huge projecting eaves. Here he can take the quaint old post-wagon, with sleepy horses and a still sleepier coachman, to Cavalese, where, after passing through the valley of the Adige, and climbing over interminable mountains, whence magnificent views are obtained, he arrives in safety. Cavalese is situated in the Fiemme Valley, and is the summer resort of the Adige population, the principal building being an ancient palace of the bishops of Trent, now used as a prison. Here the Italian patois is usually spoken, though German is known by some of the better-to-do people. From Cavalese to Predazzo is about a three hours' walk, during which the pretty village of Tesero is passed, and then the Dolomites burst upon the traveler in all their grandeur. At Predazzo there is a capital hotel—the Nave, or Ship—where the visitors' book contains the autographs of many men of science, this district being an excellent field for the mineralogist. At Predazzo the road diverges into two branches, one of which leads to Primiero. On the way there lies the Cimon della Pala (11,000 feet high), a capital view of which is obtained in the Costonzella Pass, about halfway, and which should by no means be missed. This rocky pinnacle is grander than the Matterhorn; but even here a party of English ladies have made the ascent, and their hints may be read in the Nave's visitors' book already mentioned. From Predazzo a rumbling, tumbling, old post-wagon takes you to Vigo, through the lovely Fassa Valley, of which it is the principal village, via Moena, from whence to Vigo the roads are atrociously bad. "Any thing more wonderful than the Dolomites," writes our artist respecting this part of his trip, "it is difficult to imagine. Picture a lovely valley, dotted with villages and a stream, hemmed in by pine-clad mountains topped by snow plateaus, and looked down upon by huge pinnacles of red rock, too steep for snow to lie except here and there. Italian is spoken every where," he continues, "and the people are very frank, and not inclined to extortion, the living being cheap and tolerably good." From Vigo round again back to Botzen the walk over the Caressa Pass displays magnificent scenery. Behind are the Dolomites of the Fassa Valley and the lofty Sella Pass, with the Sella Spitz in our engraving, while in front is the whole chain of the Ortho. "At Vigo (where, by-the-bye, a very comfortable bed can be obtained at Rizzi's Hotel) the people were anxious to make me ride," says our artist, "but luckily I walked. At any time the path is dangerous for horsemen, but when crossed somewhat early in the year—that being the time when I was there—large portions of the road had been washed away by snow, wind, and torrents. No one, however, visiting the Tyrol should miss seeing this valley."

FULL-DRESS TOILETTE.

THIS unique toilette for a ball or dinner is of creamy white faille, trimmed with Persian embroidery and black Chantilly lace. The demi-train has a puff behind and a kilt-pleated flounce, on which are embroidered tabs edged with black lace. There is no over-skirt, but a tablier is simulated by three lengthwise garlands of gay-colored Persian needle-work, representing scarlet and salmon-tinted roses, with blue convolvuli and brown foliage; a lace flounce surrounds the garlands, and trims an embroidered sash-band that holds up the panier puff. Josephine waist with a high ruff of black lace and white crêpe lisse. Puffed sleeves, separated by lace ruches and finished with a flounce at the elbow. Corsage bouquet of blue, red, and yellow flowers; a similar cluster in the hair, with two white ostrich tips.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL UNDER NIAGARA FALLS.

AN interesting account of Professor Tyndall's visit to the Falls of Niagara on the first of last November has just been published in the papers of the Royal Institution of London. We extract his description of his adventurous descent under the great Horseshoe Fall to a point where no traveler had ever before penetrated. He says:

"On the first evening of my visit I met, at the head of Biddle's Stair, the guide to the Cave of the Winds. He was in the prime of manhood—large, well-built, firm and pleasant in mouth and eye. My interest in the scene stirred up his, and made him communicative. Turning to a photograph, he described, by reference to it, a feat which he had accomplished some time previously, and which had brought him almost under the green water of the Horseshoe Fall. 'Can you lead me there to-morrow?' I asked. He eyed me inquiringly, weighing, perhaps, the chances of a man of light build and with gray in his whiskers in such an undertaking. 'I wish,' I added, 'to see as much of the fall as can be seen, and where you lead I will endeavor to follow.' His scrutiny relaxed into a smile, and he said, 'Very well; I shall be ready for you to-morrow.'

"On the morrow, accordingly, I came. In the hut at the head of Biddle's Stair I re-dressed according to instruction, drawing on two pairs of woolen pantaloons, three woolen jackets, two pairs of socks, and a pair of felt shoes. Even if wet, my guide urged that the clothes would keep me from being chilled; and he was right. A suit and hood of yellow oil-cloth covered all. Most laudable precautions were taken by the young assistant of the guide to keep the water out; but his devices broke down immediately when severely tested.

"We descended the stair, the handle of a pitchfork doing, in my case, the duty of an alpenstock. At the bottom my guide inquired whether we should go first to the Cave of the Winds or to the Horseshoe, remarking that the latter would try us most. I decided to get the roughest done first, and he turned to the left over the stones. They were sharp and trying. The base of the first portion of the cataract is covered with huge boulders, obviously the ruins of the limestone ledge above. The water does not distribute itself uniformly among these, but seeks for itself channels, through which it pours torrentially. We passed some of these with wetted feet, but without difficulty. At length we came to the side of a more formidable current. My guide walked along its edge until he reached its least turbulent portion. Halting, he said, 'This is our greatest difficulty. If we can cross here, we shall get far toward the Horseshoe.'

"He waded in. It evidently required all his strength to steady him. The water rose above his loins, and it foamed still higher. He had to search for footing amidst unseen boulders, against which the torrent rose violently. He struggled and swayed, but he struggled successfully, and finally reached the shallower water at the other side. Stretching out his arm, he said to me, 'Now come on.' I looked down the torrent as it rushed to the river below, which was seething with the tumult of the cataract. De Saussure recommended the inspection of Alpine dangers with the view of making them familiar to the eye before they are encountered; and it is a wholesome custom in places of difficulty to put the possibility of an accident clearly before the mind, and decide beforehand what ought to be done should the accident occur. Thus wound up in the present instance, I entered the water. Even where it was not more than knee-deep its power was manifest. As it rose around me I sought to split the torrent by presenting a side to it; but the insecurity of the footing enabled it to grasp the loins, twist me fairly round, and bring its impetus to bear upon the back. Further struggle was impossible, and feeling my balance hopelessly gone, I turned, flung myself toward the bank I had just quitted, and was instantly swept into shallower water. The oil-cloth covering was a great incumbrance. It had been made for a much stouter man, and standing upright after my submersion, my legs occupied the centres of two bags of water. My guide exhorted me to try again. Prudence was at my elbow, whispering dissuasion; but taking every thing into account, it appeared more immoral to retreat than to proceed. Instructed by the first misadventure, I once more entered the stream. Had the alpenstock been of iron, it might have helped me; but as it was, the tendency of the water to sweep it out of my hands rendered it worse than useless. I, however, clung to it by habit. Again the torrent rose, and again I wavered; but by keeping the left hip well against it, I remained upright, and at length grasped the hand of my leader at the other side. He laughed pleasantly. The first victory was gained, and he enjoyed it. 'No traveler,' he said, 'was ever here before.' Soon afterward, by trusting to a piece of drift-wood which seemed firm, I was again taken off my feet, but was immediately caught by a protruding rock.

"We clambered over the boulders toward the thickest spray, which soon became so weighty as to cause us to stagger under its shock. For the most part nothing could be seen. We were in the midst of bewildering tumult, lashed by the water, which sounded at times like the cracking of innumerable whips. Underneath this was the deep, resonant roar of the cataract. I tried to shield my eyes with my hands and look upward; but the defense was useless. My guide continued to move on; but at a certain place he halted, and desired me to shelter in his lee and observe the cataract. The spray did not come so much from the upper ledge as from the rebound of the scattered water when it struck the bottom. Hence the eyes could be protected from the blinding shock of the spray, while the line of vision to the upper ledges remained to some extent clear. On looking upward over the guide's shoulder I could see the water bending over the ledge, while the Terrapin Tower loomed fitfully through the intermittent spray gusts. We were right under the tower. A little farther on the cataract, after its first plunge, hit a protuberance some way down, and flew from it in a prodigious burst of spray. Through this we staggered. We rounded the promontory on which the Terrapin Tower stands, and pushed, amidst the wildest commotion, along the arm of the Horseshoe, until the boulders failed us, and the cataract fell into the profound gorge of the Niagara River.

"Here my guide sheltered me again, and desired me to look up. I did so, and could see, as before, the green gleam of the mighty curve sweeping over the upper ledge, and the fitful plunge of the water as the spray between us and it alternately gathered and disappeared. An eminent friend of mine often speaks to me of the mistake of those physicians who regard man's ailments as purely chemical, to be met by chemical remedies only. By agreeable emotions, he says, nervous currents are liberated which stimulate blood, brain, and viscera. A sanative effect of this order I experienced amidst the spray and thunder of Niagara. Quickened by the emotions there aroused, the blood sped exultingly through the arteries, abolishing introspection, clearing the heart of all bitterness, and enabling one to think with tolerance, if not with tenderness, on the most relentless and unreasonable foe. Apart from its scientific value, and purely as a moral agent, the play, I submit, is worth the candle. My companion knew no more of me than that I enjoyed the wildness; but as I bent in the shelter of his large frame he said, 'I should like to see you attempting to describe all this.' He rightly thought it indescribable. The name of this gallant fellow was Thomas Conroy.

"We returned, clambering at intervals up and down, so as to catch glimpses of the most impressive portions of the cataract. We passed under ledges formed by tabular masses of limestone, and through some curious openings formed by the falling together of the summits of the rocks. At length we found ourselves beside our enemy of the morning. My guide halted for a minute or two, scanning the torrent thoughtfully. I said that, as a guide, he ought to have a rope in such a place; but he retorted that, as no traveler had ever thought of coming there, he did not see the necessity of keeping a rope. He waded in. The struggle to keep himself erect was evident enough; he swayed, but recovered himself again and again. At length he slipped, gave way, did as I had done, threw himself flat in the water toward the bank, and was swept into the shallows. Standing in the stream near its edge, he stretched his arm toward me. I retained the pitchfork handle, for it had been useful among the boulders. By wading some way in, the staff could be made to reach him, and I proposed his seizing it. 'If you are sure,' he replied, 'that, in case of giving way, you can maintain your grasp, then I will certainly hold you.' I waded in, and stretched the staff to my companion. It was firmly grasped by both of us. Thus helped, though its onset was strong, I moved safely across the torrent. All danger ended here. We afterward roamed sociably among the torrents and boulders below the Cave of the Winds. The rocks were covered with organic slime, which could not have been walked over with bare feet, but the felt shoes effectually prevented slipping. We reached the cave and entered it, first by a wooden way carried over the boulders, and then along a narrow ledge to the point eaten deepest into the shale. When the wind is from the south, the falling water, I am told, can be seen tranquilly from this spot; but when we were there a blinding hurricane of spray was whirled against us. On the evening of the same day I went behind the water on the Canada side, which, I confess, struck me, after the experiences of the morning, as an imposture."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ROSE.—Submit sample of the English wash you name to your physician. Possibly taking sulphur vapor baths would keep your hair in its early golden tinge. Champagne will do no hurt, and may assist in keeping the color. Expose your hair to the sun as much as possible, wear it loose, and brush a great deal.

G. L. T.—A tight-fitting polonaise and flounced skirt is the best "stylish and semi-elaborate" style for making a violet silk. Put two gathered lapping ten-inch flounces around the skirt, headed by a puff with narrow ruffle on each side of the puff. If more trimming is preferred, put five lengthwise puffs down the three front breadths and three bias flounces on the back. Pale pearl-colored gloves will look best with a violet dress. Wear white lisse or lace ruff with lace jabot in front and coral or turquoise jewelry. The only ribbon necessary is a belt and sash of the color of the dress. Such sashes are worn with tight polonaises.

WILLIE S.—Get a redingote suit of green or violet water-proof cloth for your mountain trip. Have the skirt quite short, and wear a morocco belt with bag. The straw hat should be broad-brimmed and tied down at the sides.

MISS M. A.—The bride's veil should be put aside from her face immediately after the ceremony in church, and as she has no attendants, she must do this for herself. Perhaps it would be better to omit the short veil that is worn over the face, and have merely the long back drapery.

GREAT PERPLEXITY.—Braid your daughter's hair, pass it from side to side on the back of her head, and tie with ribbons. Muslins and other wash goods are far more appropriate than silks for young girls whether in villages or cities, yet there is no impropriety in their wearing silk.

AMATEUR.—Your silk skirt should be three and a half yards or perhaps three and three-fourth yards wide around the bottom. Two side gores with one full back breadth is the pattern most generally used for such skirts, but you can add an extra plain breadth behind if you choose. If you are stout, have a plain tight-fitting châtelaine polonaise; if you are slender, have a double-breasted jockey basque and over-skirt like that illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Trim the basque and over-skirt with a bias band of the same, or else have a fringe of jet edging these garments. A ruff of silk should be around the neck. The pattern of mantelet in Bazar No. 16, Vol. VI., is a pretty model for you. Double-breasted jackets will also be worn again.

IDA.—Read reply just given "Amateur." Use the lace for trimming the front of the basque, making it a ruff around the neck and in vest shape down the front. Do not edge the basque with lace, but with the merest piping of silk. Use the simple stylish under-skirt illustrated with the Double-breasted Jockey Basque in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI.

G. L. T.—High-crowned narrow-brimmed straw hats are worn by gentlemen this season. It is not in bad taste to bind them with dark blue and have a blue band.

F. H. H.—Get gray cashmere or Irish poplin for bride's traveling suit; make it by Blouse-Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., and trim with bias bands or piping of silk of a darker shade. Get pearl or else tea-rose colored silk, if it is for evening; if for the street, get plum-color or olive. Get light blue or ashes-of-roses merino for wrapper, and trim with bias velvet of same shade. The only white hats worn are of chip or fine English straw. Trim with silk to match the best suit; add wild roses and ostrich tips. Get black camel's-hair or else cashmere mantle. The linen duster should be made by pattern of water-proof cloak. The double-breasted polonaise pattern sent you is for your calico over dress.

CONSTANCE.—Lingerie is pronounced as if written lan-ge-ry.

AS BROAD AS CIVILIZATION.—The agent of the Wilson Sewing-Machine Company will, in a few days, sail from San Francisco for China and Japan, where he will establish large wholesale agencies for supplying the natives of the Orient with that consummate triumph of inventive skill, the Wilson Sewing-Machine. By this step the Wilson Company will complete the circuit of the globe. They have already immense agencies in England, France, and South America. Supreme in its superiority over all other sewing-machines, the Wilson goes on widening its field year after year, carrying the blessings of a cheap, capable, and perfect sewing-machine to the remotest haunts of civilization. THE RECORD OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN.

THE LIFE OF THE REV. ALFRED COOKMAN. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

An interesting specimen of religious biography. Alfred Cookman was, in his sphere, a remarkable man. Gifted with extraordinary eloquence, sincere and zealous in his calling, he attained a position in the Methodist Church second only to that of the great men through whom the denomination started into life and became a power in all Christian lands. His ruling desire, through the whole of his useful life, was to act the part of a faithful minister of the Gospel, to guide the erring, to comfort the afflicted, to console the sorrowing, to carry the light of truth into all the dark places of society. The record of such a life is worth preserving. As a Christian minister, the memory of Alfred Cookman is endeared to thousands. Dr. Ridgaway's biography is written in a tone of affectionate admiration, and we doubt not it will meet with a very cordial reception.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. Forney's Anecdotes OF PUBLIC MEN.

ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

The public relations of the author of this volume have brought him into intimate contact with many of the most eminent American politicians. He has collected some of his reminiscences during a long career, forming a series of anecdotes of more or less interest, and related in an unpretending, good-natured, free-and-easy manner, which can not fail to be attractive to the lovers of desultory reading.—N. Y. Tribune.

A gossipy, pleasant collection of reminiscences and anecdotes of men who have held prominence in public life, as politicians, statesmen, actors, or authors. Col. Forney's active life has brought him into contact with a great many eminent men, whom he appears to have observed keenly and closely. His book is very entertaining.—Boston Journal.

Among the many subjects of these chapters we noticed particularly the names of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, Adams, Buchanan, Douglas, Lincoln, Forrest, T. Buchanan Reed, Ritchie, and Sully the painter. No man is better fitted for a work of this kind than Mr. Forney, for he has been brought into intimate contact with all the celebrities of the present and past generation, and he wields a graphic pen and possesses almost unrivaled power at word-painting. His knowledge and experience as a public journalist have made him au fait with all the phases of political life, and many of his anecdotes disclose the secret springs by which great and decisive public movements were accomplished.—Boston Daily Globe.

Anecdotes are always palatable, and these are capitally told, and relate to the most prominent and interesting men in our political history, chiefly those of a generation since, whose names are household words. Col. Forney has been a looker-on from the Congressional galleries and a worker "inside politics" to some purpose, and in these capacities, and as clerk of the House and private secretary to President Buchanan, he has accumulated a store of reminiscences such as few men living could parallel. Jackson, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Van Buren, Buchanan, and hundreds of others, down to Grant, are the subjects of his stories, and the index is indeed almost a complete list of men prominent in Washington and Philadelphia for thirty odd years.—N. Y. Evening Mail.

The book is nearly as informal as an unstudied conversation; yet is rich in recollections of a large proportion of those who have shone in Washington political or social life during the last forty years.—Boston Transcript.

Just the kind of volume that Macaulay would gladly have utilized in the composition of his immortal History of England. It is a faithful representation of men, manners, customs in the stirring times of the anti-slavery struggle and of the Rebellion.—Christian Advocate, N. Y.

TRANSLATING.—A subscriber wrote to the editor of a Newark paper to ask the meaning of the phrase Mors omnibus communis. The editor said that it was a French sentence, intended to explain something about Morse's omnibus being of service to the community. IN THE LAUNDRY.

CLEAR muslin has much to do with making ladies charming, and it seems no more than fair that ladies should return the compliment. There is nothing distasteful in having to do with one's own muslins, in the way of starching and ironing. It is not nearly so unpleasant as painting in oils, nor so tiresome, to say nothing of taking photographs. It quite depends on the way ironing is done whether it is agreeable or not. Suppose in a city house a little hall room is taken for the ladies' ironing. A tiny gas stove heats those light nickel-plated irons which look like polished silver, and with their wooden handles weigh hardly two pounds. The gas stove costs $3 to $5, and the irons are $1 50 each. With window and door wide open, the heat will not be troublesome, even in summer. The irons can be kept out of the draught, so as not to lose their heat, which is one of the things that annoy servants in laundry-work. The ironing-board must have a slip cover, to be washed each fortnight, and besides there should be a large piece of thin cotton to lay over starched things to take the first pressure of the iron. This piece must be fine, for coarse cloth will leave the impress of its threads on nice fabrics. A breadth of an old jaconet skirt is best. A bowl of clear water, with a clean sponge, or soft brush, or worn white rags, must be ready for dampening spots that have dried since folding, or have not ironed smoothly. The table ought to be solid, without leaves, and a high chair should be provided, so that one may sit close to the board, touching it with the waist. It is just as convenient to iron sitting as standing, if one gets used to it, and most of the fatigue of ironing comes from standing long at a time. A housekeeper who knows how to be good to herself—as every woman ought to be—will have a table for ironing with one side hollowed out, like the cutting-boards which seamstresses use in their laps. It will be easy to sit up to such a table, and in a swivel chair that can be raised or lowered at will, the gas stove or furnace on one hand, the clothes-frame on the other, many a poor, tired woman would find her dreaded ironing day one of the easiest of the week. Truth to say, these conveniences are named not more to recommend housewifely exercise to idle people whose nerves are pining for it than in hopes that some overburdened working bee may be able to test the comfort of these helps. Those who have the most work to do generally have to do it in the hardest way. A good mistress will see that her servants have these conveniences, if they can be taught to use them. I confess that the pleasure of wearing fresh white muslin and crisp ruffled skirts is much alloyed by the thought how some gasping girl has toiled over them in a heated laundry or burning attic on a July day. A good husband whose wife is ever obliged to do the house-work with her own hands will not suffer her to go unprovided with every comfort that will lighten her toil. Hardly any thing is more injurious to a woman than being on her feet, standing, more than an hour at a time. Walking is not half so tiresome. Even soldiers, who can do the double-quick for miles, have been known to faint away when kept standing in one position for any length of time.

The clothes should be sprinkled and folded very smoothly at least an hour before. The close tin sprinkler, pierced with fine holes, is the best, of course, for dampening clothes, in which the housekeeper's direction always is, Sprinkle fine. A clean whisk-broom, dipped in water, will answer a good purpose. There is sense in folding clothes evenly and rolling them tight. It takes out the large wrinkles and dampens the garment more evenly. Now that mangles are so cheap, sheets and all kinds of napery should be done by the machine, saving a great deal of heated toil. I know some good housekeepers who use their clothes-wringer in this way on stockings, pillow-cases, and napkins with success. The articles must be thoroughly damp, not moist, and folded very evenly before going through the rollers. Plain skirts can be passed through the mangle, and the edges and gathers finished by an iron. Two or three families might buy a mangle together, and save hosts of work. Goods pressed by mangle must be carefully aired a longer time than those ironed by heat.

Laundresses give collars and shirts that are to be stiff two dips, first in boiled starch, after which they are dried, dipped again in starch made with cold water, and lie till damp before ironing. Starch-making is very simple. The essential points are to have every thing delicately clean used in making it, to moisten the starch, first with cold water, till it is like cream, and stir it quickly while pouring boiling water on till it is clear, with no whitish streaks or lumps. While it is hot a bit of spermaceti the size of a great pea may be stirred in for each pint of starch, and a tea-spoonful of gum-arabic water; but a clever laundress needs no such aids. The polishing iron, with point ground off to a curve, is the legitimate aid to her skill in finishing linen. With muslins the case is different. They are to be dipped in starch made by boiling half a tea-cupful of rice a long time, till it dissolves and the water looks like clear starch. This, of course, makes a large quantity—enough for several dresses. These must be dipped and well wrung, then clapped, to get all superfluous starch out of the meshes. The colored servants down South are famous for getting up muslins to look like new, and their plan is to roll dresses and parlor curtains up in a sheet, spread another sheet on the floor, throw the bundle down and dance on it, which clears a quantity of clothes remarkably in a very short time. There was a laundress out in the country who always made her muslins look like new, with just the right pliancy and stiffness, by washing them in the hardest water she could get. Very little soap was used, the soil coming out by patting with the hands or using a brush, and the water was always cold. Without any starch at all, her muslins looked enviously fresh and crisp.

Thin goods should be in the last stage of dampness when ironed, all roughnesses being retouched with a moist sponge. The use of the sponge is a great aid to success in ironing. A wrinkle in a collar, or rough, dry spots, may be dampened by a stroke of the sponge, and gone over again without putting the article back in the wash, or sending it out imperfect to vex men's souls. In ironing calicoes and linens its use is constantly demanded. I suppose every lady knows that cotton fabrics should be ironed on the wrong side, and linens on the right; but I regret to find that every laundress does not. Muslins must not be ironed with heavy weights, but gone over quickly, with a thin cloth laid above the wrong side, afterward finishing the gathers with a sharp-pointed iron. The best thing for ironing sleeves is a shape of thick pasteboard, covered with soft cotton, to be slipped inside the sleeve and rubbed, first one side and then the other. Two or three sizes of the board may be made to fit any sleeve. Puffs may be folded exactly in the centre, and ironed as if they were ruffles, afterward rubbing the crease out with thumb and finger. At present it is not the choice to flute ruffles except on under-clothing, the soft gathered ruffle being quite as graceful as the crisp flower-like frills indulged in so long. But really it saves time to rip the trimmings off a muslin which is not done up more than once in a summer, and iron them separately by passing through a clothes-wringer at moderate tension.

Lace curtains are not to be ironed at all, but each side basted to a heavy rod, and hung by one of them against the wall, sidewise: this stretches every mesh evenly into place. Or the old way may be followed of pinning one edge to a sheet laid smoothly over the carpet, and stretching the other carefully and evenly, fastening it with pins every inch.

Black laces are refreshed by dipping them in water in which a black kid glove has been boiled or soaked overnight. The gum and color from the kid impart blackness and the right stiffness to the lace, which must be hung up till damp, then carefully spread out, and pressed between layers of paper till dry. This finishes them better than ironing, if the weight used is heavy enough. Either silk or thread lace may be treated this way.

Soft silk neck-ties may be washed in rain-water to which a spoonful of white honey and one of hartshorn are added, using no other soap. Rinse them well, without squeezing, hang them up to drip, and when damp press with a hot iron between folds of thin cloth.

Fine laces are cleansed by rubbing between the palms of the hands in a box of powdered magnesia.

THE CANARY AT CHURCH.

THEY were singing good old London,
As the evening, cool and sweet,
Drifted with purple shadows
Adown the city street.

Round every churchly window
The lusty ivy clung;
The red, faint sunshine flickered
Its matchless leaves among.

The dim nave, with its arches
And clustered pillars rare,
Had echoed to the cadence
Of the pale Rector's prayer.

And now through tender silence
The thrilling flute-notes rang,
And sweet as angels' voices
The rare old tune they sang.

When sudden, lo! appearing
On carving quaint and old,
Like fair estray from heaven,
Fluttered a speck of gold.

On to the lecturn flying,
Up to the Bishop's chair,
With clear notes soaring, chanting
His wondrous vespers there.

Full rolled the singing voices;
Yet sweeter, richer, higher,
God's silver-throated chorister
Outsang the trained choir.

A REMINISCENCE.

WHEN Lord DUFFERIN, in a speech lately delivered at some Canadian gathering, pointed out to his loyal listeners the danger of letting their offspring become any thing like those little terrors to life, the American children, we were prompted to recall our youth, and discover if we really were all that such fancies have painted us. But as we read further in the nobleman's careful address, we could not help wondering if he were, after all, much acquainted with American children himself, and especially if he knew any thing at all about our school-girl. For though it is tolerably true that she rules a large share of America, the world of parents being her abject servitors, and their opinion going for little or nothing on any topic until "the girls" have first pronounced upon it, yet experience leads us to believe that she is not altogether the enfant terrible that we are told; and one of Mrs. WOOLSON'S charming essays makes the belief a certainty; for most of us were school-girls, we will not say how many years since, and were a part of all the experience of that little cosmos of theirs, and as we read of their exploits in Mrs. WOOLSON'S pages we live a portion of the past over again.

Some one says that boys between the ages of ten and twenty should be put in a barrel, and fed and educated through the bung-hole; and surely if one is about to pass the same sentence on the girl of like age it would be well to pause first, and remember those days of spontaneous delights and extravagant warmth—days when the hat was tilted a pitch beyond any fashion but its own, when twin cherries were worn for ear-rings and mountain-ash berries for necklaces, when beauties were openly admired and faults were openly challenged, and when the sky was dark or bright as the chemistry lesson was learned or lost. The school-girl lives, in fact, not only in a world of her own, but, like the planet Saturn, inside ring after ring of her own; for the outer world is a vague nebulous world far removed; within that comes the home world; the world of blackboard and teacher is something nearer still; and close to her very existence is the world of confidante and bosom-friend, of quarreling and admiring, of enthusiasms and hates, of pickled limes and taffy. Here in this inner world of all, novel laws are supreme as the code of Rhadamanthus—laws of honor; here what a literature obtains, literature at which the rest of the world has even done laughing, but to her all the bathos is pathos yet. What heroes rule in it, grand, gloomy, and peculiar, and who, because she is so innocent herself, she has well spiced with sin as savoring most of the great unknown; heroes with an air of melancholy "that seems to hint at a terrible experience in the past and an unlimited amount of remorse in the present;" a hero who reigns without so much as a thought of being pushed from his supremacy by the nice young man who parts his hair in the middle, and is the adored of the school-girl's sisters, but whom she extinguishes with her ever-ready satire by the sobriquets of "Pretty Dear" and "Kids!" For certainly she has no reverence for the sterner sex, unless it is all comprised in an infatuated worship of the head-master, who seems to her something beyond a mortal, all the more when he detects her misdemeanors with his back turned and by the magical reflection in his blue spectacles. The boys, indeed, who accompany her in her classes, and always keep her dragging behind the rate at which she would advance, are regarded by her as the merest dead-weights; and she never suspects their intellects to be the superior things she hears them declared when these same boys are safe in their colleges and professions beyond the chance of feminine competition. And if she has a literature and ideals of her own, she has secrets too; what secrets, administered under what pledges of silence, secrets about every thing and practically about nothing, and teaching her the uselessness of secrets ever after! And certainly the school-girl has a language of her own, a language of slang that would do credit to a Paris gamin. "After reciting all day in the most correct and classic English at her command, she revels in a disregard of precedents, and dashes off her ideas in few and resounding epithets. Her exuberant feelings demand for their expression only the most intense superlatives. Simple adjectives are discharged from her service as too tame for burning thoughts. Nothing can be to her merely good or bad; it is either perfectly magnificent or as horrid as it can be." The word "splendid" never fails her; she has, though, when that is powerless to express all emotion, another in "geloptious," signifying unimaginable raptures, and countless more mysterious yet, for she does not understand why the "well of English undefiled" should not bubble for her as much as for the ancient coiners of words. But another less pardonable liberty with her native tongue is taken by the school-girl, and that is in the adulteration of the name given her by her sponsors in baptism, and queenly appellatives full of associations with poetry and romance and history are metamorphosed into nauseating Lizzies and Katies and Maggies. It would be a waste of words, though, to reason with the school-girl on this or on almost any other subject on which her mind is made up, and it would be hard to find the subject on which her mind is not made up, or on which she hesitates to express it. She does not condescend to argue, but she pronounces her conclusions true, because in some subtile way known to herself she feels them to be so. "It is only later in life," says Mrs. WOOLSON, from whom we quote again, "that she learns to resent the common masculine talk about woman's instincts as an attempt to deprive her of all credit for her actions by allying her with bees, beavers, and other curious creatures who work after a pattern set them in the garden of Eden."

People are always telling the school-girl that these are her happiest days; but she does not believe them. She has a dream of happiness flying just before her, happiness in the years to come so bright as to dazzle the vision into indistinctness, but as impossible to fail her as the blue sky itself. And she is right; for which one of us, be our cares and perplexities what they may, would go back and be a school-girl again, the slave of the bell and the book, of the crayon and the composition? And yet who can help seeing in her, with all her faults and foibles, her ardors and enthusiasms, a creature full of vitality and brilliant promise, deserving a better fate than to settle down into that young lady who has no other word for Mont Blanc or for a bonnet than that wretched monosyllable "nice?" As we recount the peculiarities of the American school-girl thus set before us, we are conscious that we renew our youth in her; we feel that she is the same thing she was, and vanity forbids us to believe her, with all her breezy, stirring activity, the bad and desperate being that our neighbors across the line are bound to have her.

STUPIDITY AND SENSE BEHIND THE COUNTER.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THERE is a prevailing faith in the country districts that the urban dry-goods clerk is a being of preternatural acuteness, that he can detect character at a glance, and discern instantaneously between the righteous and the wicked. If this is a correct opinion, it must be admitted that there are exceptional cases of outrageous stupidity, and that these exceptions are liable to make a greater ado and a deeper impression than the shrewd and keen majority. It would seem sometimes as if clerks understood dry-goods, and nothing else. Silk and velvet, flowers and flounces, they appreciate, but words, modulations, manners, they count for nothing. If a woman's culture shows itself in elegant, elaborate, expensive dress, that they comprehend, to that they defer. But culture that has of choice or by force of circumstances been expended in other directions they know nothing about. They can not see it. They do not miss it. Long companionship with dry-goods seems to have given them a sense of dry-goods, and to have stripped them of every other.

A plainly but perfectly dressed lady, with the best blood of the world in her veins, and—what is more imposing to the haberdashing heart—with plenty of money in her pocket, went not long since into a shop to buy napkins. The potentate of the counter showed her such napery as he thought suited to her social position. "These are rather coarse," she suggested. "Have you none finer?" "Oh yes," said the gentleman, "but they are more expensive." It is ever to be regretted that the lady turned in silence and left the shop, because that clerk will never know that it was his own idiotic effrontery, and not the expense of the napkins, which lost him the customer.

A lady who never made any great figure in the world, and certainly not in a waterproof cloak on a rainy day, was seeking a parasol. The clerk showed her some very common, not to say shabby, specimens, which she declined. A little farther down the counter she bought a whole piece of fine and costly linen, observing which, the knight of the parasols came down and begged her to re-examine his assortment, of which he had contrived to unearth an altogether different and better collection. She too fell below the requirements of the occasion, and bought her parasol without enlightening him upon her discovery of his stupid mistake.

A lady, large and lovely, a serene Quaker goddess, made some benevolent casual remark to the clerk with whom she was trafficking, just as she would have patted the head of a strange dog who might have run up and sniffed at her gown, and the little whipper-snapper clerk followed her to the door and—winked at her! And while she stood staring at him in her first amazed consciousness of his individual existence, he winked again! Thus vacuous do the gods make a human skull, yet furnish it with all the ganglia of life.

Happy those merchants who can secure the right sort of clerks!—for a right sort there is. I bought a table-cloth of him yesterday. I had forgotten to take the size of the table, or a pattern of the color to be matched. Patiently he evolved my probable needs from my fragmentary facts, discussed pleasantly the presumptive evidence, and seemed as much interested in the harmonies of my dining-room as if he had expected to eat there thrice a day during the remainder of his natural life. Did he deceive me? Not a bit. I know of a surety that my dining-room was no more to him than the pea-nut stand on the common opposite. Me and it has he already alike forgotten. None the less was his momentary and friendly, but not familiar, assumption of interest in me and mine altogether winning and encouraging; and doubtless also was it, for that moment, altogether sincere. His sympathetic and refined nature does unquestionably and spontaneously ally itself for succor and good cheer to all who appeal to him. May his kind heart, his welcoming face, and his engaging manners be a mine of wealth to himself and all his employers and dependents!

Not to all men are given that grace and graciousness, serviceable, not servile, which distinguish a seller of sacques in a warehouse I wot of. A sacque rich and fine, but not overloaded with trimming, nor grotesque in cut, requires the quest of a Sir Galahad, and Sir Galahad was there to make it. With indescribable deftness and swiftness he overturned pile after pile of garments, making running comments as he went: "This is good material, but too low on the shoulder; this has too deep a collar; this too loud a trimming. If this were a quieter shade. Ah! here it is!—and here! Or you may like this." And out they came, shapely and sober. And if they had been gorgeous, I suspect the lady would hardly have known it, so won over was she by his ready helpfulness. And when he brought a brush and assisted her in disengaging her folds from the dust of our long drought with a dexterity wholly free from officiousness, he needed but to speak the word, and she would have bought every sacque in the shop.

Dry-goods clerking is bad business. There needs no ghost to tell us that. It is petty and showy. It takes women at their weakest—when they are self-centred and eager. It would seem to give men scarce any play of mind or muscle. They have only to stand, white and waiting, busy to irritation, or frenzied with idleness—forever babbling the price of a ninepenny calico or a spool of cotton. But it is not a business made any better by brazenness and bullying. Modesty, courtesy, gentleness, patience toward the good, and also toward the froward, serve as excellent a purpose here as elsewhere. Among his mantles and his wimples and his crisping-pins as truly as among shattering trumpets and splintered spear-shafts will Sir Galahad keep fair, through faith and prayer, his manly and upright heart.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL GOODS.

THE earliest importations of fall goods disclose the fact that we are to have another season of those undressed limp fabrics whose beauty consists in the flexibility that enables them to form soft, graceful drapery. All the rough-surfaced fabrics of last winter reappear, and there are many new woolens woven in wide "diagonals," broader than the twill of serge, and resembling the cloth lately fashionable for gentlemen's coats. These diagonal cloths will be a feature of the season for over dresses worn with silk skirts. They are exceedingly warm, pliable, clinging, and though very heavy-looking, are too loosely woven to be clumsy.

ALL-WOOL CHEVIOTS.

Conspicuous among the diagonal cloths are the all-wool Cheviots. These are thick soft woolen cloths with the diagonal lines woven very broadly, and slightly raised above the surface of the fabric. They are twenty-seven inches wide, and are found in all dark stylish colors.

TRIPLE DIAGONALS.

A novelty, called triple diagonal, is cashmere wool, not woven in its usual small irregular twill, but in three diagonal lines grouped together—a broad line with two narrower ones beside it. This slight change produces a new and very pretty effect.

"STUFFS FOR POLONAISES."

"Stuffs for polonaises" form the bulk of early invoices, thus confirming the prediction that this convenient garment will not decline in popularity.

CAMEL'S-HAIR, VIGOGNE, ETC.

Camel's-hair promises to be again the favorite material for handsome winter over dresses and wraps. This is now improved by having the inside thickly tufted with long soft warm fleece, while the outside surface retains its rough irregular twill. Another variety has reversed stripes woven in the Jacquard loom. The camel's-hair worn last year will still be stylish, though fresh importations of similar patterns have so many of the loose hanging hairs visible that the surface is positively shaggy.

The excellent and stylish vigogne twills, so serviceable for traveling suits and other dresses that get hard usage, are made heavier, and warm enough for winter. They come in natural wool browns and dark iron gray. There are also quantities of domestic mohair goods made in imitation of camel's-hair, and called such by the uninitiated.

TURKISH WOOL GOODS.

The summer goods like Turkish toweling proved so popular that a warmer fabric resembling this has been designed for winter redingotes. It is a French mixture of wool with common silk—that is, the waste silk of the Lyons factories. Thick, flexible, and rich-looking, it has all the qualities to commend it to favor.

CASHMERES, MERINOES, ETC.

Cashmere has become a staple winter fabric, and is imported in various thicknesses under different names. The heaviest is called drap d'été, and is imported in colors and in black for wraps; drap nationale is cashmere wool woven in thick lengthwise reps instead of being twilled; drap d'Alma is the same fabric in finer reps. The old time small-twilled cashmere restored to favor during the reign of Eugénie is still the popular choice, and seems to defy all novelties. Polka-dotted cashmeres are imported for children's dresses and for morning wrappers. The grounds are black, with scarlet dots, or else deep Napoleon blue or purple, with black or white dots, or lighter dots of the ground color. Merinoes and the lower-priced satines are also largely imported.

ABOUT COLORS.

After silks consult cashmeres for new colors, is the merchant's advice. But silks have not arrived, and whole cases of cashmeres develop nothing novel in the way of hues and shades. All the quaint colors of last year are reproduced, but are still deeper and darker, and, indeed, are so nearly invisible that the confused eye at first mistakes them for black. There are quantities of the indigo blue that importers call black-blue; olives, both brown and green, are more sombre than ever; the bronzes—red, green, and black—are all back again; but that which is prophesied will be most stylish is called brown bronze, which is parallel to saying whitish-white; grays take on a purple hue in preference to the blue-gray so fashionable now, and gris argent is no longer the bright silvery hue of last year, but is dark iron gray, like the oxidized silver that now finds favor.

EMBROIDERED POLONAISES, ETC.

Pattern polonaises in boxes are brought out in camel's-hair and cashmere of stylish dark colors, embroidered around the edges with wool and silk embroidery of various devices. They will cost when shown on counters of retail stores about $45. Wide binding braids like those used on gentlemen's clothes are being bought up by men dress-makers for binding redingotes, English jackets, and other masculine-looking garments that are to be made up of diagonals and worn by ladies.

NEW BLACK GOODS.

Something of variety is given to the always popular black goods of mixed silk and wool by weaving them in tiny armure figures, pin-head checks, and almost invisible reps, instead of the long-worn twills and thick reps. These armure and other designs are also brought out in colored goods of fine wool, but the custom is not new in colors. The soft Biarritz cloth in lengthwise reps is a standard favorite among winter materials. Japanese silks and poplins are brought out in stripes of color—violet, blue, brown, and grisaille, with black. These are not heavy enough for winter in this climate, but are worn very late in the season by ladies and children who live farther south.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH CALICOES.

English prints improve in texture and designs yearly. The prettiest patterns for the approaching autumn have black or dark brown grounds with small figures of one color, or perhaps two shades of one color, representing part of a Greek square, a double leaf, mammoth snails, miniature comets, true-lovers' knots, in buff, violet, blue, green, or currant red. These will be retailed at 37½ cents a yard, and are a yard wide. Others slightly more expensive are strewn with small white hexagons, with a tiny bouquet inside in French chintz colors. French calicoes are in gay stripes of many mingled colors in Persian fashion, and may be called Shah stripes.

UPHOLSTERY.

A novelty in materials for upholstering furniture is wool and cotton satine imitating Gobelin tapestry. These have a raised rep surface that gives the effect of needle-work, the figures are well brought out, and the pale fade Gobelin colors are admirably copied. They represent romantic scenes, moonlight serenades, Watteau figures, and many rococo designs, among which are pretentious ones so large that two yards and a half of the material are required to display a single device. Oriental colors and designs are shown in these cottons that might be mistaken for India cashmeres, and the Persian motley mixture of hues is found in upholstering fabrics, as, indeed, it threatens to appear in all goods made in Western Europe since the king of kings came that way. Some of the prettiest chintzes have pale gray frescoings on deepest blue or ponceau grounds, while others are great clusters of brilliant tropical leaves strewn over pale buff or green grounds.

FALL MILLINERY.

A few reliable hints are obtained about fall millinery in anticipation of the openings soon to take place at the wholesale houses. The coming bonnets, it is said, may be trimmed either as hats or bonnets. Their crowns are amply broad, but not high; and coronets, when worn, will be the highest ever known, though there are many shapes without coronets. Whether meant to be a hat or bonnet, the head covering is to be worn so far back that it will only cover the back of the head. Velvet, pure and simple, will be the fabric for winter hats, though much royale (uncut velvet) will be combined with it. Felt bonnets will be worn in Europe, but have never met with much favor here.

GROS D'ORIENT.

A new fabric for trimming, called gros d'Orient, is a soft twilled silk as glossy as satin, and of better quality than the twilled India silk worn for neck-ties. This is expected to take the place of the turquoise silk now used.

GROSEILLE RED.

Something fresh in colors is gathered in materials for millinery; for instance, the new groseille, or currant red, a bright crimson, is shown in gros d'Orient, faille ribbons, and also in the roses and buds that are imported in great quantities. Another color is dragon, a rich bronze showing both red and green, like the scarabée shade of two years ago.

Flowers are larger than those lately worn. Mammoth roses and large buds not quite blown are shown in the new groseille red and the limon yellow of last season. This association of red and yellow is already popular, and will continue in favor, as both blondes and brunettes wear it. Dark brown bronze roses are also shown. Trailing vines and leaf sprays are imported, but at present do not sell readily. A tricolor cluster of roses, pink, white, and scarlet, or else pink, crimson, and yellow, will be much used on fall bonnets for the clusters worn low down behind. Rose-bud bouquets, long-stemmed, and made up of buds of every shade known to nature, and some suggested by art, will be stuck under the side brim of black velvet round hats worn by young ladies. Several colors will appear on one bonnet, blended in the exquisite fashion introduced last spring by a leading French milliner. Two shades of a color, the extremes of light and dark, will also be used again. Finely cut steel, very highly polished, is the garniture used in imported bonnets. It is shown in slight fibrous leaves, that tremble and glitter like jewels. Cherries, currants, and grapes (especially white grapes), berries, and other small fruits are among the "artificial" trimmings on French hats.

PERSONAL.

AMONG the conspicuous persons at Long Branch is a young gentleman whose brilliant career in the late war makes him the observed of many observers, especially of the ladies. The correspondent of the Tribune describes him as a young, tall, dark, handsome army officer, the youngest of his rank in the service, a hero during the rebellion, who carries the lead of three Minie-balls in his shoulders and legs. Secretary STANTON saw him shot from the parapets of Fort Fisher, and gave him the commission of colonel in the regular army while he was on what was thought to be his death-bed, which he kept for two years, stepping backward and forward from life to death, until he was finally able to accept a year's leave of absence to enable him to visit Europe—he now being able (having swallowed opiates enough during the eight years following his twenty-first year to have killed his whole regiment) to walk slowly, and with little appearance of lameness, without the use of a cane. The men who watched for gallant deeds in the war, who read the daily heralding of comets that blazed to-day and sunk to-morrow, who recall the striking events of the period, may remember the young Pennsylvanian whose desperate bravery and Herculean endurance made him a colonel in the regular army before he was twenty-one years of age. His glory is enrolled in the Capitol, and every head of the War Department from Secretary STANTON down to Secretary BELKNAP has recalled the deeds and the sacrifices of this young officer, and has treated him with unusual kindness. His name is PENNYBACKER, and he is colonel of the Sixteenth Infantry, now stationed at Nashville. He was a brevet major-general at twenty-three, and is so youthful in appearance that you would rather expect to see on his shoulder the gold bar of a lieutenant than the eagle of a colonel.

—The Marquis of Bute has joined the noble company of lecturers. He recently delivered in London a lecture, said to have been interesting, on "Shrines of the Holy Land, recently visited." His descriptions were of various sacred places as they appear at the present time, dwelling with special interest upon the site of the Nativity, the house of Joseph the carpenter, the Holy Sepulchre, and the mounts of Calvary and Olives. Each of these he treated religiously and pathetically, concluding by quoting some Latin verses laudatory of the Holy Sepulchre.

—Dr. DIO LEWIS brought much laughter from a Utica audience by some advice to married men. He was speaking of the eye. "Gaze into your wife's eye, and you will see yourself looking exceedingly small." That was what evolved the laugh.

—The venerable Count SCHOUVALOFF, Grand Master of the court of the Czar, died quite recently at Carlsbad, and his funeral, after the forms of the Greek Church, appears to have attracted the attention and commanded the pens of all the foreign correspondents who could manage to attend. It was a notable ceremonial, and lasted for an hour and a half, and was chanted throughout by the priests, except when the strains of the ever-recurring Kyrie Eleison were hushed, and one of the ecclesiastics, clothed in robes of cloth of gold, read the lessons, and afterward delivered a short discourse or sermon. And what voices they had! At times, when the curtain was closed, and those rich basses swelled through the room, and the plaintive minors melted away in silence, the odors of the incense, the flaming tapers, the paintings on the walls, the garlands, combined in producing a weird effect, as if one was living in dream-land. There were passages of great solemnity. Once, as the son of the deceased stooped and on bended knees touched the floor with his lips—an action which one or more of the congregation repeatedly performed, in rigid obedience to the rubric—his emotions could not be restrained. It was the prayer for the deceased. Again, there was a striking incident when all the congregation, who had been holding lighted tapers in their hands, inverted or blew them out at the close of the mass for the repose of the soul of the departed. And when all was ended, the son, the old friends, and the grandchildren of the deceased came one by one and kissed the hands of the dead, over which their tears flowed fast, and each took away a leaf or a petal of the flowers around the coffin.

—The two notable ladies in London at the present moment are two sisters, each destined, in the ordinary course of things, to wear a diadem—one the Princess of Wales, the other the Czarevna of Russia. Both are beautiful, frank, cheerful, unaffected, anxious to please and to be pleased. The Czarevna is younger than her sister, and a very merry, roguish young person. Until she came to London she had never known much of the pleasures of general society, and she has plunged into them with all the zest of a novice. The two sisters are inseparable, and the Princess of Wales has never gone about so much before. They are both so natural and so graceful, and so anxious to make themselves and every body else feel at home, that they have taken the town by storm. They drive out once or twice every day, often taking their children with them; go to exhibitions of art and other sights, to the theatres and operas, and to balls innumerable. All the highest people in the fashionable world have been vying with each other as to who should give the finest entertainment in honor of the two princesses. One night they are at Lady WALDEGRAVE'S, at Strawberry Hill, associated with HORACE WALPOLE; another night at Montague House, the Duke of Buccleuch's; and again at Lord GRANVILLE'S and the Duke of Wellington's. London has not been so gay for years as it has been this season, and the shop-keepers are rejoicing accordingly.

—NILSSON has had a little tiff with Queen VICTORIA. The latter once left the opera after having seen the former in but one act of Mignon, and failed to invite the songstress to meet the Shah. So she begged to be excused from singing at the Queen's recent private concert, and has concluded she won't warble any more in London this season. She is a spunky little woman, with views as to dignity.

—There were some curious incidents connected with the STANHOPE family, that were recently brought to light in the successful effort of Mr. GEORGE PHILIP STANHOPE to obtain the peerage as Earl of Chesterfield. He was born in 1822, and was formerly lieutenant in the army. It is almost unparalleled in the history of titled families that the present earl is descended, as were the last three earls, from an ancestor who was the eleventh son of his father, the first earl. The present peer inherited the title from a distant cousin; and in the event of his dying without male issue it passes to another distant cousin, like him descended from the above-named eleventh son, Sir E. F. SCUDAMORE STANHOPE.

—Notwithstanding the active business life led for many years by the late LEWIS TAPPAN, and his conceded ability and astuteness in commercial affairs, he appears to have reaped a beggarly reward for his labors, his entire estate, as appears by his will, recently admitted to probate in Brooklyn, being worth less than $5000.

—Dr. MEHAFFEY, the reading clerk of the House of Representatives, is one of the characters of Washington. Walking down Pennsylvania Avenue one morning, on his way to the Capitol, he encountered a bevy of young ladies, to whom he paid his respects in passing. When he had gone by, one of the ladies, to whom he was a stranger, said, "Who was that?" "Why, don't you know? That's Dr. MEHAFFEY. He explains the bills to the members."

—The Grand Vizier of Persia is master of great power and patronage. He directs and controls the whole foreign policy of the government, and is ex officio commander-in-chief of the army. He is like three British principal Secretaries of State rolled into one, and assumes as much consequence.

—The Rev. S. W. BRUCE, of Utica, New York, is said to be the oldest living Presbyterian minister. He is now prostrated by a stroke of paralysis.

—HENRY WATTERSON, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, has been elected an honorary member of the Cobden Club, in London. Mr. WATTERSON is writing the sauciest letters that have ever been sent over by an editor for publication. We are led to look for the bankruptcy of the London Times within the next sixty days, and the extinction of the British monarchy before Christmas.

—Mrs. FRANCIS, wife of our minister to Greece, writes to her daughter in this city the first news that has reached here of the complete and brilliant success attending Mr. SCHLIEMANN'S long-continued explorations on the site of ancient Troy. The discoveries are of the most interesting and remarkable character, and will be hailed by scholars throughout the world. Mrs. F. writes:

"ATHENS, GREECE, June 25, 1873.

"Mr. SCHLIEMANN returned from Troy yesterday. He has completed his excavations, after three years of labor, by a grand master-stroke. He has discovered the palace of Priam and large treasure in gold and silver. He has carried away with him forty large cases containing various articles, also fifteen baskets of real treasures. We called upon him to-day at his residence for the purpose of examining his collection. I saw in his house gold goblets and vases which shine just like the gold of our age. I also saw some beautiful head ornaments made of gold, massive and well-made, resembling those now worn by the modern Greeks. There is a golden goblet weighing nearly three pounds, also a quantity of small round ear-rings such as are used and worn by children of our days."

—DANIEL DEFOE is coming in again. One of the best puns ever made by the late PHŒBE CARY was this: "Why was Robinson Crusoe's man Friday like a rooster? Because he scratched for himself and Crue-so." The trustees of the Public Library of Kentucky have determined to have Robinson Crusoe printed on raised letters for the use of the blind, the work to be commenced immediately. The hearts of those who suffer from the most direful of afflictions will be filled with joy at this announcement.

—Mrs. SCHURZ has had the good fortune to inherit $170,000 from her uncle, recently deceased, at Hamburg.

—The Duchess of Leeds, formerly one of the belles of Baltimore, is now a widow, and immensely rich. True, she is only ninety, but that should not deter some of our enterprising bachelors from going over and popping to the old lady, with an ultimate view of bringing some portion of the assets to her own, her native land.

—Baltimore rejoices in that a daughter of that city, Miss KATIE GAUL, has recently achieved great triumphs at Weimar as a pianiste. She is a favorite pupil of LISZT, having been under his general direction as a student of music for over two years. In assuming the direction of her culture he made the great concession that superlative talent only could wring from him, as he had formed the rule to take no pupils. From the first, however, he recognized the genius of this young lady, whom he calls "My America." As an evidence of this she was invited last month to appear in a grand LISZT concert given before numerous representatives of royalty and great folk at the palace, in which LISZT and Miss GAUL were the only solo performers, and the orchestra was of the composer's direction. Her triumph was complete.

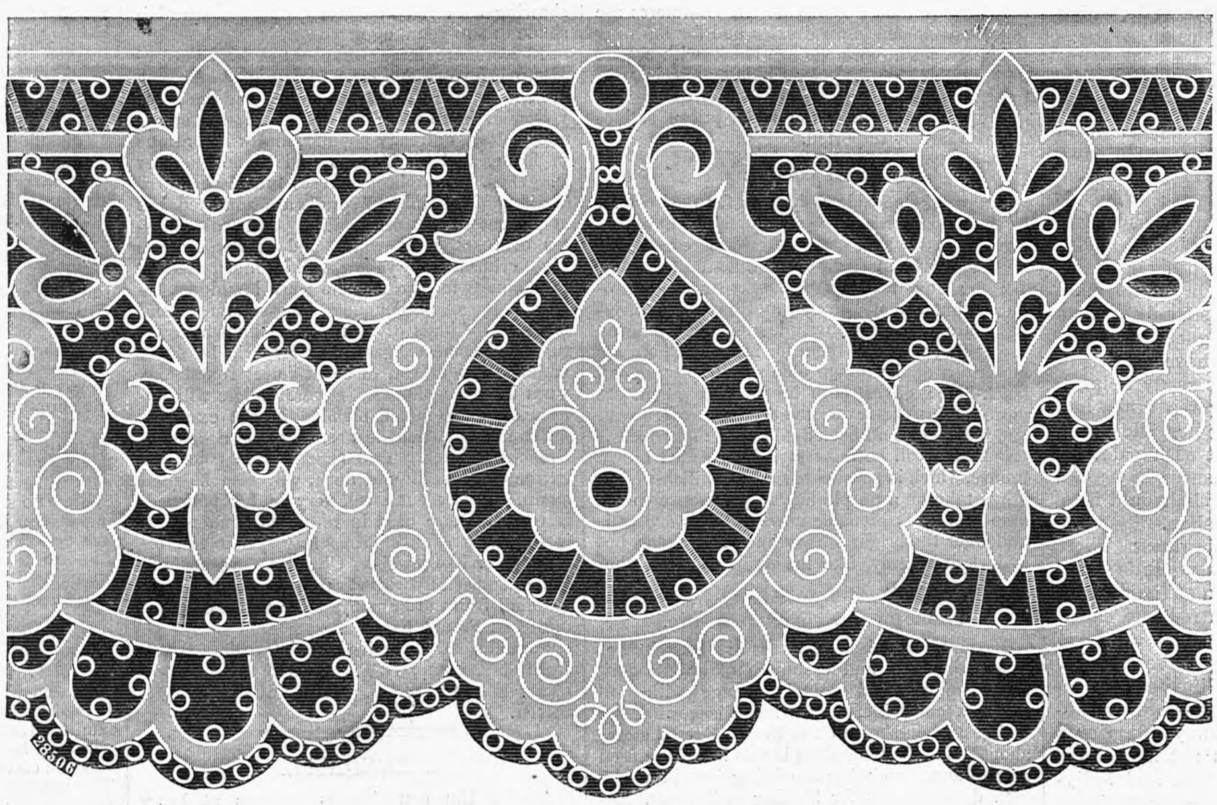
Edging in Genoese Embroidery.

THIS edging may be used for lingerie, as, for instance, under-sleeves, etc., and also for trimming covers and curtains. Work the embroidery on nansook, lawn, cambric, or fine linen. After drawing the design run the outlines evenly with medium-sized embroidery cotton, and then work the bars hatched in the illustration, stretching the working thread back and forth several times from one outline to another, and covering the bar closely and evenly with stitches. For all the outlines of the design figures, and for the arabesques inside of the design figures, sew on a thread of coarse tatting cotton or fine guipure cord with close overhand stitches; in doing this always insert the needle far into the material in a slanting direction, and also form the small loops at the same time. After finishing the embroidery cut away the material between the design figures from the under side, as shown by the illustration.



EDGING IN GENOESE EMBROIDERY.

Designs in Cross Stitch Embroidery for Sofa-Pillows, Rugs, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—DESIGN (QUARTER SECTION) FOR SOFA-PILLOW. The canvas should be coarse or fine, according to the size desired for the pillow. The colors, of worsted or silk, may be selected from the description of symbols of Fig. 1, or to match the color of the furniture of the room. The design gives one row of symbols more than the quarter section on each side, thus one row beyond the middle line; this shows that every following quarter section should be embroidered in reversed order.

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR RUG. The directions given above are also suitable for this design. For the centre either buckskin or Angora fur may be used.

Designs for darning Tulle, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE pretty designs are suitable for curtains, etc. To work them baste the tulle very smooth and firm, so that it may not be pushed out of place, on a foundation of paper or linen on which the design has first been drawn. Run the outlines of the design with medium-sized glazed cotton, always alternately taking up one bar of the tulle on the needle and passing over the next. In the following rows alternate the bars. Edge the border shown by Fig. 2, page 549, with button-hole stitch scallops, as shown by the illustration.

MATRIMONIAL CANDIDATES.

"WANT a husband, miss?—only threepence," was the extraordinary question we heard put to a young lady waiting to cross a bustling London street. The querist was an impudent young tatterdemalion, who, as he spoke, flourished a bundle of papers before the eyes of the astonished damsel. The rascal was pushing the sales of a journal unique in its way, an organ "specially devoted to the promotion of marital felicity," and the relief of the "thousands of marriageable men and women, of all ages and conditions, capable of making each other happy, who have no chance of ever coming together either in town or country," thanks to the restrictions imposed by "the cold formalities of society and the rigid rules of etiquette." We suppose this odd literary venture has proved a success commercially, seeing that it has managed to exist for a couple of years, during which time some eight thousand candidates for matrimony have made their wants and wishes known in its columns. Whether marital felicity has been promoted thereby is another matter, upon which we must be content to remain ignorant.

After striking out duplicates we find a month's issue of our matrimonial organ containing five hundred and forty-eight advertisements. Two hundred and ninety-four emanating from would-be wives, and two hundred and fifty-four from would-be husbands. Let us give the ladies precedence, and begin with the two hundred and thirty-three unappreciated maidens, who have grown desperate, waiting in vain for the coming man. That rogue Cupid must have gone sparrow-hunting to the neglect of his proper business, for so many connubially inclined spinsters to be sighing for mates all unregarded. These unwooed ones are of various conditions and of all ages, from sweet seventeen to forlorn forty; eight being yet in their teens, fourteen just out of them; sixty-three have not seen more than five-and-twenty summers; sixty-one count from twenty-one to thirty years; sixty-two from thirty-one to thirty-nine; while nineteen confess to forty, and eight have passed beyond. Fair maidens stand to dark ones in the proportion of three to two, but black hair would seem to be at a discount, for only one raven-locked lady is to be found among them. It is from no want of charms that these poor ladies are left out in the cold. Oblivious of the copy-book maxim about self-praise, five proclaim themselves beautiful, eight write themselves down very handsome, twenty-three are, according to their own accounts, handsome, sixteen very pretty, and the same number pretty without the very. Fifty-two tell us they are good-looking, nine are nice-looking, and seven fine-looking. Eight are attractive, two prepossessing, twenty-nine of good appearance, one is stylish, and one fascinating.

Some are accomplished, some brilliant musicians, some clever needle-women, some highly educated. Others make parade of their connection with first-rate families; few forget to declare their amiability and affectionate disposition; some pride themselves upon being domesticated; and all are evidently strong in the belief that they will make excellent wives.

How far the marriage rate of the United Kingdom has been affected by the establishment of the new means of intercommunication between the sexes we can not tell; but of one thing we feel no doubt, that not a few of its aiders and abettors have bitterly regretted they ever heard of its existence.

Designs for Banners, Altar Cloths, Church Decorations, etc., Figs. 1-3.

Fig. 1 shows a design for the centre of banners, altar cloths, etc., which is worked on white damask with gold thread, gold cord, and gold braid as shown by the illustration.

Figs. 2 and 3 show different crosses suitable for banners, church decorations, etc. They are worked in application and gold embroidery. For the foundation of the cross shown by Fig. 2 apply gold cloth, and for the outer edge sew on gold cord, as shown by Fig. 17, page 452, Harper's Bazar, No. 29, Vol. II., but taking the thread single. Work the inside of the cross in half-polka stitch and point Russe with fine gold thread. The wreath of thorns is worked in dovetailed satin stitch with brown saddler's silk in three shades, and edged with gold cord. The nails are worked in satin stitch with dark brown silk, and are also edged with gold cord. For the cross shown by Fig. 3 sew on fine gold cord as described for the outer edge of Fig. 2. Work the letters with burnished bullion, and form the edge and vines with gold cord.

COMPOUND FOR WASHING LINEN.

ACCORDING to the Moniteur Scientifique, an excellent substance for washing linen, and one not possessing the destructive effect of soda and other washing powders, is prepared as follows: Two pounds of soap are dissolved in five and a half gallons of nearly boiling water, and to this is added three large table-spoonfuls of ammonia and

LADY ANNA.

CHAPTER XXIII.

BEDFORD SQUARE.

THE Earl, without asking any question on the subject, had found that the Solicitor-General thought nothing of that objection which had weighed so heavily on his own mind, as to carrying on his suit with a girl who had been wooed successfully by a tailor. His own spirit rebelled for a while against such condescension. When Lady Anna had first told him that she had pledged her word to a lover low in the scale of men, the thing had seemed to him to be over. What struggle might be made to prevent the accomplishment of so base a marriage must be effected for the sake of the family, and not on his own special behoof. Not even for twenty thousand a year, not even for Lady Anna Lovel, not for all the Lovels, would he take to his bosom as his bride the girl who had leaned with loving fondness on the shoulders of Daniel Thwaite. But when he found that others did not feel it as he felt it, he turned the matter over again in his mind, and by degrees relented. There had doubtless been much in the whole affair which had placed it outside the pale of things which are subject to the ordinary judgment of men. Lady Anna's position in the world had been very singular. A debt of gratitude was due by her to the tailor, which had seemed to exact from her some great payment. As she had said herself, she had given the only thing which she had to give. Now there would be much to give. The man doubtless deserved his reward, and should have it, but that reward must not be the hand of the heiress of the Lovels. He, the Earl, would once again claim that as his own.

He had hurried out of town after seeing Sir William, but had not returned to Yoxham. He went again to Scotland, and wrote no further letter to the rectory after those three lines which the reader has seen. Then he heard from Mr. Flick that Lady Anna was staying with the Sergeant in Bedford Square, and he returned to London at the lawyer's instance. It was so expedient that if possible something should be settled before November!

The only guests asked to meet the Earl at Sergeant Bluestone's were Sir William and Lady Patterson and the black-browed young barrister. The whole proceeding was very irregular—as Mr. Flick, who knew what was going on, said more than once to his old partner, Mr. Norton. That the Solicitor-General should dine with the Sergeant might all be very well—though, as school-boys say, they had never known each other at home before. But that they should meet in this way the then two opposing clients—the two claimants to the vast property as to which a cause was to come on for trial in a few weeks—did bewilder Mr. Flick. "I suppose the Solicitor-General sees his way, but he may be in a mess yet," said Mr. Flick. Mr. Norton only scratched his head. It was no work of his.

Sir William, who arrived before the Earl, was introduced for the first time to the young lady. "Lady Anna," he said, "for some months past I have heard much of you. And now I have great pleasure in meeting you." She smiled, and strove to look pleased, but she had not a word to say to him. "You know I ought to be your enemy," he continued, laughing, "but I hope that is well-nigh over. I should not like to have to fight so fair a foe." Then the young lord arrived, and the lawyers of course gave way to the lover.

Lady Anna, from the moment in which she was told that he was to come, had thought of nothing but the manner of their greeting. It was not that she was uneasy as to her own fashion of receiving him. She could smile and be silent, and give him her hand or leave it ungiven, as he might demand. But in what manner would he accost her? She had felt sure that he had despised her from the moment in which she had told him of her engagement. Of course he had despised her. Those fine sentiments about ladies and gentlemen, and the gulf which had been fixed, had occurred to her before she heard them from the mouth of Miss Alice Bluestone. She understood, as well as did her young friend, what was the difference between her cousin, the Earl, and her lover, the tailor. Of course it would be sweet to be able to love such a one as her cousin. They all talked to her as though she was simply obstinate and a fool, not perceiving, as she did herself, that the untowardness of her fortune had prescribed this destiny for her. Good as Daniel Thwaite might be—as she knew that he was—she felt herself to be degraded in having promised to be his wife. The lessons they had taught her had not been in vain. And she had been specially degraded in the eyes of him who was to her imagination the brightest of human beings. They told her that she might still be his wife if only she would consent to hold out her hand when he should ask for it. She did not believe it. Were it true, it could make no difference—but she did not believe it. He had scorned her when she told him the tale at Bolton Abbey. He had scorned her when he hurried away from Yoxham. Now he was coming to the Sergeant's house with the express intention of meeting her again. Why should he come? Alas, alas! She was sure that he would never speak to her again in that bright sunny manner, with those dulcet honey words, which he had used when first they saw each other in Wyndham Street.

Nor was he less uneasy as to this meeting. He had not intended to scorn her when he parted from her, but he had intended that she should understand that there was an end of his suit. He had loved her dearly, but there are obstacles to which love must yield. Had she already married this tailor, how would it have been with him then? That which had appeared to him to be most fit for him to do had suddenly become altogether unfit—and he had told himself at the moment that he must take back his love to himself as best he might. He could not sue for that which had once been given to a tailor. But now all that was changed, and he did intend to sue again. She was very beautiful—to his thinking the very pink of feminine grace—and replete with charms. Soft in voice, soft in manner, with just enough of spirit to give her character. What a happy chance it had been, what marvelous fortune, that he should have been able to love this girl whom it was so necessary that he should marry—what a happy chance, had it not been for this wretched tailor! But now, in spite of the tailor, he would try his fate with her once again. He had not intended to scorn her when he left her, but he knew that his manner to her must have told her that his suit was over. How should he renew it again in the presence of Sergeant and Mrs. Bluestone and of Sir William and Lady Patterson?

He was first introduced to the former of the two ladies, while Lady Anna was sitting silent on the corner of a sofa. Mrs. Bluestone, foreseeing how it would be, had endeavored with much prudence to establish her young friend at some distance from the other guests, in order that the Earl might have the power of saying some word; but the young barrister had taken this opportunity of making himself agreeable, and stood opposite to her, talking nothings about the emptiness of London and the glories of the season when it should come. Lady Anna did not hear a word that the young barrister said. Lady Anna's ear was straining itself to hear what Lord Lovel might say, and her eye, though not quite turned toward him, was watching his every motion. Of course he must speak to her. "Lady Anna is on the sofa," said Mrs. Bluestone. Of course he knew that she was there; he had seen her dear face the moment that he entered the room. He walked up to her and gave her his hand, and smiled upon her.

She had made up her little speech. "I hope they are quite well at Yoxham," she said, in that low, soft, silver voice which he had told himself would so well befit the future Countess Lovel.

"Oh yes—I believe so. I am a truant there, for I do not answer Aunt Julia's letters as punctually as I ought to do. I shall be down there for the hunting, I suppose, next month."

Then dinner was announced, and as it was necessary that the Earl should take down Mrs. Bluestone and the Sergeant Lady Anna—so that the young barrister absolutely went down to dinner with the wife of the Solicitor-General—the conversation was brought to an end, nor was it possible that they should be made to sit next each other at dinner; and then, when at last the late enemy came, and they were all together in the drawing-room, other things intervened, and the half hour so passed that hardly a word was spoken between them. But there was just one word as he went away. "I shall call and see you," he said.

"I don't think he means it," the Sergeant said to his wife that evening, almost in anger.

"Why not, my dear?"

"He did not speak to her."

"People can't speak at dinner-parties when there is any thing particular to say. If he didn't mean it, he wouldn't have come. And if you'll all have a little patience, she'll mean it too. I can't forgive her mother for being so hard to her. She's one of the sweetest creatures I ever came across."

A little patience! and here was November coming. The Earl, who had now been dining in his house, meeting his own client there, must again become the Sergeant's enemy in November, unless this matter were settled. The Sergeant at present could see no other way of proceeding. The Earl might no doubt retire from the suit, but a jury must then decide whether the Italian woman had any just claim. And against the claim of the Italian woman the Earl would again come forward. The Sergeant, as he thought of it, was almost sorry that he had asked the Earl and the Solicitor-General to his house.

On the very next morning—early in the day—the Earl was announced in Bedford Square. The Sergeant was of course away at his chambers. Lady Anna was in her room, and Mrs. Bluestone was sitting with her daughter. "I have come to see my cousin," said the Earl, boldly.

"I am so glad that you have come, Lord Lovel."

"Thank you: well, yes. I know you will not mind my saying so outright. Though the papers say that we are enemies, we have many things in common between us."

"I will send her to you. My dear, we will go into the dining-room. You will find lunch ready when you come down, Lord Lovel." Then she left him, and he stood looking for a while at the books that were laid about the table.

It seemed to him to be an age, but at last the door was opened and his cousin crept into the room. When he had parted from her at Yoxham he had called her Lady Anna; but he was determined that she should, at any rate, be again his cousin. "I could hardly speak to you yesterday," he said, while he held her hand.

"No—Lord Lovel."

"People never can, I think, at small parties like that. Dear Anna, you surprised me so much by what you told me on the banks of the Wharfe!" She did not know how to answer him even a word. "I know that I was unkind to you."

"I did not think so, my lord."

"I will tell you just the plain truth. Even though it may be bitter, the truth will be best between us, dearest. When first I heard what you said, I believed that all must be over between you and me."

"Oh yes," she said.

"But I have thought about it since, and I will not have it so. I have not come to reproach you."

"You may if you will."

"I have no right to do so, and would not if I had. I can understand your feelings of deep gratitude, and can respect them."

"But I love him, my lord," said Lady Anna, holding her head on high and speaking with much dignity. She could hardly understand herself the feeling which induced her so to address him. When she was alone, thinking of him and of her other lover, her heart was always laden with regret in that she had not known her cousin in her early days—as she had known Daniel Thwaite. She could tell herself, though she could not tell any other human being, that when she had thought that she was giving her heart to the young tailor, she had not known what it was to have a heart to give. The young lord was as a god to her; whereas Daniel was but a man, to whom she owed so deep a debt of gratitude that she must sacrifice herself, if needs be, on his behalf. And yet when the Earl spoke to her of her gratitude to this man, praising it, and professing that he also understood those very feelings which had governed her conduct, she blazed up almost in wrath, and swore that she loved the tailor.

The Earl's task was certainly difficult. It was his first impulse to rush away again, as he had rushed away before: to rush away and leave the country, and let the lawyers settle it all as they would. Could it be possible that such a girl as this should love a journeyman tailor, and should be proud of her love? He turned from her and walked to the door and back again, during which time she had almost repented of her audacity.

"It is right that you should love him—as a friend," he said.

"But I have sworn to be his wife."

"And must you keep your oath?" As she did not answer him, he pressed on with his suit. "If he loves you, I am sure he can not wish to hurt you, and you know that such a marriage as that would be very hurtful. Can it be right that you should descend from your position to pay a debt of gratitude, and that you should do it at the expense of all those who belong to you? Would you break your mother's heart, and mine, and bring disgrace upon your family merely because he was good to you?"

"He was good to my mother as well as me."

"Will it not break her heart? Has she not told you so? But perhaps you do not believe in my love."

"I do not know," she said.

"Ah, dearest, you may believe. To my eyes you are the sweetest of all God's creatures. Perhaps you think I say so only for the money's sake."

"No, my lord, I do not think that."

"Of course much is due to him."

"He wants nothing but that I should be his wife. He has said so, and he is never false. I can trust him at any rate, even though I should betray him. But I will not betray him. I will go away with him, and they shall not hear of me, and nobody will remember that I was my father's daughter."

"You are doubting even now, dear."

"But I ought not to doubt. If I doubt, it is because I am weak."

"Then still be weak. Surely such weakness will be good, when it will please all those who must be dearest to you."

"It will not please him, Lord Lovel."

"Will you do this, dearest: will you take one week to consider, and then write to me? You can not refuse me that, knowing that the happiness and the honor and the welfare of every Lovel depends upon your answer."

She felt that she could not refuse, and she gave him the promise. On that day week she would write to him, and tell him then to what resolve she should have brought herself. He came up close to her, meaning to kiss her if she would let him; but she stood aloof, and merely touched his hand. She would obey her betrothed—at any rate till she should have made up her mind that she would be untrue to him. Lord Lovel could not press his wish, and left the house unmindful of Mrs. Bluestone's luncheon.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE DOG IN THE MANGER.

DURING all this time Daniel Thwaite had been living alone, working day after day and hour after hour among the men in Wigmore Street, trusted by his employer, disliked by those over whom he was set in some sort of authority, and befriended by none. He had too heavy a weight on his spirits to be light of heart, even had his nature been given to lightness. How could he even hope that the girl would resist all the temptation that would be thrown in her way, all the arguments that would be used to her, the natural entreaties that would be showered upon her from all her friends? Nor did he so think of himself as to believe that his own personal gifts would bind her to him when opposed by those other personal gifts which he knew belonged to the lord. Measuring himself by his own standard, regarding that man to be most manly who could be most useful in the world, he did think himself to be infinitely superior to the Earl. He was the working bee, whereas the Earl was the drone. And he was one who used to the best of his abilities the mental faculties which had been given to him, whereas the Earl—so he believed—was himself hardly conscious of having mental faculties bestowed upon him. The Earl was, to his thinking, as were all earls, an excrescence upon society, which had been produced by the evil habits and tendencies of mankind—a thing to be got rid of before any near approach could be made to that social perfection in the future coming of which he fully believed. But though useless, the Earl was beautiful to the eye. Though purposeless, as regarded any true purpose of speech, his voice was of silver and sweet to the ear. His hands, which could never help him to a morsel of bread, were soft to the touch. He was sweet with perfumes and idleness, and never reeked of the sweat of labor. Was it possible that such a girl as Anna Lovel should resist the popinjay backed as he would be by her own instincts and by the prayers of every one of her race? And then from time to time another thought would strike him. Using his judgment as best he might on her behalf, should he wish that she should do so? The idleness of an earl might be bad, and equally bad the idleness of a countess. To be the busy wife of a busy man, to be the mother of many children, who should be all taught to be busy on behalf of mankind, was, to his thinking, the highest lot of woman. But there was a question with him whether the accidents of her birth and fortune had not removed her from the possibility of such joy as that. How would it be with her, and him too, if, in afterlife, she should rebuke him because he had not allowed her to be the wife of a nobleman? And how would it be with him if hereafter men said of him that he held her to an oath extracted from her in her childhood because of her wealth? He had been able to answer Mr. Flick on that head, but he had more difficulty in answering himself.

He had written to his father after the Countess had left the house in which he lodged, and his father had answered him. The old man was not much given to the writing of letters. "About Lady Lovel and her daughter," said he, "I won't take no more trouble, nor shouldn't you. She and you is different, and must be." And that was all he said. Yes, he and Lady Anna were different, and must remain so. Of a morning, when he went fresh to his work, he would resolve that he would send her word that she was entirely free from him, and would bid her do according to the nature of the Lovels. But in the evening, as he would wander back slowly, all alone, tired of his work, tired of the black solitude of the life he was leading, longing for some softness to break the harsh monotony of his labor, he would remember all her prettinesses, and would, above all, remember the pretty oaths with which she had sworn that she, Anna Lovel, loved him, Daniel Thwaite, with all the woman's love which a woman could give. He would remember the warm kiss which had seemed to make fresh for hours his dry lips, and would try to believe that the bliss of which he had thought so much might still be his own. Had she abandoned him, had she assented to a marriage with the Earl, he would assuredly have heard of it. He also knew well the day fixed for the trial, and understood the importance which would be attached to an early marriage, should that be possible, or at least to a public declaration of an engagement. At any rate she had not as yet been false to him.

One day he received at his place of work the following note:

"DEAR MR. THWAITE,—I wish to speak to you on most important business. Could you call on me tomorrow at eight o'clock in the evening—here?

"Yours very faithfully and always grateful,

"J. LOVEL."

And then the Countess had added her address in Keppel Street—the very address which, about a month back, she had refused to give him. Of course he went to the Countess, fully believing that Lady Anna would also be at the house, though believing also that he would not be allowed to see her. But at this time Lady Anna was still staying with Mrs. Bluestone in Bedford Square.

It was no doubt natural that every advantage should be taken of the strong position which Lord Lovel held. When he had extracted a promise from Lady Anna that she would write to him at the end of a week, he told Sir William, Sir William told his wife, Lady Patterson told Mrs. Bluestone, and Mrs. Bluestone told the Countess. They were all now in league against the tailor. If they could only get a promise from the girl before the cause came on, any thing that they could even call a promise, then the thing might be easy. United together, they would not be afraid of what the Italian woman might do. And this undertaking to write to Lord Lovel was almost as good as a promise. When a girl once hesitates with a lover, she has as good as surrendered. To say even that she will think of it, is to accept the man. Then Mrs. Bluestone and the Countess, putting their heads together, determined that an appeal should be made to the tailor. Had Sir William or the Sergeant been consulted, either would have been probably strong against the measure. But the ladies acted on their own judgment, and Daniel Thwaite presented himself in Keppel Street.

"It is very kind of you to come," said the Countess.

"There is no great kindness in that," said Daniel, thinking perhaps of those twenty years of service which had been given by him and by his father.

"I know you think that I have been ungrateful for all that you have done for me." He did think so, and was silent. "But you would hardly wish me to repay you for helping me in my struggle by giving up all for which I have struggled."

"I have asked for nothing, Lady Lovel."

"Have you not?"

"I have asked you for nothing."

"But my daughter is all that I have in the world. Have you asked nothing of her?"

"Yes, Lady Lovel. I have asked much from her, and she has given me all that I have asked. But I have asked nothing, and now claim nothing, as payment for service done. If Lady Anna thinks she is in my debt after such fashion as that, I will soon make her free."

"She does think so, Mr. Thwaite."

"Let her tell me so with her own lips."

"You will not think that I am lying to you."

"And yet men do lie, and women too, without remorse, when the stakes are high. I will believe no one but herself in this. Let her come down and stand before me and look me in the face and tell me that it is so, and I promise you that there shall be no further difficulty. I will not even ask to be alone with her. I will speak but a dozen words to her, and you shall hear them."

"She is not here, Mr. Thwaite. She is not living with me in this house."

"Where is she, then?"

"She is staying with friends."

"With the Lovels—in Yorkshire?"

"I do not think that good can be done by my telling you where she is."

"Do you mean me to understand that she is engaged to the Earl?"

"I tell you this—that she acknowledges herself to be bound to you, but bound to you simply by gratitude. It seems that there was a promise."

"Oh yes—there was a promise, Lady Lovel; a promise as firmly spoken as when you told the late lord that you would be his wife."

"I know that there was a promise, though I, her mother, living with her at the time, had no dream of any such wickedness. There was a promise, and by that she feels herself to be in some measure bound."

"She should do so, if words can ever mean any thing."

"I say she does—but it is only by a feeling of gratitude. What! is it probable that she should wish to mate so much below her degree if she were now left to her own choice? Does it seem natural to you? She loves the young Earl, as why should she not? She has been thrown into his company on purpose that she might learn to love him—when no one knew of this horrid promise which had been exacted from her before she had seen any in the world from whom to choose."

"She has seen two now, him and me, and she can choose as she pleases. Let us both agree to take her at her word, and let us both be present when that word is spoken. If she goes to him and offers him her hand in my presence, I would not take it then though she were a princess, in lieu of being Lady Anna Lovel. Will he treat me as fairly? Will he be as bold to abide by her choice?"

"You can never marry her, Mr. Thwaite."

"Why can I never marry her? Would not my ring be as binding on her finger as his? Would not the parson's word make me and her one flesh and one bone as irretrievably as though I were ten times an earl? I am a man and she a woman. What law of God, or of man—what law of nature, can prevent us from being man and wife? I say that I can marry her—and, with her consent, I will."

"Never! You shall never live to call yourself the husband of my daughter. I have striven and struggled and suffered, as never woman strove and suffered before, to give to my child the name and the rank which belong to her. I did not do so that she might throw them away on such a one as you. If you will deal honestly by us—"

"I have dealt by you more than honestly."

"If you will at once free her from this thralldom in which you hold her, and allow her to act in accordance with the dictates of her own heart—"

"That she shall do."

"If you will not hinder us in building up again the honor of the family, which was nigh ruined by the iniquities of my husband, we will bless you."

"I want but one blessing, Lady Lovel."

"And in regard to her money—"

"I do not expect you to believe me, Countess; but her money counts as nothing with me. If it becomes hers, and she becomes my wife, as her husband I will protect it for her, and enable her to put it to such good uses as may seem most fit to both of us. But there shall be no dealing between you and me in regard to money."

"There is money due to your father, Mr. Thwaite."

"If so, that can be paid when you come by your own. It was not lent for the sake of a reward."

"And you will not liberate that poor girl from her thralldom?"

"She can liberate herself if she will. I have told you what I will do. Let me see her, and let her tell me to my face what she wishes."

"That she shall never do, Mr. Thwaite—no, by heavens! It is not necessary that she should have your consent to make such an alliance as her friends think proper for her. You have entangled her by a promise, foolish on her part, and very wicked on yours, and you may work us much trouble. You may delay the settlement of all this question—perhaps for years—and half ruin the estate by prolonged lawsuits; you may make it impossible for me to pay your father what I owe him till he, and I also, shall be no more; but you can not, and shall not, have access to my daughter. You may do us infinite evil, but you can do yourself no good whatever."

Daniel Thwaite, as he returned home, tried to think it all over dispassionately. Was it as the Countess had represented? Was he acting the part of the dog in the manger, robbing others of happiness without the power of achieving his own? He loved the girl, and was he making her miserable by his love? He was almost inclined to think that the Countess had spoken truth in this respect.

Revelations concerning a late Honored Guest.—Savage Potentates.—Sensational End of a Sensational Novelist.

HAS it ever been your misfortune to have been intimate with a gentleman of apparent respectability, to have asked him to dinner and seated him in the place of honor next your wife, and afterward to read in the paper that he was hung? When our penal code was more stringent, the case was not uncommon. The banker Fontleroy, for example, who, as you remember, suffered the last penalty of the law, "moved" at one time "in the best circles." There is a dreadful story, indeed, which illustrates the fact, concerning one who under pretense of sympathy called upon him in the condemned cell, and entreated him with emotion to reveal to him, since the possession of the secret could be of no further social service to him, where he got that Curaçoa from. But nowadays it is quite exceptional to have entertained capital offenders unawares. Hence it is that society here is rather put out of conceit with itself at the discovery that in welcoming the Shah of Persia we have been doing honor not indeed to a man that is doomed to the gallows, but to one who ought to have been hung a hundred times over. He is, in fact, I have good reason to believe, the most cruel and vindictive despot that ever disgraced even the Persian throne. Those little tricks of throwing his umbrella over his head when he had done with it, and the contents of his plate when he had had enough, and of wishing to try the effects of new rifles in crowded neighborhoods, which were here set down to childish impatience and thoughtlessness, were, in fact, the indices of a disposition which when in his own domain exhibits itself in acts which would disgrace a tiger. I have the following anecdote from the lips of a lady who has lived for years in Teheran, and was a resident in that city during the event which she thus describes. A Persian lady of high rank had given some offense to the Shah with that unruly weapon, her tongue, and being aware of the danger she had thereby incurred, fled across the frontier with her son. After four or five years, being desirous to return to her friends, she sounded some persons about the court as to whether it would be safe for her to do so, and was informed (whether with the Shah's connivance or not is doubtful) that the despot had forgiven her. No sooner, however, did she recross the frontier than she was seized, put between two boards, and sawn asunder. This is his favorite punishment, and one which, I am told, he inflicts so often that even his ministers, who have no law but his, and are not scrupulous about human life, are appalled by it. However, if he did it but that once, that is quite enough for me, and still more, I should imagine, for every body who ever sat at table with him. To think that Englishmen should have been taking off their hats to such a savage—nay, that Englishwomen should have welcomed him with smiles and enthusiasm—seems to me at least a national humiliation. It was, in my opinion, very much to the credit of the brewers of Barclay & Perkins that when Marshal Haynau, the Austrian woman-whipper, came with his gold-lace and stars, and accompanied by certain court people, to investigate that establishment, they threatened to throw him into the vat, and made him run for his life; and if the Shah was to return now after these revelations of his home life shall have become public, it is probable that he would meet with a very different reception from his last. For some offended novelist to "put one in a book" and "cut one up" is thought to be a savage and inexcusable way of taking vengeance, but to put one between boards and saw one asunder is a much more censurable practice. I wonder—though it would be equally shocking either way—whether the Shah is graciously pleased to saw his subjects across or along: across, I suppose, however, since it must needs be done against the grain. The honor of his Majesty's stay with us has stood us, it seems, in exactly a thousand pounds per diem, exclusive of the three salutes of the iron-clads at Portsmouth, which cost us a thousand pounds apiece. These were given in pebble powder, and the discharge in one case having been shot full face into a yacht, put five persons hors de combat. I wish the mischance had happened to the Shah himself, instead, when mounted on his hors de combat (war-horse, I mean), with its pink tail and its gold ring. One ought to have known that a man who rides a horse with a pink tail and a gold ring through it must be a worthless "critter," though how base no imagination could have pictured. What I have told you about him is, however, I believe, the literal fact. The last news of him is rather curious. Mr. Burnaud, the "happy-thought" man, has made comic capital out of his Majesty in a burlesque called Kissi-Kissi, and the Persian minister has actually remonstrated with our Lord-Chamberlain against permitting his high and mighty master to be made a joke of; whereupon the mimic representative of the king of kings has been compelled to wash his face, in order, I suppose, to be as unlike our late objectionable guest as possible.

One of the worst features of the public reception of these savage potentates is that more of the same sort are induced to come,

"and one black sin brings on anodder,
Like little nigger pickaninny riding pickaback upon him mudder."

The Sultan of Zanzibar, who has been a good boy and given up slave-dealing, though not without pretty strong compulsion, is also, I believe, about to honor us with a visit, below whom, I should think, monarchs can no further go.

In the days when sensation novels were not called by that name, but yet existed, there was a somewhat famous one entitled Paul Ferrol. It was realistic too, which at that time was a novelty, and it had a certain abrupt force of its own not easily forgotten. Its authoress, Mrs. Clive (the wife of a clergyman living near Hereford, who has also large landed property in that neighborhood), was last week burned alive while sitting in her boudoir. She was over seventy, and a confirmed invalid; but she was engaged with books and MSS., when a spark flew from the fire and set the papers in a flame, from which she was too feeble to escape.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

LONDON is following the excellent fashion set by so many cities of the United States, and the poor children of that great and crowded metropolis are enjoying free excursions into the fresher country air. Thus far we have heard of no trips embracing such a large number of children as those which have gone from New York. A recent excursion from this city to the "Oriental Grove" included nearly eighteen hundred little denizens of crowded tenement-houses. And, strange to say, not a single casualty, even of the most trifling nature, occurred among this great throng. Good order prevailed, and every child had a delightful time. On this excursion the expense for each one was about thirty-five cents. The London Telegraph gives an account of an excursion given to three hundred poor children of that city. It consisted of a drive into the country, a day of freedom and fun among green fields, flowers, and shady trees, and an abundant meal of sandwiches, lemonade, ginger-beer, milk, strawberries, cherries, and currants, which was served under a huge tent on the meadows. All were required to come "clean and tidy," and some touching incidents occurred showing the earnest desire to comply with this regulation. One little girl entreated the inspector to "look over Peter's boots." Peter was her small brother, whose mites of feet were planted in huge leather boots, which manifestly would prevent him from running about much. On inquiry it was found that the motherly sister had polished up the boy's boots for this occasion and put them carefully away in the closet, where they were discovered by the drunken mother; and seeing them look so nice, she speedily transferred them to the pawn shop. Peter's boots were "overlooked," and he was given a seat beside the driver of the van, greatly to his comfort and to the delight of his sister. This is only a sample of the difficulties which poor little children endure in their endeavors to gain a holiday, not only in London, but every where. Sad indeed are the lives of those little ones whose wretched poverty-stricken homes are made hopelessly miserable by a father or mother habitually intemperate.

The "Aerial Sanitarium" is of Western growth. It is simply a huge balloon, firmly secured, at a proper height, to the earth, and around which is a wire frame-work fitted up to accommodate one hundred guests. A small balloon serves as an elevator. If a storm arises, the whole affair can be quickly brought down to earth. But in good weather it is averred that nothing is more delightful than this air hotel.

Cold water, copiously applied, is regarded as one of the best remedies for sun-stroke. If all who are forced to expose themselves to the direct rays of the sun during the hottest months would lay a cloth wet in cold water upon the top of the head within the hat, it would usually be an effectual protection against injury.

A Western lady recently was awakened from sleep by a dreadful dream and a mysterious voice exclaiming, "Your brother William is dead!" She screamed and fainted. On being restored to consciousness she refused to be comforted, and passed the night in tears. And, to be sure, in confirmation of her dream, the next day she received a letter stating that her brother—was quite well, and unusually successful in business!

The work of reconstructing the Column Vendôme at Paris has been commenced, though as yet only the masonry is begun. As a matter of economy, it is intended to utilize the stone-work of the old column, at least such portions as are suitable, and about two-thirds of the materials can be used. But a large proportion of this material must be repaired and rejointed, and the reparation is most difficult. The completed column will be surmounted by the old statue of the Emperor in gray redingote and jack-boots, with the arms crossed in the legendary attitude. The statue is considerably injured, but not irreparably.

A writer from Saratoga remarks that "so entirely have décolletée dresses disappeared that even the children are dressed up to their ears and down to their waists," and queries whether the "poor little things" are "never to know the freedom and coolness of bare arms and neck when they dance in a room suffocatingly hot from the blaze of gas and the crowd which only leaves space enough for the dancers." We say "poor little things" most sympathizingly; not, however, because fashion just now covers arms and neck—a style which is far more sensible and prudent than the opposite one—but because they are encouraged and expected to dance at all in the "suffocatingly hot" rooms of a fashionable watering-place. Why can not these "poor little things" be allowed to keep themselves cool and comfortable during dog-days' sultry heat? If they want to dance, let them do it in free, airy places, and unencumbered by oppressive finery. Alas! how many mothers lose their little ones through vanity!

Complaint is made in many cities that the clergymen are all absent from town, and that it is difficult to procure one to attend funeral services. It is stated in a local paper that every one of the Protestant clergy in West Troy is out of town.

It is the season for burglars; and some who make their living by midnight investigation of houses are not only wicked, but most unmitigatedly mean. Not long since a private house in Lexington Avenue was not only robbed by burglars by the actual abstraction of five hundred dollars' worth of property, but more than fifteen hundred dollars' worth of paintings were cut to pieces with knives. Such atrocity seems almost beyond belief—a pure act of vandalism, which merits equal if not severer punishment than robbery.

It is important for every one who ever ventures into or upon the water, to remember that when a person falls into deep water he will rise to the surface, and continue there, if he does not elevate his hands. If he moves his hands under water, in any way he pleases, his head will rise so high as to give him free liberty to breathe; and if he will use his legs as in the act of walking up stairs, his shoulders will rise above the water, so that he may use the less exertion with his hands, or apply them to other purposes. Those who have never learned to swim should bear in mind these simple directions.

It is announced that the Emperor of China has issued a decree declaring that if the chief officer of his household carelessly breaks dishes he shall be killed. What a massacre of Bridgets there would be if such a regulation should be carried into effect in this country!

Noblemen, scientific gentlemen, ladies interested in social questions, and working-men belonging to the various clubs and unions in London, have inaugurated a movement to furnish nutritious meals to the laboring classes at a mere nominal cost. One day recently nine hundred meals were sent to the workmen in various printing-offices, factories, and other establishments, with a list of questions to be answered by the eaters for the purpose of learning their opinion of the food. Each meal consisted of sixteen ounces, made up of Australian meat, farinaceous substances, and vegetables, the whole costing twopence and a fraction at wholesale, or fivepence at retail. It is said that the working classes of London have shown great prejudice against the use of Australian meat, and it is desired that they should test it thoroughly and prove its value.

Among other new things at Martha's Vineyard this season is a beautiful steam-yacht, named Minnehaha, which is to be used for excursions.

Sea bathing at Hyannis, on the south coast of Cape Cod, is particularly fine—the water being warm and smooth, and the beach shelving gradually.

Every adult remembers the hideous pictures of the car of Juggernaut crushing its voluntary victims with which Sunday-school books and primary geographies were formerly embellished. Our childish minds were filled with horror at the contemplation of such results of heathenism. It now appears that a part of the lesson which was instilled into youthful students of missionary books is to be unlearned. A correspondent of the London Times informs the public that the deaths inflicted by the car are entirely due to accident. About 1500 devotees are employed to drag the car, with its sixteen huge spiked wheels. Many of the poor wretches become entangled in the long ropes which they hold, fall, and are crushed under the wheels. Deaths have been fewer since, as, by order of an English commissioner, arrangements have been made for the protection of the people.

Wide publicity has been given to the fact that persons have been made sick by eating blue-fish; hence it is very desirable that the conditions under which this and, indeed, other kinds of fish may be safely eaten should be understood. It is said that the blue-fish is furnished with a peculiar and powerful gastric juice, and that the probability is that any ill effects on the health of those who eat of it is owing to carelessness in cleaning the fish, whereby the gastric juice is allowed to fall upon the part to be eaten, or from its lying so long without cleaning that this powerful agent of digestion permeates the body. The taste of the fish changes rapidly unless it is properly prepared, and fishermen have learned to clean it soon after being caught.

Whether moderate doses of ink may be considered a specific for cholera morbus, or even for cholera, may demand longer trial before a satisfactory decision is reached; but the following incident is worthy the consideration of those who are subject to sudden attacks of illness and are uncertain what remedy to use. A short time ago a Louisville gentleman, who had retired to rest after a light supper of soft crabs and cucumbers, awoke in the night with certain pains which excited his fears of an attack of cholera. No time was to be lost in warding off the fell destroyer. He sprang from his spring mattress, and seizing a bottle of camphor, took a swallow, and then vigorously rubbed the afflicted portion of his person with the restorative, continuing the application after he had returned to bed. He experienced prompt relief, but, as his fright left him, it occurred to him that his camphor had lost its customary odor. Again he rose, and this time turned on the gas. A single glance at his night-shirt told the tale. Instead of camphor, he had used a bottle of superior writing fluid.

Amidomono-chloro-benzenesulphonic is a new acid, the discovery of which is just announced by the Italian Gazette of Chemistry. One should take a long breath before attempting to pronounce the name.

SKETCHES IN BRITTANY.

SKETCHES IN BRITTANY.

THERE is certainly no part of France which is more interesting than Brittany. The way in which the history of this wild and romantic province is connected with England, the dignified seriousness of its inhabitants, its climate and scenery—all are wonderfully English. In addition to this the great number of quiet and secluded little villages, with their old houses and picturesque churches, has at first sight an aspect more English than Continental; and were it not for the crosses at the road-side, and the figures of saints attached to the houses, it would not be difficult to imagine one's self in a Northamptonshire village. With all this similarity, however, there is much which is dissimilar, original, and strange in Brittany. One of the features in a Breton village which will first attract the tourist's attention is the cemetery. In Brittany, as in the old villages in England, the burial-ground is attached to the church, but the aspect of a Breton cemetery is as distinct from that of an English one as can well be conceived, for in the former the tombs are the least conspicuous objects to be seen, and that which first attracts the attention is the large and remarkable groups of figures, often life-size, representing the Crucifixion and Passion of our Lord. In some instances there are as many as eighty or a hundred of these figures. One of our illustrations represents one of these "Calvaries" in the churchyard at St. Thegonnec. Another remarkable feature in the Breton cemetery is the "Charnel," or bone-house. When in Brittany any bones are removed in making a new grave, or in making any alteration in the burial-ground, these remains of mortality are reverently deposited in a building erected for that purpose. Sometimes, in fact, the bones are purposely removed, and placed in a recess made for them in the charnel-house. When this is done the name and date of the death of the departed are affixed to the skull upon a piece of parchment. So particular are the Bretons with regard to the relics of the departed that a few years ago an Englishman narrowly escaped being put to death by the indignant inhabitants of a village because he had quite innocently picked up a skull which he found in one of the church-yards, and was walking off with it as a little addition to his museum at home! The most remarkable church-yards and Calvaries in Brittany are at St. Thegonnec, Guimillieu, Plougastel-Dowlais, and St. Jean-du-Doight, the latter of which contains, in addition to the usual buildings, a magnificent bronze fountain. All these cemeteries are entered by gates of elaborate design, occupying the position of the "lich-gate" in an old English church-yard.

Several of the towns in Brittany are rich in domestic architecture, especially Morlaix, where some of the streets appear to have remained unaltered since the Middle Ages. We give illustrations of two of the most remarkable streets in Morlaix.

No traveler should visit Brittany without seeing the pretty little sea-port town or village of Roscoff. In the principal street he will find the little chapel of St. Miriam, built by the unfortunate Mary Stuart in commemoration of her marriage with the Dauphin. In another street he will find the old house in which the unhappy Charles Edward took refuge after the overthrow of all his hopes at Culloden. Near to Roscoff is the interesting old episcopal city of St. Pol de Leon, with its noble cathedral and fine church, called "Kreisker," with the loftiest spire in Brittany, all constructed of granite, within a few miles of St. Pol de Leon. The country abounds with picturesque villages, castles, ruined abbeys, and every thing that can interest the artist or the antiquary.

HETTY'S DOUGHNUTS.

THE long rays of the afternoon sun slipped in at Mrs. Baxter's open door, danced gayly over the spotless floor of the ample kitchen, darted in and out for a moment or two among the highly polished tins which stood in orderly rows on the dresser, and then suddenly plunged into Hetty's heavy braids, and nestled there, as if they had at last found what they were seeking, and had no wish to wander more. They could not well have found a fairer resting-place than those same rich braids, red in the shadow and gold in the sun, unless they had chosen the long dark lashes, or the roguish dimple, or the soft pink cheeks, or the rosy lips. But no! the lips would have constituted but an uneasy resting-place, for they were in tolerably constant motion. Not that any one who heard Hetty Morris speak would have wished her to be silent: still, silent she seldom was—at least in her waking hours.

At the moment when the sunbeams first pointed her out to us, as she stood at the great table rolling out dough, her sleeves fastened up, and her round white arms here and there dabbed with flour scarcely whiter, she was softly talking to herself.

"Dear me! I shall never get these miserable doughnuts done by tea-time," she was saying, as she cut off a strip of dough and gave it an airy twist; "and that horrid fat gets hotter and hotter every minute. The last two kettlefuls are utterly ruined."

"If that is 'utter ruin,'" remarked a masculine voice, "I am willing to take it off your hands. Pass me the pan, Miss Hetty." And the vines trailing over the east window were gently moved aside, and a dark curly head, adorned with two or three shavings, proceeded to insert itself into the open window, as if a portrait had suddenly pushed its way into its frame.

Hetty tossed her head. "No, I thank you, Mr. Kennedy," said she, with another twist of the light dough. "Uncle Baxter knows to a doughnut how many there should be in a batch; and if there were one missing I should suffer for it."

"Oh, nonsense!" said her companion. "He is not so bad as that. Tell the truth, Hetty, and say it is you who grudge me the poor satisfaction of a solitary cake. Never mind. There's a good time coming soon, when they will be every-day affairs with me."

"What do you mean?" asked Hetty, pausing with her fork in her hand.

"What should I mean, except that I am thinking of getting married?" returned the young man in the window, brushing off a shaving as he spoke.

"Oh—I hadn't heard," observed his companion, returning with supreme indifference to her rolling-pin.

"Haven't you? I am surprised at that," was the reply, "for it has been all over town for the last fortnight."

"I wish you were not so fond of those silly jokes, Frank," said Hetty, decidedly.

"I will agree to abandon the habit from this time forth for evermore," he replied, looking very handsome and penitent; "that is, if you will give me a certain slight token that I am forgiven."

Hetty drew nearer to the window.

"What shall it be?" she asked, with a deepening blush and a very encouraging smile.

"If you love me, my dear, bestow upon me that crusty doughnut which adorns the top of yonder pile," he responded, theatrically, striking an attitude as he spoke.

Hetty's heels clicked expressively as she walked to the pantry door, her head high in air.

"Help yourself," she said, briefly.

"Thanks!" responded Frank, reaching a long arm in at the window and over to the big table. "It is more convenient than I thought. I could easily carry away the whole panful."

No reply.

"Hetty, are you vexed?"

A dead silence.

"Come here, little girl, and give me a better token of forgiveness."

"Help yourself," was the demure response.

With an agile spring Frank perched upon the window-sill, when from the upper regions a voice, clear and sharp, made itself heard in the succinct inquiry,

"Cakes done, Hetty?"

"Yes, aunt. Do you want me?" asked the girl, darting to the door.

"Come up," was the rejoinder; and Miss Hetty, looking triumphantly back as she attained a secure position in the doorway, had the satisfaction, dear to her mischievous heart, of beholding a discomfited countenance disappear from the window, as Mr. Frank Kennedy dropped down on the outside. The vines rustled for an instant, and then were still. Hetty closed the door, and the sunbeams and the huge pan of doughnuts had the big kitchen all to themselves.

Mrs. Baxter sat examining a chestful of woolen clothes, in the cool solitude of the north chamber.

"Those pesky moths have got in here, after all," she remarked, as her niece entered the room. "Look at that, now;" and she exposed to view an ancient garment completely riddled with small holes. "You just sit down here, Henrietta, and sort out all the stockings into that basket by themselves. You'll have just about time before you set the supper-table."

Hetty sat down as directed, and was soon deep in a musty heap of stockings and flannels.

"There's Will Lowry going by," said her aunt, pausing a moment in her occupation and glancing out of the open casement. "I must ask him about Aunt Elizy.—Good-evening, William," she called, leaning over the sill, and addressing a good-looking, broad-shouldered young fellow who was passing the gate. "How's all the folks, particularly your aunt Elizy?"

"All the folks are well, except Aunt Eliza, and she's better," replied the young man, pausing in his walk and leaning on the gate, as if quite willing to prolong the interview. "Aunt Martha is going to have the sewing society up there to-morrow."

"They'll eat her out of house and home," rejoined the old lady, rather grimly. "That reminds me, William, I promised to send your aunt some of my yeast cakes, and if you don't mind a bundle, you might take 'em along with you. They're on the kitchen table. If you'll just step round to the back-door you'll find 'em quite handy."

"I'll just run down and get them for him," proposed Hetty, anxious to escape from the wool chest, and not at all averse to a little flirtation with Will Lowry.

"You'll just stick to the stockings, Miss Morris," answered her aunt, promptly. "Let him wait on himself."

Presently the last pair of stockings was laid away, and then her aunt said, "Now get the tea; and be quick about it too, Henrietta, for I see father's wagon driving round to the barn now."

Hetty flew down to the kitchen, hurriedly put the tea to draw, and neatly set out on the white cloth snowy bread, golden butter, and crimson jelly, all made by her own deft fingers. Then she ranged before her uncle's place a huge platter of cold boiled beef, a dish of cold potatoes, and another of pork and greens. Then, standing at one side, she glanced critically over the generous board to see if all was complete. Something about the arrangement struck her as faulty; but at first she could not satisfy herself as to what it was. At last a light broke in upon her mind.

"How near I came to forgetting the doughnuts! How uncle would have fretted, to be sure! I am glad I thought before he came in."

So saying, she took a plate and went into the pantry. Not a doughnut was to be seen. She examined the cupboard under the milk shelf. There was the bread box, a jar of cookies, and two lusty loaves of gingerbread—but no doughnuts. She brought a wooden chair from the kitchen, and stood thereon to search the topmost shelf. There she beheld only pots of jam and preserves, together with some disused tins, all very much covered with dust—but no doughnuts. Then she pulled out the big pie board from behind the flour-barrel (the pie board made by Frank at the age of ten years—his earliest essay in the carpentering line—and which warped past all using within the first month of its existence). No doughnuts—nothing but two or three cobwebs, against which she promptly registered a vow. As she was replacing the board a thought darted into her mind which caused smiles to fade quickly away, and a frown of annoyance as quickly succeed them.

"Frank! That is the reason he went home so early from his work, is it? How silly of him to play me such a trick! If he only knew how cross Uncle Baxter can be when he is vexed! What shall I do?" And poor Hetty began turning over in her mind all sorts of excuses for the non-appearance of her uncle's favorite delicacy, none of which would do in the least, and in the midst of which she heard his rough voice in the kitchen.

"Supper ready?"

"All ready," she answered, faintly, from the depths of the pantry; and hastily cutting several thick slices of gingerbread, she hurried out and took her seat at the table.

"What time did Frank go?" inquired her uncle of nobody in particular, at the same time heaping his plate with meat and vegetables.

Hetty said nothing, and her aunt replied,

"Somewhere between five and six; I don't know exactly."

"Did he get through with that door before he went?" demanded the gruff voice again.

"He did," replied Aunt Baxter, concisely. Hetty breathed more freely.

"What that fellow does with his time is more than I know," growled Uncle Baxter. "It's lucky for him he's working by the job, or he'd hear a piece of my mind."

Farmer Baxter's "womenkind," as he was wont courteously to term the ladies of his family, understood his ways, and usually passed over his ebullitions of temper in silence, knowing that he would doubtless eat himself into better humor in due course.

"I believe he spends half his time gossiping with the women," he continued, rightly surmising that the subject was distasteful to his wife and niece, and therefore doggedly pursuing it. "Has he been in here this afternoon, Henrietta?"

"No, Sir," replied Hetty, boldly, though a recollection of Frank's parting attitude came over her guiltily as she spoke.

"Well, just see that he don't, then; and you 'tend to your work," was the surly rejoinder; and the old man subsided into a discussion of his dish of greens.

For a few moments silence reigned about the table. Aunt Baxter, with the policy induced by long experience, remaining mute, and Hetty because her angry tears choked her utterance. Presently a subdued conversation commenced and was for some time carried on in an undertone between aunt and niece. Suddenly came the awful question, which had all the time been hanging like a doom over poor Hetty's head,

"Where's the doughnuts?"

"They were just done, and quite hot," replied Hetty, flushing crimson. "The gingerbread is fresh, and I thought you would just as lief have it to-night."

"You know better," amiably returned Uncle Baxter. "Just you step quick and get some."

Hetty mechanically rose to obey, when her aunt quietly observed:

"It seems a pity to let the gingerbread dry; but I presume Aunt Samanthy will be glad of it."

"Aunt Samanthy won't get it, then, that's all," returned her lord and master, quite unconscious that this was precisely the response she wished and expected. "Sit down, Henrietta, and another time don't cut gingerbread when there's fresh doughnuts in the house."

So that danger was over; but in proportion as her fear of her uncle's displeasure passed away her indignation against Frank Kennedy increased. She could not readily forgive him the scolding she had received or the more formidable one she had escaped.

"I think I'll run up to grandma's," said Aunt Baxter, the next day, as they left the dinner-table, "if you can clear away the things alone."

"Oh! I can do that easily enough," replied Hetty, with alacrity, for the poor child had been planning all the morning how she could get an opportunity to replace that dreadful missing dish.

"Very well," said her aunt; "and if you want something to do, you might sort the rest of those flannels."

"I want to gather my dress skirt," said Hetty, faintly, blushing as she did so for the deception.

"Well, I don't care, so you're not idle;" and Aunt Baxter walked heavily and respectably out of the gate, adorned with her Sunday bonnet and her best mantilla.

No sooner did the gate click behind her than Hetty fell to work with the greatest energy. Eggs were beaten, spice measured, sugar and shortening weighed, and worked into the dough which had been surreptitiously rising behind the pantry door since morning. The fat was tested, and the strips of the soft yielding mass speedily reappeared in crisp, brown twists piled up in a large yellow dish, which dish was spitefully placed out of reach from the open window. The young lady did not sing over her work to-day, but frowned blackly instead, as she flew from stove to table. The frown deepened perceptibly when, just as she was contemplating the last of the golden brown cakes, a well-known voice was heard from the window, exclaiming:

"Heaven defend us! What a capacity Uncle Baxter must have for doughnuts, if he has eaten all you made yesterday, and now demands more!"

This was too much. Hetty felt the blood leaping through her veins.

"Mr. Kennedy!" she said, icily, "it is possible to carry a joke too far. I am so busy this afternoon that I can not stop to hear you 'talk nonsense;'" with which cutting quotation she turned with much dignity to leave the room, and presently found herself wildly struggling with the door-latch, which, with the usual perversity of inanimate things, chose this inauspicious moment for sticking fast.

"Won't you tell me what I have done?" pleaded the delinquent, seizing his opportunity.

"I don't care to discuss the point," replied Hetty, still fumbling with the obdurate door-latch.

"How unfair you are!" he broke out, impatiently. "You accuse me of some mysterious offense, and then utterly refuse to allow me to defend myself."

"I don't accuse you of any thing," said Hetty, shaking the door furiously. "I know that you consider joking at every time and on every subject perfectly allowable, but when I had told you fairly what uncle can be when he is vexed, I did think it very cruel and inconsiderate that you should set him on me just for a silly trick."

"I give you my word, Hetty, that I had no idea of your uncle's really grudging me those cakes, if that is what you mean, or even knowing any thing about it." Hetty elevated her eyebrows. "Of course I know he is stingy, and all that, but I had no idea you were in earnest when you said he would visit it on your head. My taking them at all was only a bit of fun, anyway."

"And a very stupid bit of fun," interpolated Hetty. But just here the door yielded to a particularly vicious twitch, and Hetty rushed up stairs.

The tea-things were hurriedly washed up and put away that evening, and Mrs. Baxter set forth sedately through the village street, for it was conference-meeting night. Who does not know that meeting well, with its swinging kerosene lamp, whose light seems always in your eyes, whichever way they turn, until you close them for relief; the solemn countenance of the good deacon who "leads;" the doubtful and wailing hymns; the awful pauses; the sense of personal gratitude to some long-winded, prosy brother who rises and "fills up the time" after a deathly hush of unusual duration; and the blessed period which closes the service and removes the restraint that for two hours has bound the senses of all present? The closing prayer is offered, and the words spoken which dismiss the worshipers, who stream out into the narrow aisles, the older ones gravely exchanging bits of local gossip, the younger, to whom this is the moment of culminating interest, wishing, fearing, and hoping. The girls cast blushing glances toward the phalanx of tall youths on either side of the door, and the youths, having already made a selection, only await opportunity. Happy those whom no disappointment awaits; for, alas! there must be some "previous engagements." Then comes the delicious saunter homeward in the soft summer evening, the elders having considerately gone on before; the lingering at the gate while the trees softly whisper overhead, and the good-night reluctantly murmured beneath the stars. Alas that youth comes but once, and will not return after disappointments have taught us to value aright its sweet dream-life!

Hetty walked demurely out of meeting that night by her aunt's side, conscious, though they had not exchanged a glance, that Frank Kennedy was awaiting her. A little lonely sense of separation from him came over her, but it did not soften her resentment. It had become a regular thing for Frank to walk home with her after meeting; she was vexed with herself when she thought how regular it was. As this thought passed through her mind, she became aware, though her eyes were cast down, that Frank was approaching her on one side while Will Lowry was offering her his arm on the other. Fixing a cold look upon the former—a look which cut him to the heart—she turned with one of her brightest smiles to the latter, and, with a "Thank you, Mr. Lowry," she walked away with him, leaving Frank gazing after her with a look of pain and perplexity mingled. As for Hetty, though she talked and laughed in her gayest tones, and leaned on Will's arm and glanced up in his face in her usual coquettish manner, her heart was heavy within her, nor did she feel happier, though she became much gayer, when, a few minutes later, Frank passed her with Selma Burton clinging to his arm confidingly.

"Is that an engaged couple, Miss Morris?" asked her companion, as Selma's lisping tones died away in the distance.

"I am sure I don't know," answered Hetty, with a light laugh; and then the conversation drifted into the usual talk of two young persons taking the longest way home under the elms on a balmy summer evening. They stood for some time by the gate, trying to distinguish various constellations in the sparkling heavens—so long, in fact, that Frank Kennedy, returning no doubt from similar astronomical researches with Selma, heard Hetty's clear laugh, and paused for a moment, half intending to join her. But his better judgment prevailed; he walked away and disappeared in the darkness. Then Will and Hetty exchanged a good-night over the low gate—several good-nights, in fact—and they parted.

Every thing had gone exactly as Miss Morris wished. She had crushed Frank to the earth with her scorn, and she had shown him that she was by no means dependent on his attentions. Certainly no one could ask for a more devoted suitor than Will Lowry. Every thing he had said during the evening had shown her plainly that she had but to stretch out her hand and take him; and how manly and handsome he was! "I will take him, too, if he offers himself," said Hetty to herself as she put out her light. Then she very consistently cried herself to sleep.

The next day passed like a dream to her. She performed her usual duties as if she were somebody else. Frank was still at work in the barn, having not quite finished his job; but he did not once look toward the house, as far as Hetty could see, much less come toward it; and she noticed that he had left off the customary whistling over his work. Even Farmer Baxter could not complain of any neglect on that day. Just at six o'clock, while she was setting the table, feeling thoroughly wretched and forlorn, her heart gave a great bound. There he stood in the doorway! She had been feeling all the afternoon that if he came to her again, in spite of his offenses she could not resist him. She was too unhappy without him, and now he had come, as she had hardly dared to hope he would do. She hastily summoned all her pride, that her surrender might not be too sudden or absolute, and went forward with a frigid air quite contradicted by her rapidly beating heart.

"This is the key to the tool-house, Hetty," he said, placing in her outstretched hand a cold door-key instead of the fervent clasp she expected. "Tell your uncle I've got through. Good-night!" and he was gone before she could form a reply.

"This is the end of every thing," thought poor Hetty. "Now if Will Lowry comes I will accept him."

Will Lowry did come in the evening, but she had no opportunity of carrying out her resolution, as his aunt came with him expressly to see Aunt Baxter, and they all sat together in the front-room, except Uncle Baxter, who audibly slumbered on the lounge in the kitchen during the entire call, greatly to the mortification of his niece. What that young lady said and did during the evening she could not tell. She was living over and over that cold parting with Frank Kennedy, and feeling again the chill of that disappointing door-key. As the visitors rose to go, Will remarked,

"Aunt Martha, you have nearly forgotten your errand."

"Surely," returned Miss Lowry, producing from some mysterious quarter a huge milk-pan. "We came specially to return your pan. The cakes were splendid. Did you make 'em, or did Hetty? For I want the receipt."

"I always make yeast cakes myself," replied Aunt Baxter, looking bewildered. "But where did the pan come from?"

"Will brought the doughnuts home in it. By-the-way, you promised me some of them yeast cakes."

Aunt Baxter still looked dazed, but Hetty, for the first time seeing a light dawn through the clouds which had for some days overshadowed her, burst into a peal of rather loud and hysterical laughter, which brought Uncle Baxter out of dream-land into the front-room to ascertain the cause of such a startling sound.

"Was it you who took the doughnuts?" cried Hetty, as soon as she could speak. "And you thought they were yeast cakes!" And a renewed peal of laughter attested the poor child's revulsion of feeling.

"Mrs. Baxter said they were in plain sight on the kitchen table," responded Will, in rather an injured tone; "and as they were the only cakes there, I naturally supposed them to be yeast cakes."

"No wonder you went home across lots," cried Hetty, going off into another peal of laughter, in which every body joined.

"Well, I thought myself it was kind o' queer," said Miss Lowry at last, wiping the tears from her eyes; "but I s'posed of course you sent 'em for the society; so we ate 'em up."

That night before Hetty slept she had written a brief note to Frank Kennedy. She had a bitter struggle with her pride before she could make up her mind to take the first step, but the lesson of the last few days had not been altogether lost:

"DEAR FRANK,—I have made a horrible blunder, and I am ashamed of myself. If you feel that you can forgive my abominable treatment of you, come to see me, and I will explain. H. M."

She was sitting under a tree in the orchard idly rolling one or two half-ripe apples about on the grass. She had watched and waited all day for Frank; and now, as evening was drawing on and he had not come, she was beginning to think he was too deeply offended to seek her again. A shadow passed between her and the setting sun, and he stood before her.

"Well?" he demanded, gravely regarding her. He loved Hetty Morris better than his own life, but he felt that she had injured him solely through caprice, and he felt that he could not lower his dignity even to regain her precious favor.

"I want to ask your forgiveness, Frank," said Hetty, speaking very fast lest her resolution should fail. "I have treated you badly, but it was all a ridiculous misunderstanding."

"Of course you were forgiven before you asked," he said, still gravely, and without offering to sit down. The narrator discredits this magnanimous statement, but the young man said it, nevertheless. "And now," he resumed, "I suppose I may ask the promised explanation."

"It is too preposterous," cried Hetty, breaking into irrepressible laughter. "The truth is, I lost my doughnuts, and I thought you had taken them just for a joke."

"But I did take some, you know," he said, looking puzzled.

"I know you took two," answered Hetty, bursting out again; "but I lost at least a bushel."

Frank Kennedy had come to this interview with a determination to be dignified and, if necessary, stern; but as the sun sank beneath the horizon a belated swallow hurrying home to his family might have heard him remark,

"Whatever else we have at the wedding-supper, be sure and have a batch of doughnuts."

"You may depend on me for that," replied Miss Hetty, smartly, "for I shall rely on that argument to bring Uncle Baxter round."

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE fashions for the next winter will be of the composite order. By this I mean that there will be several styles. Formerly this was not the case; and those who have not carefully observed the modifications that have been wrought in this respect still believe that it is now as of old, and that a complete change will appear at the renewal of each season, without transition or compromise with the existing fashion.

To begin with, the order of the seasons is inverted, now that the wealthy part of the Parisian population have adopted the custom of remaining in the country until December. As to radical changes, they are no longer to be expected; on the contrary, all transformations are wrought with the greatest circumspection, and far from abandoning any existing fashion for something quite different, we modify it by degrees until it insensibly glides into another style. For instance, in spite of all the prognostications to the contrary, crinoline was not suddenly laid aside, but was first contracted, then shortened, then cut in two, suppressing the front, and finally replaced by a simple tournure; and four years were needed to attain this result.

It is the same with suits. Although we may say that it is certain that they will be worn next winter almost as we see them now, they will be reserved more exclusively than before for day wear and for walking. Simultaneously with suits we shall witness the growth in favor of short dresses, without over-skirts or polonaises, but on which the trimming will simulate over-skirts, drapings, and poufs, which we have not succeeded in abandoning suddenly any more than crinoline. Flounces of all sizes, ruches, bias folds, and bows will be used to cover the skirts of these short dresses in such a manner as to make the absence of the polonaise forgotten.

To sum up, therefore, I will say that next winter three styles of dresses will be worn—namely: First, the very long dress, without over-skirt, polonaise, or trimming, but draped in a pouf behind. This dress is so long that, in spite of the pouf being taken up, a long train remains. It is worn for dinners or carriage visits. Secondly, the walking suit, with a polonaise, or else with an over-skirt, waist, and mantelet, or some other wrapping to match. This is the street dress proper, and will be the one most generally worn. Thirdly, the short dress, no longer than the walking suit, but very much trimmed, and in such a manner that the trimming takes the place of an over-skirt or polonaise. With this will be worn a cape or Dolman mantelet. This dress, which is designed for the same use as the walking suit, will be its rival, and perchance its heir-presumptive.

As to bonnets, I defy drawing, description, or even color to reproduce every thing that is made and worn under this name. The latest, which have a gutter pipe in front and are turned up behind in the fashion of a peasant's head-dress, is set on the top of the head, and fastened with a cluster of flowers or loops of ribbon. I know not which should bear the responsibility of these bonnets, the milliners or the hair-dressers. But the fact is that the present style of arranging the hair renders these bonnets necessary, just as these bonnets exact the present style of arranging the hair. Here is an endless chain, you see, which makes it hard to fix the blame. Far from the hair being lowered, it is higher than ever, and is built up in the form of towers, casques, shakos, and turbans. Luckily no one has yet thought of arranging it as a caftan, in honor and emulation of the Shah, whose late visit has excited the imagination of our people to such an extent. But if we have not the caftan, at least we have the diamond-steel aigrette.

These diamond-steel ornaments—that is, steel cut in diamond-like facets—will be the rage during the coming season. Marvels of workmanship are in the course of preparation. There are Shah of Persia diamond-steel aigrettes and pins for the hair, ear-rings with medallions or brooches to match, buttons, and large buckles like those of soldiers' belts. These buttons will be set in three rows on the front of dresses without trimmings. On a fine gray fabric this ornament will be handsome and in good taste, and still very simple; on black, violet, or dark blue it will be more conspicuous, and consequently less tasteful. Large steel belt-buckles will form the centre of huge bows that will be used for trimming toilettes designed for full-dress occasions. Of course the use of this diamond-steel excludes all other jewelry therewith; a dress trimmed with these buttons exacts hair-pins, brooches, and ear-rings of the same style and material.

Some changes are announced in the shape of waists. It will soon be with these as it is with bonnets, their enumeration will be impossible. Jackets will be worn more and more next winter, opening over vests or plastrons—that is, front pieces. The following is a good model of this style:

Demi-trained dress, very much trimmed on the bottom and behind. We will suppose the skirt to be of faille of the favorite new-mown-hay shade—that is, greenish or yellowish gray—with a jacket of the same material, opening very wide over a plastron of velvet of the same color. The front of the skirt is covered with a rounded tablier of velvet like the plastron, trimmed with fringe mixed with jet. This tablier is tied behind by two very long ends cut on the bias. These dresses, and all of a similar style, are more dressy than walking suits, and less so than trained dresses, and will be worn on occasions when the latter would be considered too ceremonious and the former too négligé.

At this moment the modistes are concentrating their efforts on dresses for the demi-season. These may be characterized in two words, silk and woolen—the silk for the skirt, and the woolen for the polonaise. We are no longer confined to plain polonaises over a striped skirt, or figured ones over a plain skirt; the skirt itself now is often composed of two fabrics, one striped for the tablier, and the other plain for the rest of the skirt and the trimmings. The fashion of wearing black silk skirts under light polonaises will continue, and even increase through the fall. I will describe a full traveling suit which I have just seen in preparation.

Skirt of black faille, trimmed with a broad pleated flounce, or rather a pleated band—for it is fastened down on each side—extending all around the bottom, and surmounted by two other similar bands, which extend only to the tablier on each side. Over-skirt of thin light felt gray cloth, with a wide hem stitched with black silk. This over-skirt is very long, and is drawn tightly across the front, and draped only very far back behind the arms. Waist with very deep basque, opening over a large square vest of black faille. Black morocco belt, with oxidized silver ornaments, having a small bag of the same morocco suspended on one side and a very short umbrella on the other.

An immense number of small mantelets, short capes, and hooded collars of bright-colored cashmere or flannel, trimmed with coarse white, écru, or twine guipure, are both in preparation and use. The favorite colors are bright blue, wood, deep green, and, more rarely, red. Dolman mantelets of salmon-color embroidered with black and plum-color, or dark blue embroidered with white, are also seen. These form part of the dresses for the watering-places and the sea-side; but they must be taken into account, because, on the one hand, there are no other fashions for the moment, and on the other, the future and definitive fashions are always to be found in the germ in the eccentricities of the present season, which may be considered as so many trial balloons sent up to ascertain which way the wind blows.

It may be foretold as certain that the fashion of embroidering on silk or wool, no matter what the fabric, without being as general as it is now, will be none the less ruinous, for, with the winter, it will gain in richness what it loses in quantity. This summer every thing has been embroidered, and for the autumn it will be the same. But in winter the garments to be embroidered will be costly silks and velvets, very different from the cheap cotton materials which formed the groundwork in summer. With this silk will be mingled jet, which is again very much in vogue, notwithstanding the short time that has passed since it was banished. It is said, moreover, that steel spangles will be used in embroidery, even on dark fabrics. Ye stars, how they will shine!

Very high Spanish combs of dark or light shell will probably be worn more than ever next winter. They will be set straight on the middle of the head or on one side, according to the style of face; the latter arrangement is only suited to persons with irregular features and an arch and piquant expression. A pomegranate blossom and a black lace mantilla properly complete this Spanish coiffure; the large combs, however, are often worn without either mantilla or flowers. Curls are worn, but rather short than long, and the hair is still combed up so as to leave the nape of the neck bare.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

EPEIRA DIADEMA.

ONE OF OUR SUMMER GUESTS.

"Web-Spinner was a miser old,
And came of low degree:
His body was large, his legs were thin,
And he kept bad company!"

PARTLY true and partly false, all honor nevertheless to our well-beloved Mary Howitt, who, in the matter of acquaintance with the distinguished family of Arachnida, was simply unfortunate. Could she have seen, as have we, the great friendliness existing between Sprite-Spinner, the arbor autocrat, and Miss Dorothy, presiding mistress of Brett Lodge, the last line of my quotation would perchance have been modified; for very certain it is that Miss Dorothy is eminently "the very best of company"—always making friends with the creeping, buzzing, flying folk about her; always stretching out protecting arms in their defense. "It's nothing against them that they can not speak our language," she would say, with a pretty assumption of resentment; "no more can we theirs; and it's noticeably true that upon some points our human knowledge and book-learning seem of exceedingly small account when attempting to elucidate the ways of doing and living that's written within them—'graven on their hearts,' as one may say, by the Master's own hand. Yes, yes, their lives are the echoes of His great lessons, and every day something new is unfolded to us who patiently watch their outgoings and incomings."

Miss Dorothy's great soul conned many lessons through this loving intimacy with bird and bee, and no less acknowledged herself the grateful recipient of unwritten lore from observing how "Web-Spinner" drew his coils about him, gathering his forces from apparently such feeble beginnings, and, too, after the instinct within him, "gained his bread."

Once established in his aerial castle, Sprite-Spinner held receptions daily. His "outfit" was regal. In the matter of "hangings," of broideries, and silken wrappings, no costliest robe of fleecy lace could in the least compare. I have sometimes thought it possible that "Web-Spinner" may regard all our human attempts in this line as absurd forgeries, or at best but blundering copies of nature's handiwork. Epeira Diadema held sway upon the top of an ancient brier-bush, tall, prickly, branching, yet sufficiently leaved to afford a pleasant background of tender sombreness, and so high that children could not reach his dew-drop pavement. He knew his advantage, and bravely set himself to weave his silken coils, not forgetting the traditional "winding-stair," so fatal to all simple-minded ones.

Not long after the royal weaver had set up his fairy loom, Miss Dorothy, passing that way, first descried the arbor king, a hale old fellow of rotund body, quite equaling in size the end of her plump thumb; his coat was of glossy black, with trimmings and feathery flutings much resembling in hue the soft, shining tints of the meadow buttercup. Spreading out from his aldermanic presence, and looking for all the world like a point lace carpet, were spun the silken tissues, millions of them threading out in lovely figures, the numerous radiations intersected and strengthened in a marvelous manner by the cunning artificer. Line after line of the slender filaments were deftly drawn from that wonderful spinneret supply, and yet there was no lack. Miss Dorothy had read much of this portly artisan; of his limitless resources; of the viscid fluid, capable of being woven with such subtle power; but to see it accomplished by the big spider himself was like a revelation direct. His adroit movements, his sly winks in examination of hoped-for pantry supplies, and stealthy glances toward floating members of the fly fraternity, were very funny.

Miss Dorothy's second call was no less rich in results. A new picture of household thrift was unexpectedly presented. In an unguarded moment foreign entanglement had interfered seriously with the completeness of the busy weaver's daylight labors, and at the moment of her approach Epeira Diadema was endeavoring to repair the unseemly rent. With keen eyes the little woman noted the marvelous adaptation to the emergency, and saw the skillful strengthening of the silken carpet by means of wooden weights. At first the wily creature with unerring vision let out gradually from a spinneret a tiny filament; slowly it unfolded in length until a bit of chip was reached, and which it firmly adhered to; slowly another line of connection, parallel to the first, reached the block, and so over and over again until a cord sufficiently strong was banded, when the block itself was deftly raised to position, and effectually pinioned the weak corner of the delicately woven web. This done, the portly guardian of the premises addressed himself to the tattered mesh on the opposite corner, adding there also "a staple;" after which he planted his burly figure upon a well-inclosed central platform, and resigned himself to make-believe slumber. An actual snooze was not to be thought of; hunger pressed him sore; and, with half an eye upon anterooms opening from the "winding-stair," Sprite-Spinner calmed his perturbed spirits in joyous anticipation of preying on belated travelers. And not long was he left to fasting. A heedless blue-bottle, soaring with outstretched wing, touched a dew-drop cornice; the reverberation ran through the silken flooring; Epeira pounced upon the victim, and in a moment had dragged the panting speck of life into his lair.

Miss Dorothy, never forgetful in the matter of entertaining strangers, has entered upon her list this royal summer guest; and if flies fail, he will not go unprovided for.

ASHANTEE SKETCHES.

See illustrations on page 556.

AN examination of the maps of the Gold and Slave coasts of Western Africa discloses the following facts. Along the sea-board is a line of forts established by various European nations—namely, the British, Dutch, Danish, Prussian, and French; behind this lies a strip of country, styled the Protectorate, chiefly inhabited by the Fantee tribes; and at the back of this again is the independent kingdom of Ashantee. The limits of this Protectorate are somewhat doubtful of definition, for while, according to some official authorities, they extend seventy or eighty miles inland, according to others they are confined to a tract of only three miles from the sea-board. The recent invasion of the Protectorate by the Ashantees is attributed to various causes—partly to the increased customs duties which were levied on spirits, tobacco, guns, and gunpowder after the cession of the Dutch settlements in April, 1872; partly to the discontent of the King of Ashantee, who asserts that the Dutch had no power to transfer Elmina, which, he says, belongs to him, and for which he received $1500 a year tribute-money; and partly owing to the capture by the Fantee police of a celebrated Ashantee chief named Achampong, a cowardly bully of gigantic stature, who had committed many acts of depredation accompanied by revolting cruelty. Our illustrations are from the pencil of Mr. J. A. Skertchley, recently a resident on the Gold Coast. We have retained the popular spelling of the word Ashantee, but Mr. Skertchley says it should be Ashànti, the accent being laid on the second syllable. The fort of St. George del Mina (or d'Elmina), was built by the Portuguese. Eighty years were occupied in its completion. The parapet is about fifty feet from the bottom of the ditch, which is crossed by a draw-bridge. The tanks underneath the court-yard of the castle contain a practically unlimited supply of water. The fort of St. Jago, which commands the castle, has, however, the unenviable reputation of being fatal to Europeans. Another of our engravings represents the principal gate, or mgenda, of the palace at Coomassie, the capital city of Ashantee, where some captured missionaries have for a long time been confined. The climate of Coomassie is comparatively healthy, the town being situated far above the noxious belt of swamp which fringes the coast. The palace is surrounded by a wall of mud, surmounted by sharp stakes. The porch over the entrance has a thatched roof decorated with skulls. On either side is a shed, supported on pillars, in which the royal guards squat and smoke. The gods in the engraving of Prince Hahansu's fetich house are rudely fashioned of clay and wood, painted red and white. The post to the left of the two central figures is smeared with blood and feathers, as also are the raised platforms on which the other deities are placed. The prostrate figure is a devotee taking Afa; he is covered with a square of a sacred cloth, something like a piece of calico with splashes of blood on it. On another part of the picture may be perceived a cord of blue or white cotton, from which hangs a globe of similar material. This is a life fetich. The little vessels before the gods contain offerings of rum and fruit. Among the principal figures in "A Public Execution" we may notice the herald who plays a gong-gong, and stands on an earthen platform. He wears a sleeveless tunic of striped cotton, a silver horn on his head fastened by a fillet, and carries an embroidered bag ornamented with leopards' tails. The victim is stripped, his waistcoat excepted, his hands are tied behind his back, and he is gagged with a gag of cotton wrapped round a stick, and tied behind his head. Behind him is another victim waiting his turn, wearing a conical cap of white calico. The executioner wears a tunic like that of the herald; from his necklace hangs a large circular plate of gold; on his head is a cap of monkey-skin, with the head in front. His sword has a gold handle and an embossed steel blade.

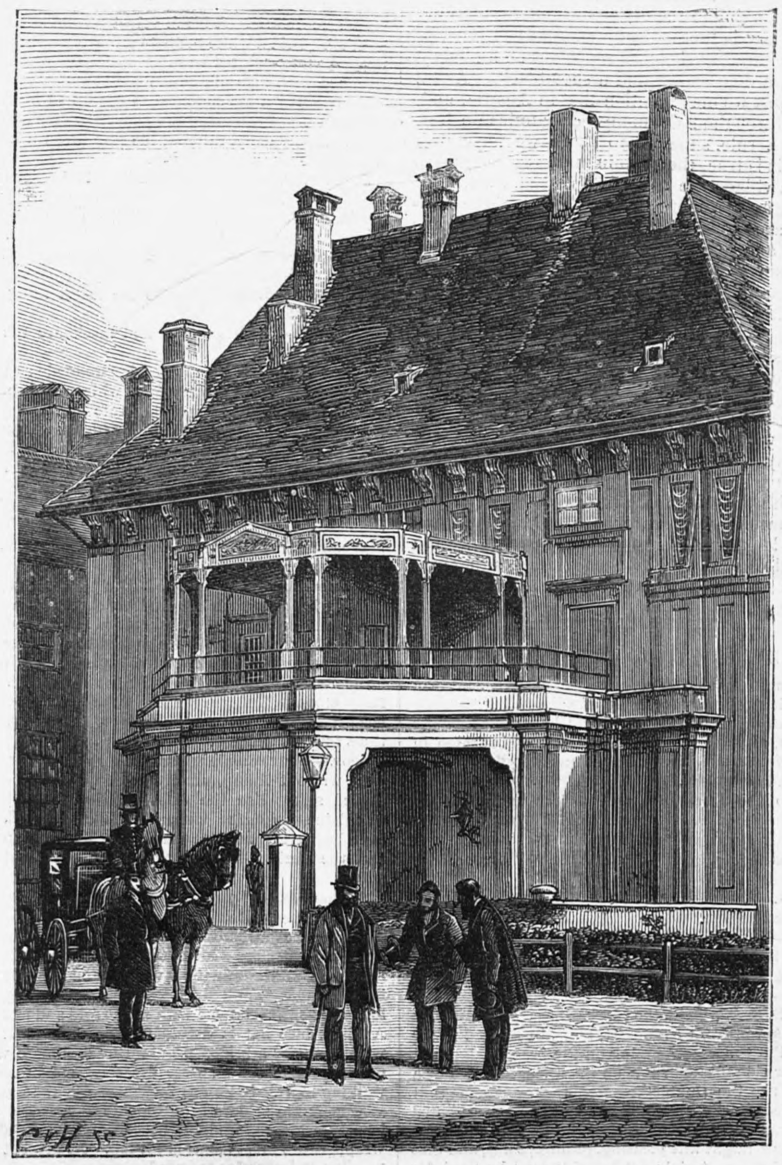
BELVEDERE GALLERY.



PRIVATE ENTRANCE TO THE EMPEROR'S PALACE.

VIENNA still draws the attention of the world, and our readers will be interested in the illustrations given on this page of the Viennese and their buildings. The palace of the Kaiser, the Hofburg, is a picturesque pile of buildings. The most ancient part, the Schweizer Hof, dates from 1210, and was built by Leopold I. The building has been carefully preserved and improved by the reigning families as an heir-loom, the ancient moat being still in existence. The exterior of the Burg, as it is familiarly called, is scarcely impressive, and it owes its main interest to the splendor of the staircases, the royal apartments, and the collections. The imperial family live in the south and more ancient side, and here also are the reception-rooms, and one superb Rittersaal, built in 1805, by Francis I., the place where the grand fêtes and balls take place. In the north portion are the rooms intended for imperial guests, and here also is the chancery, where the archives of the court and empire are kept. The illustration represents the private entrance to the imperial apartments.

The palace of the Belvedere, which contains a magnificent collection of paintings and antiquities, was founded by Prince Eugene in 1693. Here 1700 pictures are exhibited, of which 200 are of the modern schools. More space, however, is needed, and for this reason, it is said, 500 pictures belonging to the collection remain unhung. The gallery is methodically arranged in schools.

The character sketches represent an ambulant harpist, a dog dealer, and a shoe-black. Anent the harpist we may mention that in Austria, and, indeed, throughout Germany, peripatetic minstrels are, as a rule, superior to those we have over here. It is true, they obtain more respect, and in many a village are treated to bed and board for a night for "a mere song." Many of the minstrels are true musicians, while others have strong and yet really melodious voices. The ballad-singer and harpist in our illustration have stationed themselves in the gardens frequented by students, who will not fail to reward their talent. The shoe-black is also a grander man, with his half-permanent stall, than his brother in New York, and does his work carefully and considerately—which is more than can be said of the Austrian hotel "boots," who thinks that if he has well charged the upper leathers with a thick layer of blacking, without the subsequent polishing, he has nobly done his duty. Of the man with the "leetle dawgs" we need say little, save that his wares are, as a rule, skinny and forlorn-looking, and not to be compared with the fat, well-washed, and combed little pets that persuasive dog dealers hawk about our streets in the season.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PALMETTO HALL.—The polonaise pattern sent you is sufficiently dressy for Swiss muslin, but if you had left it for us to choose, we would have sent a looser garment, such as the Blouse-Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI. This is more stylish than a waist and over-skirt.

F. AND M.—Girls of fifteen wear dress skirts reaching to their ankles. Put your hair in a net. Cut the front hair short, and friz it when the long plait is worn behind. Consult the articles to "Ugly Girls" for remedies for freckles.

MRS. J. R. M.—We can not obtain samples or make purchases for our readers.

C. D.—Near relatives usually give presents to the baby at its christening, but it is by no means obligatory. It is considered a mark of esteem to be asked to be sponsor.

MRS. D. S. A.—Make the black alpaca with a jockey basque, apron-front over-skirt, and kilt-pleated lower skirt. Put the merest piping on the basque edge, and a narrow side-pleated ruffle on the upper skirt. For a pattern use the Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Bias gathered ruffles and puffs are not as appropriate trimmings for alpaca as straight kilt pleating, pipings, folds, and bias bands of the material; corded silk may be used for bands and pipings on fine silky alpacas.

MISS N. E. W.—For your gray poplin use the pattern of Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Trim with bias bands of the same, piped with black. Put black silk facing on the revers and collar.

MOLLIE.—Instead of bias pointed bands, put graduated puffs down the three front breadths of your dress, and two gathered ten-inch flounces behind. Turn up the edge of the flounce on the outside, as in French hems, and put a tiny piping fold in the hem. The walking skirt pattern has two side gores, one full back breadth, and a gored front width. Blue gloves are seldom seen nowadays. Velvet ribbon, with a pendent locket or cross, is still worn around the neck in day as well as evening. It is not always necessary for a young lady to shake hands on being introduced to a young gentleman.

A. A.—To wash appliqué lace baste some flannel around a quart bottle, and then baste the lace around the flannel, lapping it row upon row, and tacking the points in order to keep them perfectly smooth. Put it in cold water, over a slow fire, and let it remain until the water boils. Afterward soak it in cold water in which a little sugar or gum-arabic has been dissolved, for stiffening. The lace will be clean and smooth. Do not iron lace, as it crushes the round threads. If the lace is much soiled, put some white soap in the first water. Do not use indigo in the rinsing water, as the lace should be yellow-white, not bluish. Put bias bands on your child's striped dress, and gathered fluted ruffles on the linen lawn. Make the ruffles lap. Tucks are not much used. Pink and colored percales are worn for négligé by children, but white is most fashionable.

LOTTIE.—For your white tarlatan trimmed with black make lengthwise white puffs down the three front breadths, and put a black pinked ruche between each puff. Put wide gathered flounces across the back breadths, and edge them with a narrow side-pleated ruffle of black tarlatan. Heart-shaped neck to the basque of white, with a ruff of black and an inner ruff of white tarlatan. Two puffs on the sleeves, and a ruffle from the elbow. Sash draped round the hips, and tied low on the left side; make the sash part white and part black.

J. R. B.—We can not answer questions about the private life of authors.

ELMIRA.—Your sample is Japanese poplin. The Double-breasted Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., is newer than the Louis Quinze suit, and more stylish for you. Trim according to picture. $3 or $4 a yard for Bonnet's or else Ponson's silk is probably the best outlay for you. Get twenty yards. The dress-maker will ask for more, but can do well with this quantity if she chooses. Dolly Varden goods are no longer worn.

Q. S. G.—Make your plum-colored satine either by the Blouse-Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., or else by the pattern commended above to "Elmira." The gold cross will cost from $15 to $25.

W. M. F. G.—Slice a large green cucumber into a pint of blue skim-milk, let it stand overnight, and apply the milk to the hair, rubbing it in with a brush. Use every other day for a month.

ETTIE H.—Saltpetre is the same as nitre. Dissolve it, making as strong a solution as the water will hold, and apply to the freckles with a hair pencil, letting it dry in. Lemon juice will remove freckles.

S.—There is nothing which will permanently remove superfluous hair. Dilute muriatic acid applied with a fine brush to each hair will remove the growth, but must be repeated as often as it starts again.

ANXIOUS SUBSCRIBER.—Get a polonaise suit of dark iron gray cashmere, a round hat of silk, velvet, and feathers of the same shade, with a cluster of groseille roses for your September traveling and wedding suit. White linen ruffs and undressed kid gloves.

LEONTINE.—For traveling dress read reply just given "ANXIOUS SUBSCRIBER." Get also a black silk suit, a plum or olive suit, and a blue evening silk for your trousseau dresses. A black velvet bonnet will answer with all. Bridal white bonnets are utterly out of fashion. A violet-colored wrapper of delaine or cashmere trimmed with bias silk bands would suit you.

RABY.—Try a tea-spoonful of the oil of mace in an ounce of brandy to make the hair grow on a high forehead. Apply daily, rubbing the skin first till it is red, then brushing the tincture in.

JULIA C. D.—Your digestion is out of order if your skin is pasty. Read directions in "Ugly Girl" papers. Antimony is brushed or penciled on the eyelids to darken the eyes, but we can not advise its use. You evidently need a good deal of out-door air and exercise. Try the tincture of mace for your hair.

DOLLIE B.—Lemon juice is the safest thing to remove freckles.

S. W. W.—Moth patches and mask are the same thing.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Iron gray cashmere made as a redingote and trimmed as you suggest will answer your purpose. Breakfast caps and elaborate hair-dressing are general with ladies of fashion. Bustles are very small; over-skirts are draped as described. We give illustrations of various ways of wearing the hair—both styles mentioned are in vogue.

EMMA.—Get a darker shade of silk for puffs and ruffles on your lavender. Trim your black silk with bias bands and jet fringe on the over dress, and flounces on the lower skirt.

LOUISE.—Day pillows are nearly a yard square, being slightly broader than deep. You should make plain slips, and have single square shams laid smoothly on them in the daytime. Put a tucked hem or else fluted ruffles around the edge, and a large braided or embroidered monogram or initial in the centre. The fancy stores will stamp the letters for you. The Bazar has given many models of single letters and combinations for this purpose.

SPOT.—Your sample will make a good winter redingote without lining, simply bound, and faced with corded silk. Use the double-breasted or else the châtelaine polonaise pattern. Your gray silk will look best trimmed with a much darker shade of silk. Use the dark silk for vest, coat sleeves, sash, and ruffles.

SUBSCRIBER.—If you can afford a light silk for your wedding dress, let it be either white or pearl-color—pink is not at all suitable. Bridal veils are not worn with colored silks. Make the Irish poplin with tight redingote, and trim with a velvet band and kilt pleating. The black silk should have a jockey basque and long over-skirt trimmed with a bias fold and jet fringe. A black lace hat is decidedly more suitable than a white one for a bride. Foulard or cashmere will be most suitable for an over dress with a brown silk walking skirt. Suits are most worn in the morning. Wrappers are seldom seen outside of a lady's chamber. Cashmere, foulard, or checked silk Gabrielle wrappers are most admired for fall. At present white muslins and percales are used.

A GOOD Sewing-Machine is a household treasure that no family can afford to do without. If you want the best, the Wilson Underfeed should be your choice. It combines in the most perfect manner all the requisites of durability, simplicity, ease of operating and perfection of work, and is sold at a less price than any other first-class machine. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

THE RECORD OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN.

THE LIFE OF THE REV. ALFRED COOKMAN. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

An interesting specimen of religious biography. Alfred Cookman was, in his sphere, a remarkable man. Gifted with extraordinary eloquence, sincere and zealous in his calling, he attained a position in the Methodist Church second only to that of the great men through whom the denomination started into life and became a power in all Christian lands. His ruling desire, through the whole of his useful life, was to act the part of a faithful minister of the Gospel, to guide the erring, to comfort the afflicted, to console the sorrowing, to carry the light of truth into all the dark places of society. The record of such a life is worth preserving. As a Christian minister, the memory of Alfred Cookman is endeared to thousands. Dr. Ridgaway's biography is written in a tone of affectionate admiration, and we doubt not it will meet with a very cordial reception.—N. Y. Evening Post.

M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA.

Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. By the late Rev. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D., and JAMES STRONG, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. The first Five Volumes comprise the letters A to Mc. Price per Volume, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Morocco, $8 00. (Sold by subscription. Agents wanted.)

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS

The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (In a few days.)

We can not but congratulate ourselves on having fallen in with Mr. Tyerman's "Oxford Methodists." Recent writings on the Wesleys by the same hand were received, if we are not mistaken, with very general interest, and the present volume may fairly take its stand with these. It supplies portrait-lives of five of the less known participators in that enthusiastic movement that has run Tractarianism such a neck-and-neck race. The book will be acceptable to all except those who can afford to dismiss such movements as mere instances of zeal without discretion.—Examiner, London.

Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley." 3 vols., Crown 8vo, $7 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Castelar's Old Rome and New Italy.

OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

* * * Critical acumen is not, however, the most striking characteristic of the writer of this very remarkable book. Its chief merit lies in the author's love and reverence for human nature, in his perfect trust in the ultimate success of its strivings after all good, and his sympathizing appreciation of its past and present struggles with difficulties now inseparable from human existence.—Examiner, London.

We have a delightful series of well-written chapters, which profess simply to be a record of the emotions awakened in the mind of the writer by the marvelous spectacles of Italy. This account of the impressions of a thoughtful and imaginative writer is highly interesting. Some of the chapters are really short, brilliant essays, in which grave reflections are to be found side by side with lively sallies of humor.—Athenæum.

FACETIÆ.

AN extensive land-slide in Oregon lately carried an entire township into an adjoining county, and the residents of that wandering town now refuse to pay their taxes in the county they slid from, because they are not there; nor will they pay them in the county into which they slid, because they say they don't belong there.

It is no good nowadays for a man to offer his hand if there's nothing in it.

An amateur farmer wonders "why, on all this fair earth, the ground is spread bottom side up, so that it must be turned over with a plow before crops can be raised."

Being shown some very fat cattle at the Home Farms at Windsor, and understanding that they had been fed upon oil-cake, the Shah grew quite animated, and said to the interpreter, "Ask if oil-cake is good for wives."

A clergyman lately said that the modern young ladies were not the daughters of Shem and Ham, but of hem and sham.

A young man who keeps a collection of locks of hair of his lady friends, calls them his hair-breadth escapes.

A paper has found out why persons can not sleep. It is because "there is an accumulation in the organism of the products of oxidation, mainly of carbonic acid, that accumulation being favored and controlled by reflex action of the nervous system, which thus protects the organism from excessive oxidation, and allows the organism to manifest its normal functional activity throughout a succeeding rhythmic period." We shouldn't have thought a little thing like that would keep one awake. Persons who can't sleep, however, should put some of the above things into their organism before retiring.

A WARM SUGGESTION.—It is suggested that in building railroads the rails should be heated red-hot, so that the workmen will lay them down rapidly.

A LOOKING-GLASS RAT-TRAP.—A man in Pennsylvania has invented a rat-trap that is made to operate upon the selfish passions of the poor rat, and lure him into trouble. A mirror is set in the back part of the device, beyond the bait, and as his ratship is out on a foraging expedition he espies the bait; at the same time believes his own image in the mirror to be another rat making for it on the opposite side. This is too much for rat nature to stand and be cool over, so he rushes for the bait, and is caught.

If you had a tiresome relation in the money-lending trade, would it not be well for you to get him to leave you a-loan?

The subject of impressions at first sight was being talked over in a family circle, when the mother of the family said,

"I always form an idea of a person on first sight, and generally find it correct."

"Mamma," said her youthful son.

"Well, my dear, what is it?"

"I want to know what your opinion of me was when you first saw me."

What is the comparative of "sweet night?"—Evidently sweet nitre.

The marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh to the daughter of the Czar, which has been so long "on the cards," is to come off at last, and the event is shaking fashionable society to its very centre. It has been lamented that the ceremony could not have taken place during the Shah's visit to England, so that he could have been shown a royal wedding. But, after all, to a man who has been through the interesting ceremony sixty-five times it could hardly be much of a treat.

"WONDER WHAT THEY WANT!"

A VIEW OF THE WORLD.

If you want to see the world at its worst—
  Distorted and base and vile—
You only need to be nicely cursed
  With a smart attack of bile.

And you hate each living soul in the world,
  And yourself the most of all,
And your bitterest imprecations are hurled
  Against this earthly ball.

Beauty looks yellow, and sweets taste sour,
  And you loathe the thought of food,
And you treat all persons within your power
  In a manner harsh and rude.

And never—never—never again
  Will the world seem ought but ill,
Till you've slaked your thirst with many a grain
  Of that compound rhubarb pill!

LIKE FOR LIKE.—At the present season hay fever is prevalent in some districts. Homeopathy supplies the remedy for this complaint. The natural antidote to hay is straw. It is best taken in the form of strawberries, of which, as all the straw they contain has only a nominal existence, the patient need not limit himself to infinitesimal quantities, but can eat any amount.

A CORSET NOT TO BE MADE LIGHT OF—The taper bodice.

YOUNG ADDERS.—A teacher who in a fit of vexation called her pupils a set of young adders, on being reproved for her language, apologized by saying that she was speaking to those just commencing their arithmetic.

All women ought to be dear to a man. Some are—very.

The following advertisement appeared recently in an English paper: "St. James's Church.—On Sunday next the afternoon service will commence at half past three, and continue until further notice."

The young man who fished for a compliment caught a dab—in the eye.

A WATER-BED—A spring mattress.

ÆSTHETICS.

JABBERLY. "Was awfully snubbed by Mrs. Dulcimer last night, at the opera, for talking to her while they were singing."

MARIA. "I think she wants taste, then. A heavy, rough voice contrasts so well with music, and adds flavor to it, as an olive does to claret."

SLIPPING THROUGH SLIPPERS.

[Have you read Mr. Trollope's Three Clerks? Then read it again.]

Yes, well I know your words are true,
I promised this last dance to you,
  The fact I can't deny:
Yet do not deem a maiden false,
Nor think she'd with another valse
  While you are standing by.

Think not because my card I've lost
That something hath my temper crossed,
  Nor judge me a coquette;
Fain would I in the giddy whirl
With you my partner madly twirl,
  And all my grief forget.

But ah! to-night my joys are o'er,
No more I tread the polished floor—
  (I thought you never frowned?)
For (whisper) satin is not strong,
And, Henry, having danced too long,
  My toes are on the ground.

The old Duke of B——, as is well known, was a confirmed hypochondriac. Buddle met him one day coming from Sir James Clarke's, whom he had been consulting on his complicated ailments. The Duke of B—— was looking profoundly melancholy and out of humor.

"Well," said Buddle, with his usual cheery voice, "what did Sir James say?"

"What did he say!" answered the duke, with the greatest irritation; "the dashed fool said I had a temperament!"

"Temper, he meant," remarked Buddle, aside, and went his way.

Mrs. Malaprop says that it is no wonder she looks stern in her photographs, for she was taken by the Serious-copy Company.

GOOD STAND.—A Frenchman being about to remove his shop, his landlord inquired the reason, stating, at the same time, that it was considered a very good stand for business. The Frenchman replied, "Oh yes, he's very good stand for de business. By gar, me stand all day, for nobody come to make me move."

The late Lord Brougham was discussing with his friend the Earl of Ossory the character of a certain statesman, who certainly gained no small share of his popularity by his handsome countenance and genial disposition. "If the man had started in life as a prize-fighter," said Lord Brougham, "and been successful, he could scarcely have owed more to his physical and less to his intellectual qualities." This was very bitter; but we must remember that the great law reformer did not owe much to his external charms.

A PAT REJOINDER.

At Oxford, some twenty years ago, a tutor of one of the colleges limped in his walk. Stopping one day last summer at a railway station, he was accosted by a well-known politician, who recognized him, and asked him if he was not the chaplain of —— College at such a time, naming the year. The doctor replied that he was.

"I was there," said the interrogator, "and knew you by your limp."

"Well," said the doctor, "it seems my limping made a deeper impression than my preaching."

"Ah, doctor," was the reply, with ready wit, "it is the highest compliment we can pay a minister to say that he is known by his walk rather than by his conversation."

A SEVERE THREAT.—A man who had his new hat exchanged for an old one in a barber's shop advertises that unless it is returned he will forward to the wife of the person who took it the letter found concealed in the lining of the old one.

Experience is the pocket-compass that few think of consulting till they have lost their way.

A HAPPY THOUGHT.

A little boy, six years old, and a little girl, eight, were looking at the clouds one beautiful summer evening, watching their fantastic shapes, when the boy exclaimed,

"Oh, Minnie! I see a dog in the sky."

"Well, Willie," replied the sister, "it must be a sky terrier."

POWERS OF IMAGINATION.

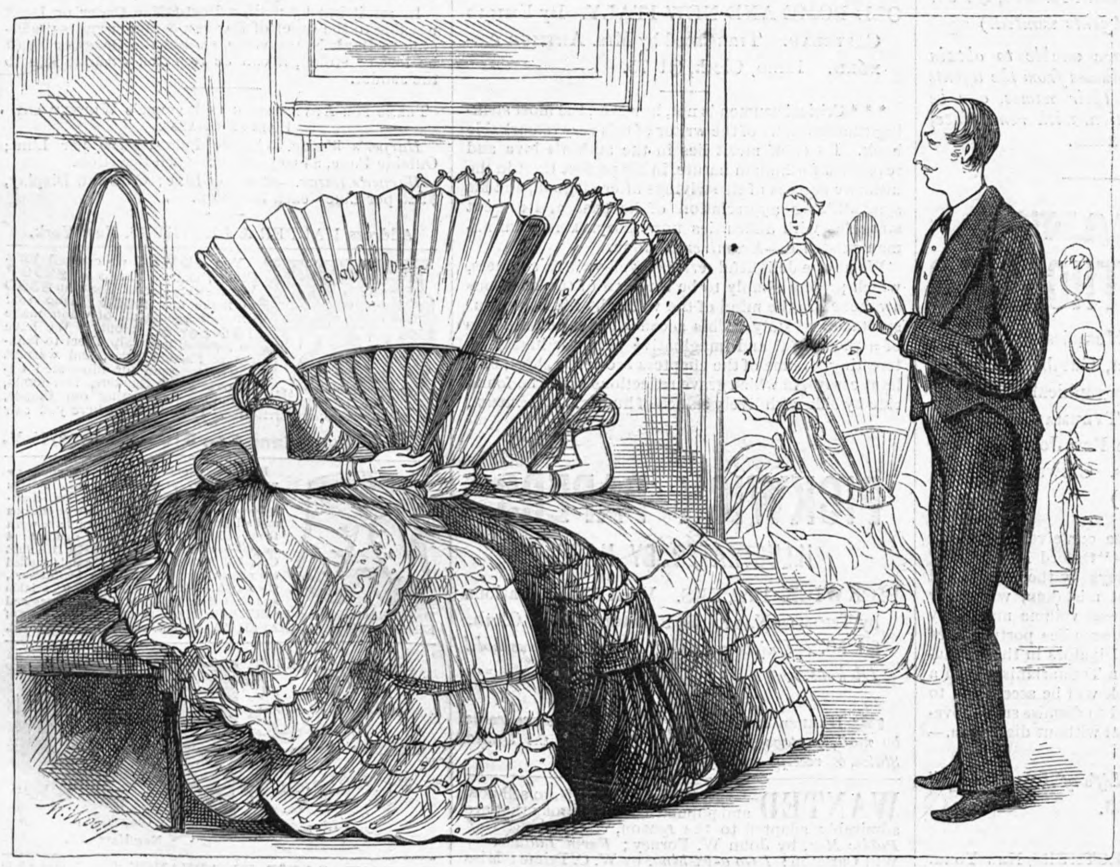
At a large dinner-party once the poet Rogers was speaking of the inconvenience of having windows formed of one sheet of glass.

"They look as if there were no glass," he said. "A short time ago, as I sat at the table with my back to one of these panes, it appeared to me that the window was open, and such was the force of imagination that I actually took cold."

"Dear me," said Mr. Babbage, who sat opposite, "how odd it is, Mr. Rogers, that you and I should make such a very different use of the faculty of imagination! When I sleep unexpectedly away from home, and consequently have no night-cap, I should naturally catch cold. But, by tying a piece of packthread tightly round my head, I go to sleep imagining I have a night-cap on, and catch no cold at all."

A STAMP YOU CAN'T BUY—The stamp of a gentleman.

The following is the translation of an advertisement in the Paris Journal: "M. A. Lefeuve, 48 bis Rue Basse du Rempart, begs the lady in black who does not like draughts in omnibuses to kindly send him his purse, which she found in his pocket on the 1st July, and to keep the money it contained as a reward for her address."



WHAT NEXT?

Young Brown thought the Ladies had reached the Extent of their Folly with their Chignons, but he now confesses that the new Style of Fans is decidedly ahead of any thing yet.

A CORDIAL WELCOME.

MISS BINGS. "Thank you, dear, for coming this wet, gloomy Weather. I feel I can lay my Head on your Lap and weep all Day without saying a Word."

DAME VESPA VULGARIS.

"The little people that live in the air
Are not for my human hands to wrong."
—ALICE CARY.

AUNT BEATTY may justly be considered a good woman, since she it was who not only refrained from destroying our neighbor's tenement, but turned my attention to the cunningly devised structure going up under our very eyes, supplementing her kindness to the new-comer by a suggestion of such sweets and toothsome bits as are by the average wasp heart regarded as luxuries. Books are all very well in their way, giving a pretty fair idea of plans and theories, still it is quite an advance to see for one's self how certain small builders actually work; how, hour after hour, with a persistency most wonderful, the instinct plan is evolved, and the house-place grows not only to comeliness and strength, but, in the matter of proportion and capability of lodgment for the swarm that will presently slumber within its walls, indicates the presence of rare arithmetical powers.

Upon materfamilias rests all the responsibility of getting a good spring start. She is supreme manager of the trim little establishment. Our beauty, Aunt Beatty's pet, which in our affection has been named "Goldie," is an odd, dainty-looking little house-builder, settling all the arrangements, doing all the labor, urging on with individual speed the completion of a castle most puzzling in construction to our wisest master-builders, to say nothing of the dexterity and simple straightforwardness and trust manifested by Madame Wasp in the furtherance of her delicately outlined snuggery.

The dwellings of the wasp family are often under-ground tenements, but at times, prompted by some inner light, they select a corner in human habitations, among people who have friendly eyes, whose "ways" are full of tenderness, and whose hands are rich in blessing. Swallows, robins, wasps, and other migratory lodgers never fail of finding about the veranda of Aunt Beatty's cottage the most ample accommodations. The little creatures seem to read in her eyes the law of love that is written upon her heart, and year after year return with friendly buzz or song in token of amity and thanks.

Among the briskest and busiest of our roof-tree friends is "Goldie." The corner decided upon, she addressed herself diligently to toil, and many little journeys to and fro in search of "material" resulted in regular flittings back and forth between the house-place and an old arbor, whose shattered timbers, softened by time, would almost crumble at the touch. This rich store-house afforded every essential, and rapidly the castle grew. Chamber after chamber was outlined, and the old woody fibres, gnawed and worked over until a fine pulpy mass was formed, was skillfully applied by her jaws and one pair of legs, until pillars and cornices were fashioned to her mind, until terrace upon terrace of the most lovely hexagonal cells was completed. Here, in the quietest of slumbering-places, the eggs are placed—continually. So the cares of Mother Wasp increase, but she never shows fatigue, and always appears in the neatest, trimmest suit imaginable. The livery of their craft is exquisitely beautiful, blending as it does the golden hues of the dandelion's cup with the glossy tints of the raven's wing.

The poor wasp has among human folk many detractors, occasioned, no doubt, by certain little annoyances genteelly termed "petty larceny." Dame Vespa Vulgaris is indeed very partial to fruit and sweet things, and has a way of asserting individual rights not altogether agreeable to the owners and defenders of such delicacies. Still it must not be forgotten that by nature they are "foragers," and in this particular "right of way" is their inheritance. Yet more: compensation obtains in every situation, and to the predatory excursions of Dame Wasp this law applies with force. Flies are not such favorites in sunny weather that we mourn over their destruction, and Madame Vespa, following out the instincts of her being, finds that in the matter of daily sustenance she must depend largely upon this sister winged fraternity, so that gardener, grocer, and keen-eyed housekeeper may not only tolerate the coming of such neighbors as "Yellow-Jacket and cousins," but be sufficiently grateful to offer them free lodgings and occasional tokens of amnesty.

Aunt Beatty is above the average in this matter, and, blending courtesy and consideration, is much relieved with regard to that most inconvenient buzzing that in summer-time is likely to be a continual presence.

VENTILATION AND WARMING.

WHEN the people in a house are habitually unconscious of their sensations of heat or cold, its ventilation is a success. But this perfection can not be had without some one taking considerable thought about it. Instead of showing contempt of old arrangements, let a little sense be turned to making the best of them. Windows, doors, and stoves play the part of common ventilators, and should be adjusted after the principles of ventilation, which are so familiar but so illy practiced. The heat should be neither above nor below seventy degrees, and the air constantly changed, so that foul escapes and pure enters. So much every body knows. But people who control the ventilation of buildings, whether as sextons or householders, usually have one or two enormous crotchets—first, that it is dangerous to allow more than seventy degrees of heat any where in a room, or that it is equally dangerous to admit any degree of cold. What is essential not only to comfort but to health and life is to keep the floor the warmest part of the room, to heat the walls so as to make up for the escape of warmth through them into the outer air, and to heat the fresh air on its entrance so as to prevent cold draughts, as well as to force out the bad air. Finally, there must be a constant supply of moisture in the atmosphere. Houses are warmed by direct radiation of heat from an open fire or stove, or by currents of warm air in flues or steam-pipes. The system of hot-air pipes is out of favor, because the air is unhealthy from its dryness, and because of the great danger of escaped gas through the joints of flues. Steam heat is delightful if the pipes are watched to prevent leaking and unhealthy dampening of the air. For family use no luxury equals that of an open fire or ventilating stove.

The body must never lose its natural heat, and it must have a constant supply of pure air about twenty-eight degrees colder than the blood. If it comes in contact with currents of air or surfaces colder than itself, "the heat, the vitality, the very essence of life," says an authority, "is rapidly extracted from the body." The experience of engineers of ventilation has shown that the walls and floors of rooms should be kept at the heat of the human body—ninety-eight degrees—or the heat of the latter escapes to warm those surfaces. But the air for breathing must be no warmer than seventy degrees. Here is a problem which leads to fault and discomfort incomparable. "This room is unhealthy," says the mistress of a household, seated among her family. "Look at that thermometer—ninety degrees against the wall!" And she orders the fire down, while delicate frames around her shiver in the healthier atmosphere. What is wanted is not less fire, but a constant ingress of pure air for breathing, which would find its way to the lungs at a much lower temperature than that of the room. Thus the serenity of warmth is secured with the exhilaration of clear, bright breathing material.

"Oh, but," cries an alarmed

reader, "it would be the death of us to have air all the time blowing in! Think of the draughts!"

That is because the room is not warm enough to temper the outside air as it enters. What draught can be compared to the August wind which we court, and fear not, because it is warm? The difference is that the breeze is heated itself, and traverses a warm atmosphere. The draught, which sounds less dangerous if we call it "a current of air," would be as welcome, if the room were properly heated. Every room habited by human beings ought to be warm enough to make it agreeable to open a window on an ordinary winter day. The best way to secure this is to place the chimney flues in the outer walls, which are the coldest, and set stoves or radiators directly under the windows, so that the top would be four inches above the bottom of the sash. When the window is raised cold air strikes the heater, and is diffused through the room, not in an icy flight, but in gentle waves warmed so as to cause no discomfort. The perfection of warmth could be secured by making the walls and floors a net-work of fire-proof flues for warm air; but the nearest approach to this is only found in luxurious houses where steam-pipes are laid under the floor. The delicious feeling of walking on a warm surface in cold weather is worth a thousand appliances of show and ornament. The cars of a Michigan railway were fitted with hot-air flues running the length of the car under the seats, so that the feet rested on warm wood all the time, while a current of fresh air was constantly perceptible, which changed all the air in the car every seven minutes, yet none of the passengers felt any thing but delightfully warm. I quote those cars as the only instance of perfect ventilation in memory, whether in private house, hotel, or public building.

SONG—THE WINDS.

THE South Wind sings of happy springs,
And summers hastening on their way;
The South Wind smells of cowslip bells,
And blossom-spangled meads of May:
But sweeter is her red, red mouth
Than all the kisses of the South.

The West Wind breathes of russet heaths,
And yellow pride of woods grown old;
The West Wind flies from autumn skies,
And sun-clouds overlaid with gold:
But the golden locks I love the best
Outshine the glories of the West.

The North Wind sweeps from crystal deeps,
And Arctic halls of endless night;
The North Wind blows o'er drifted snows,
And mountains robed in virgin white:
But purer far her maiden's soul
Than all the snows that shroud the Pole.

The East Wind shrills o'er desert hills,
And dreary coasts of barren sand;
The East Wind moans of sea-blanched bones,
And ships that sink in sight of land:
But the cold, cold East may rave and moan,
For her soft warm heart is all my own.

SMALL ECONOMIES.

THE student of social science who visits this country from abroad is astonished by few things more than by the wanton waste which he finds characterizing the habits of the larger portion of our population. In the great cities of Europe it is almost possible to say that every thing is utilized, nothing lost. In some towns even the sewage is saved and sold, and in the older civilizations of all, the very vermin are turned to account. At the rate in which our own country is filling its census lists, and in which popular orators find such subject for rejoicing, we shall at some future period—unless both social and chemical science proceed beyond a reasonable hope—stand in much the same position as the cities of the Eastern Hemisphere do to-day; and it besteads us to learn in time, before they are forced on our descendants by want, those small economies which we flout at present as being worthy only of small souls, small revenues, and small harvest-fields.

This might be a duty, if for no other reason than that we are stewards here, intrusted with what we hold for the Great Owner's purposes, and having no more right to waste it than a tenant has to impoverish the soil he hires; but certainly it is a duty in the light of the great calls made upon our generosity by those in less happy condition than ourselves; in the light, too, so recently thrown upon us by the glare of our awful conflagrations, of our disposition to give, which seems to be inherent in us as a people, and to be as undisciplined as it is spontaneous, and as spontaneous things are apt to be.

There is no doubt that every year we lose through incapacity and ignorance, through indifference and indolence, an amount that would go far to ameliorate the festering poverty that, on the statistician's page at least, drags our intelligence and virtue down to average with its stupidity and vice; and it becomes an obligation to consider and practice the smaller economies if only because charity begins at home, and because if it does not begin there it will never venture farther. It is in our homes, we say, that this husbandry must begin; for though it is to be acknowledged that there are many houses where no misuse of material can be found—especially in the cities, where, though much is spent, little is squandered—yet we are forced to counterbalance them by myriads of others where careless unthrift sits with the Lares and Penates, perfectly unconscious that its presence expels a hundred comforts and pleasures from the hearth, chief among which may be the power of doing good to others.

To speak of one thing out of a multitude: the lady who flings down the envelope of her letter, to be taken up and burned with other refuse, scarcely stays to think of herself as a destroyer rather than a producer. Yet if the parlor scrap-bag were made an ornament of every parlor in all our million parlors, and every torn envelope, every useless odd and end and broken thread, were scrupulously deposited there till it should be time to turn them over to the junk-man, possibly we might eventually be spared the abominations of disease that come to us from the Levant and elsewhere in the bales of rags that are foul with typhus and small-pox and the sores of lepers. But the careful housekeeper is never without her rag-bag, a wonderful, elastic receptacle, out of which now she draws the new tin-ware for the kitchen dresser, and now the new lamp for the parlor; nay, give it time enough, and we have known it, indeed, to produce a set of china, a hat and feathers, and even a French opera-glass, to say nothing of a hot Christmas dinner for the chore-boy's family. And resolute as the frugal housekeeper is about her rag-bag, she is just as resolute about her soup stock. There is not a bone that leaves her table that does not render tribute to it; there is not a joint of meat that comes into the house that does not undergo trimming at her hands, or at her trustworthy deputy's—trimmings that, well digested in the stock pot, are not merely intended to give a luxurious and extra dish, but which, with the addition of seasonable vegetables and condiments, furnish many an entire meal as appetizing and satisfactory to her family as it would be to a Frenchwoman's, while drippings and skimmings save her the price of countless firkins of leaf lard, and she still contrives to find enough unusable scraps to justify the leach in which her year's ashes are by-and-by set up to produce her year's soap—trifles, to be sure, as we confess the whole to be, but indications of possibility in a score of different directions, and always proof of the vulgar adage that "many a little makes a mickle."

Nor is it necessary for a manager to be a martinet in order to effect infinitely more than such trivialities. The martinet is not always the economist. The housewife in Proverbs who obliged her maids to get up in the middle of the night and spin was not prudent in the matter of candles. But whether or no, the endeavor to perfect a thorough system of the small economies in any ménage is worth all the trouble and any odium, not alone in the earlier appreciable and visible results, but in the shaping of the habits of a new generation reared in its use and custom.

Of course it is in no such petty "saving at the spile," though it extend through innumerable families, that the profuse expenditure and voluptuous tendencies of any age are to be overcome. Those things can only be met by such shaping of the laws as shall prevent the accumulation of the vaster sort of fortunes. But the small economies, aspiring to no such ambitious ends, can afford every housekeeper, so far as her own hand can reach, the means of counteracting the deadly influence of luxury, since they must provide her with a surplus income to apply to those charities that the pleasures of the wealthy will make necessary so long as the Sybarite takes the rose leaf, and leaves the pauper the thorn.

With September commences the best season of the year for good eating. Epicures who are admirers and obedient children of nature look for the coming of September with delight, and, child-like, often anticipate more pleasure than they can enjoy.

Brook Trout.—This delicious fish is permitted to be caught on and after September 15. Brook trout are abundant in the State of New York and in other places. They are at least as good as the much-extolled trout of Switzerland, and certainly deserve odes as well as their European kin.

Oysters.—The spawning season of oysters commences in May, or rather with the warm weather, and closes with August, or when the cold nights cool the water. Oysters are sold all the year round, and some fishermen and oyster dealers pretend that they are just as good in summer as in fall or winter, because, as they say, those sold during the summer are moved about in such a way as to prevent them from spawning. It is sometimes possible to interfere with the laws of nature, if not entirely, at least partially, as is the case with oysters; but the effect produced by the prevention of their spawning does not make them retain their full degree of excellence and wholesomeness.

Although oysters have no head, and consequently are deprived of the senses of sight, hearing, and smelling, they are very sensitive when touched with any thing sharp, such as a pin or the point of a knife, or by merely letting a drop of vinegar or lemon juice fall on their edges, when one shell is removed, and you readily notice the shrinking movement of the part that is touched. In spite of their unsightly and uninviting appearance, few persons eschew that most delicious bivalve. On the contrary, they seem to be universally relished, either raw or cooked. They agree with every one, whether well or sick, and are excellent for dyspeptics and consumptives, taken raw.

It is very wrong to lose the juice that is in the shell when opening oysters. This juice is palatable and healthful. To eat on the half-shell, the oyster should be served on the concave shell instead of the flat one, thus retaining most of the juice; and it is not necessary to drop them in water, as it is customary when opened for stewing, etc.; if properly washed and then carefully opened, there would be enough of their own juice for any purpose.

Oysters, like lobsters, are unwholesome food if eaten raw or cooked when dead. Like lobsters, they live a long time after being taken out of water, if not killed by heat or frost, but they decay quickly when dead. Keeping them in water after being opened prevents quick decomposition, as it keeps them from contact with the air.

The American oyster is much larger than the European, and at least as good. Europeans who pronounce it inferior to their own are as much in the wrong as Americans who pronounce the European the inferior. It is more a question of habit than of taste. We generally prefer what we have been used to eat when young (however poor it may be) to better things the taste of which is new to us. John Chinaman prefers a mouse to on oyster, and Chilians eat any species of agouti, but never touch the splendid oysters that are found along their shores.

We shall give directions for the several ways of cooking oysters in another number.

Shoulder of Venison roasted.—The shoulder is prepared exactly like the leg, as we have directed in a preceding number.

Stewed Venison.—The parts stewed are the breast and the neck; the other parts might be used also, but they are generally roasted or prepared as steaks. Cut the part to stew in pieces not over an inch and a half in length any way, square or any other shape it may come. Put twelve or fifteen onions in a pan with two ounces of butter, and on a good fire, and stir them till they turn yellowish; take them off the pan, and put them away in a warm place. Cut half a pound of salt pork in small dice, both fat and lean part, and fry it partly only in the same butter used for the onions, and put it away also in a warm place. Then fry in the same butter the pieces of venison, stirring now and then until they take color. Dust a tablespoonful and a half of flour all over, and let it take color also while stirring; then add a bottle of claret and a pint of water; also salt, pepper, and the following seasonings in a rag—two bay leaves, two sprigs of thyme, eight of parsley, two cloves, and one of garlic. Boil thirty minutes, and then add the onions and the salt pork. Continue the boiling until cooked, when add half a dozen mushrooms, boil ten minutes longer, remove the rag of seasonings, skim off the fat, and serve warm. One or two glasses of Madeira or port wine may be used instead of claret, if more convenient; in that case, add half a gill of vinegar and more water.

Those who dislike pork may omit it in the above dish, and use an ounce more of butter.

How to use the Leavings.—If what you have left comes from a stew, put it in a tin or crockery pan, which set inside of another pan of boiling water to warm it, and then serve. In case the sauce is too thick, add a little broth. If it comes from a baked, roasted, or broiled piece, cut all the meat in thin slices, and serve cold with a rémolade sauce, or warm the slices in a piquante, poivrade, ravigote, or Robert sauce, and serve warm.

The leavings may also be served as hash of beef.

Musk-Melons.—Many persons are indisposed after eating this excellent leguminous fruit, though unlike the water-melons (which are believed by some to produce mental depression and dyspepsia), still, in some respects, they have the same chilling properties when eaten as a dessert. Their strongly aggregated cellular tissue makes them difficult of digestion. Like the water-melon, they should invariably be eaten the first thing after the soup, and the first of all things if no soup is served, the digestive juices being then more abundant, they neutralize the chilling properties of the melon. When oysters are served, melons come immediately after.

Poivrade Sauce.—Put on the fire in a pan four or five stalks of parsley, one of thyme, one of sweet-basil, a bay leaf, one onion, one clove, and one shallot, all sliced or cut; salt, pepper, and a gill of vinegar; boil until reduced half. While it is boiling put two ounces of butter in another pan, and when melted stir a table-spoonful of flour in, and until it turns brown. Then turn the butter and flour into the other pan; when the mixture of vinegar and spices is half reduced, add also a gill of broth, boil fifteen minutes, strain, and it is ready for use.

Ravigote Sauce.—Blanch for two minutes about half a tea-spoonful of each of the following herbs—burnet, celery, tarragon, chervil, and chives, also a balm leaf, and chop them fine. Put two ounces of butter in a saucepan, set it on the fire, and when melted stir a table-spoonful of flour in until it turns brown; then add a gill of white wine and the same of broth; boil till reduced half; then add the herbs, put the pan on the corner of the range or stove, add and mix well with the whole the juice of a lemon, an ounce of butter, salt and pepper, and use.

Another Ravigote Sauce.—Put in a small saucepan a gill of broth, with the following spices tied in a rag—two cloves of garlic, four sprigs of parsley, as much of peppergrass, one of thyme, a bay leaf, and a clove. Boil gently until reduced about half; then take off the rag of seasonings, add a gill of vinegar and a table-spoonful of gravy, boil, and let it reduce about one-third; strain through a fine strainer, add a few stalks of tarragon chopped fine, half an ounce of butter, and it is ready. The tarragon and butter are added when off the fire.

Robert Sauce.—Slice six large onions and put them in a pan with six ounces of butter; set it on a rather sharp fire, stir, and when turning of a golden color add a table-spoonful of flour; stir until it turns brown, when you add half a pint of broth, six stalks of pepper-grass, and a gill of vinegar; boil half an hour; add salt, pepper, and mustard, and it is ready. By using half white wine and half vinegar the sauce is not quite so sharp.

Hollandaise Sauce.—Melt two ounces of butter in a pan on the fire, and add a table-spoonful of flour; stir fast with a wooden spoon, and as soon as you see that it is coloring add two gills of broth or water, stir again for two minutes, take off, and set the pan in another pan of boiling water; add a few mushrooms in slices, also a few truffles, if liked, a few stalks of parsley chopped, salt, and a table-spoonful of vinegar; stir, and when thickening take off; add and mix in two yolks of raw eggs beaten with a table-spoonful of water and the juice of a lemon. It is then ready for use.

Hollandaise Sauce for Fish.—Put two ounces of butter in a pan on a slow fire, and when melted dredge salt in little by little, stirring with a wooden spoon the while, and until it tastes rather salty; turn over a warm boiled fish, sprinkle lemon juice over, and serve.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL SILKS.

THE silks imported from Lyons for the fall season are soft gros grains of medium fine reps, with brighter lustre than those of last year. The cloth colors now in vogue are again brought out in deeper hues so nearly approaching black that they are well named "invisibles." Conspicuous among silk importations are the great quantities of dark blue shades; summer linens, with cashmere, camel's-hair, and other fine wool fabrics, have become so popular in these hues that it is prophesied dark blue silk suits will find especial favor as winter costumes; and by way of further commendation merchants say these French blues are equally becoming to blondes and brunettes. Under the general head of gros bleu, manufacturers send various shades with specific names, such as black-blue, which is very nearly black; old blue, like the color seen in English china; indigo blue and the dull Napoleon blue were introduced in the spring; tourmaline is the color of the stone of that name, and mandarin is the familiar Chinese blue. There are also mongrel blues with a dash of foreign color—as, for instance, the gray-blues, among which is a sea tint, a "deep and dark blue ocean" color, appropriately called Byron; a still grayer, more murky shade, is Euxine blue, while a lighter tint is known as romarin, or rosemary. Greenish-blues are not as largely imported as formerly, but a few of the peacock shades are shown and labeled canard blue, or else hirondelle, or swallow blue, a soft dark shade of peculiar beauty.

Since the advent of the Shah the green shades are all dubbed Persian green, but there is nothing in the name, for they retain precisely the yellow tinges familiar to us in olive and bronze greens; the tea greens of various shades, with sage, myrtle, moss, and rifle green, are all reproduced. Among bronzes, which are darker than ever, brown bronze and black bronze will probably find most favor. Pure and unadulterated shades of brown are so dark that the color is invisible except in certain lights; in this list is Turco brown, corbeau or crow-black brown, and encre or ink brown. The clearest grays are the stylish ardoise or slate gray, and dark iron gray. Mixed blue-grays and the réséda-tinged green-grays are again displayed, but are no longer new; oxidized silver gray, and a dark purple-gray that will look well associated with violet, are especially admired. Deep royal purple, plum-color, puce, and blue prune are largely imported. The new groseille, or currant-color, and French écarlate, which is softer and darker than ordinary scarlet, are the only red shades found among rich gros grains. For evening silks are those pale shadowy tints that require gas-light to deepen them and develop their beauty; these are labeled rose pastel, Indienne blue, Nile green, and gris-fin, or pearl-color.

WINTER GARNITURE.

Galloon ribbon in which jet and steel beads are woven will, it is said, be preferred to vine passementerie for trimming this winter. Thick, heavy passementerie cords worn swinging from the shoulder have not met with favor here, but are again largely imported. Fringes of every description are brought out; there are fringes entirely of jet, and others of silk with jet drops on the end; sewing-silk fringe, bullion fringe, tassel fringe, and the goffered or crimped tape fringe now so much used. There are also heavy wool fringes for trimming camel's-hair diagonals and other rough-surfaced wool fabrics. Moiré ribbons for bows and sashes, and moiré cut on the bias for folds, bands, and facings, are shown as part of the stock of trimming departments.

FRENCH BONNETS.

The first importation of French bonnets for the autumn shows something like a return to original bonnet shapes. They have broad crowns and high coronets cut in square turrets, or else dipping fronts with flaring sides. They have also very full face trimmings, while at the back is a band that suggests a return to capes. Most of the trimmings in the way of flowers and feathers are massed on the back, but there is very little pendent drapery of lace, ribbon, or silk. Pompons, aigrettes, and ornaments of cut steel or jet are stuck directly in front, in imitation of a conspicuous ornament worn by the Shah. The face trimming is a full vine of leaves, a wreath of flowers, or else a twist of silk knotted at intervals, or else dotted with flowers. The Rabagas, which may be either a bonnet or hat, according as strings are added or omitted, is again imported. One lovely model is of black velvet, with high coronet sloping lower on the sides. Below the coronet as a face trimming is a torsade of blue and réséda royale passing plainly above the forehead, and fastened in a large loose knot on the left side. A bow of standing loops is made of these two colors, and, with a pompon, is placed upright in front; royale bands pass around the crown, with very short ends hanging behind.

Gros de Suez, a soft, flexible, finely repped silk, will be used for trimming bonnets of velvet, straw, and royale. Large groseille red roses brighten bonnets of the sombre fashionable hues. Trimming silks of very light shades are used as facings and other garniture on dark velvets. Some of these combinations are new and peculiarly pretty; for instance, a bonnet of invisible brown velvet has pale blue facings and purple pansies; a violet velvet bonnet has réséda pipings on the crown, with groseille roses hanging low on one side; a black velvet bonnet shows a pale blue pleated facing in front, with a coronet wreath of green leaves, while drooping low behind is a long ostrich plume of mingled green and blue shades; a garnet velvet bonnet has soft gray facings; and a Persian green has trimmings of a lighter shade, with groseille roses. It is said flowers will be more worn than is usual on winter bonnets. Ostrich pompons and aigrettes will be more fashionable than short curled tips. Long plumes sweeping over the crowns of round hats are already in favor, and will advance in price when fall millinery is displayed in the retail stores.

FALL SUITS.

Private modistes and the furnishing houses are preparing dresses for the early fall from directions sent over by their commissioners in Paris. Long waists, tight sleeves, and high full ruffs are considered the necessary features for giving style to the various jockey basques, round waists, and polonaises. Double-breasted redingotes will have ruffs placed inside. Single-breasted polonaises have a pretty finish given to the neck by adding a standing English collar with pointed revers front, made of the dress material, or else of the silk with which it is trimmed. The neck of the dress is cut very high in the throat, and above this collar appears a white muslin ruff, which is to be worn very close and high all around, and is called the "Amy Robsart" ruff. The edges of polonaises and over-skirts of silk and fine woolen suits are finished by a bias band two inches wide, with a double piping fold on the upper edge; for instance, a polonaise of black and white striped silk is trimmed with a bias striped band, with two tiny folds of black silk set in above. Ruffs of dress material are prettiest when made to serve as trimming for the front of the corsage, instead of merely passing around the neck. On the striped polonaise just mentioned the striped ruff is lined with black silk that extends over the outside like a piping fold. This ruff is pleated into an inch-wide bias band that begins at the waist under a bow, passes up outside of the buttons in front, and extends around the neck behind just below the binding. The pleating begins half-way up the corsage, where it appears from beneath the band, and gradually widens toward the back. It should be two inches wide (or perhaps three for long necks) in the back, where it is held in a wide box-pleat, and is then laid in double side pleats—that is, one pleat is laid upon another to give fullness. Three of these double pleats will be enough, and then follow six or seven shallow side pleats. The lace or muslin ruff is basted on the neck of the dress, and does not extend down the front with the silk ruff.

French chroniclers of fashion say polonaises will be worn very long and flat in front, much shorter behind, and looped high on the sides. The long straight scarf front, with square corners below, and clinging closely to the figure, is seen in imported suits. Silk skirts are trimmed with bias bands of cashmere, and so profusely trimmed that it is difficult to decide whether the skirt is of silk or cashmere. Small mantles, pelerines, and Dolmans with square mantilla fronts will be added to polonaises to give necessary warmth. English sacques of "diagonal" cloths will be in vogue for early fall.

VARIETIES.

The newest fancy for arranging sashes worn with evening dresses is to drape them in a half circle in front, letting them swing low around the edge of the over-skirt apron; they are then caught up to the waist on each side and tied in a long loose bow with hanging ends on the left. Watered ribbon sashes draped in this way are admired for muslin dresses, and garlands of flowers are similarly arranged. Velvet sashes are rather heavy for this style, but are worn nevertheless.

Instead of neck-ties with ruffs, a cravat bow with very long ends is worn in front, and is preferred to a brooch. This is a simple bow of black velvet ribbon or of colored gros grain ribbon, two inches wide, with ends a yard long hanging straight down in front. The black velvet bows are worn with light dresses, while colored bows brighten black costumes. Another fancy is to wear a bow of China crape high on the left side of the ruff instead of in front. Pretty little tricolor clusters of rose-buds are worn in the same way on afternoon dresses, and are especially pretty with black grenadine and white muslin toilettes. Ladies are also wearing tiny bouquets of natural, loose, cut flowers stuck in the belt, or else in the button-hole of double-breasted polonaises, precisely as gentlemen wear their button-hole bouquets.

Short umbrellas are worn stuck in the belt like a dagger, protruding behind and before in an inconvenient way, not nearly as graceful as the fashion of hanging the umbrella by a châtelaine. This is, however, a part of the "grasshopper bend," a summer folly introduced at Saratoga, where the absurd Grecian bend first appeared.

PERSONAL.

DR. JARVIS, of Boston, has to be thankful for the existence of dukes and counts. When ALEXIS was here, Count SCHAUVANLOFF, of his suite, was detained at the Revere House, Boston, by an injured limb. He became acquainted with JARVIS, M.D., and made inquiries relating to the statistics of labor in this country. A few days since Dr. J. received a large box from the count containing more than one hundred volumes of Russian statistics, about 38,000 royal octavo pages. Count SCHAUVANLOFF told Dr. JARVIS that his father expected to lose a large part of his fortune on account of the emancipation of his serfs, but the measure resulted in a gratifying pecuniary advantage.

—A Prussian Amazon has appeared on the theatre of war in Spain. A Valentia newspaper says: "We have had the pleasure of seeing the Prussian heroine announced, who will, it is said, command a battalion of volunteers against the Carlists. She is well grown, hardly twenty-five years old, has a rather pretty face, and blonde hair. She wore a long upper garment, long riding trowsers, and a Phrygian cap, and carried a cavalry sword."

—It is affecting to learn that the late Dean of Winchester, who had well-nigh reached one hundred years of age, died at last "through taking medicine too strong for him."

—A painting by MURILLO, said to be over two hundred years old, has just been purchased by a Mr. Cox, of London. The subject of the picture is "St. Anthony of Padua adoring the Infant Saviour," and is said to have belonged formerly to the Church of the Capuchins at Cadiz. This valuable work of art was sold by auction by Messrs. PHILLIPS & SON, of New Bond Street, London, and after a brisk competition brought $60,300.

—Madame PATTI is compelled to dole out her notes to the British people at Covent Garden for the paltry pittance of 200 golden guineas per night.

—MACAULAY tells us that the terms "High-Church" and "Low-Church" first came into use between 1700 and 1702, when the dispute ran high touching JAMES II. and WILLIAM III. The High-Church party were among the so-called non-jurors, or those who refused to take the oath of allegiance to the government and crown of England. These included nine bishops and, it is said, about 600 ministers. The Low-Churchmen were the adherents of WILLIAM, and, among the clergy, were the only friends which WILLIAM had. MACAULAY supposes them to have included less than a tenth of the priesthood.

—Journalism in the outlying cities of England does not seem to be an unprofitable vocation. The will of the late Mr. WHITBY, founder and proprietor of the Liverpool Daily Post, has been "proved" for £40,000 personal property, independent of real estate, and sundry admirers of Mr. E. MIALL, M.P., editor of The Nonconformist, the organ of the English Dissenters, lately gave him a little dinner, at which, on proposing his health, the chairman handed him a check for £10,000—the subscription of a few warm and wealthy friends.

—WASHINGTON IRVING received about $240,000 for his literary labors. In that respect no American author has equaled him. BAYARD TAYLOR and LONGFELLOW have made about $50,000 each by their books. TAYLOR, however, has a good proprietary interest in the Tribune, which enables him to live in good style abroad, though he is a man not given to show. Of the later American authors, "Mark Twain" has probably won the most coin, and he is as thrifty with pence as with pen.

—Sir EDWARD THORNTON has been authorized to expend $125,000 for a permanent residence for the British legation at Washington.

—When Lord GRANVILLE made his Presentation-day speech as Chancellor of the London University he referred to the death of a very useful officer of the university—the porter. Of this defunct official he recounted an authentic story. Coming into the council chamber one day, he saw a gentleman who he said was sitting quite coolly there. He advanced to the gentleman, and addressing him in a lofty tone, said, "Who are you?" "I'm Lord PALMERSTON," replied the gentleman; "who are you?" "I'm the porter," he answered. "The very man I am looking for," said his lordship: "I want you to show me over the place, and explain every thing to me." On coming to one department, Lord PALMERSTON asked the porter what that was. "That's the Lilian Society," replied the porter. "What's the Lilian Society?" asked his lordship. "And do you know," the porter used to say, in recounting this anecdote, "I was surprised to find that I was as ignorant as Lord PALMERSTON himself, for I did not know what it meant."

—The daughter of an English earl, only seventeen years old, has made a very successful début as Juliet in London, under the name of Edith Gray. Her father made a will leaving her a large fortune, but omitted to sign it, so she was left penniless. A retired actress took charge of her, and superintended her education for the stage.

—English papers are filled with incident and anecdote of the late Bishop WILBERFORCE. He was, indeed, one of the best-known bishops of the day, a stirring preacher, in great favor with the Queen, a personal friend of the Prime Minister, a leading orator of the House of Lords, a man very popular with the people, because he was, to make use of a common expression, a "many-sided" man—a man who could hold his own with his peers in grace and courtier-like deportment, but who among his inferiors, if in his opinion any were his inferiors, would make himself an inferior also to suit the exigencies of the occasion; would tell a side-splitting joke to a tent full of staring agriculturists with an amount of delicious unconsciousness that was worth an hour's broiling in an exhibition tent to witness. It will be impossible to find a man more indefatigable in work, more ready in wit, more learned in church matters, more powerful as a platform exponent of the views of this party or of that, more brilliant as a preacher, or more active, zealous, painstaking, and successful in his dealings with the clergy and laity of his diocese, than SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, Bishop of Winchester. It will be generous to hope that a man may be found willing to study the excellent personal qualities of the late bishop and to follow them.

With great point she recites the following historical incident: When about to deliver her lecture on JEANNE D'ARC in a small Western town, it was considered necessary that she should be introduced to the audience. The task fell on the chairman of the Lecture Committee, a worthy individual, but not very well versed in the history and the language of the lamented LA PUCELLE. "Ladies and gentlemen," said he, advancing to the front of the platform, "Miss DICKINSON will address you to-night on the life and adventures of JOHN DARK, one of the greatest heroes of antiquity. We are not as familiar with the heroes of antiquity as we ought to be, owing to the long time since antiquity; but one thing is certain, and that is that Miss DICKINSON can tell us all about the most remarkable man of them all—JOHN DARK."

—"Call in the police!" is a very common ejaculation. It has a pleasant significance in connection with Mr. JOSEPH P. POLICE, a poor machinist of Atlanta, who has had a bewildering run of luck. He was lately summoned to the bedside of a dying bachelor uncle in Charleston, who drew from under his pillow $1700 in cash, several gold watches, and other valuables, which he presented to the surprised nephew. After the uncle's death Mr. POLICE found himself heir to the entire estate, valued at $52,000, to say nothing of $900 in gold that was discovered in a trunk, having evidently been forgotten by the old gentleman.

Recently at Vienna the Archduke LUDWIG, the Austrian Emperor's youngest brother, gave a ball. Princess METTERNICH was of course invited. She did not make her appearance until 10 P.M. Archduke LUDWIG went up to her and dryly said, "I regret, madame, you have not come earlier; her Majesty has been here since 9 P.M." The Princess smiled and said, "I do not regret having come so late to your Highness's ball, for the Empress never speaks graciously to me when I have the honor of meeting her." "Madame, you insult her Majesty." "Your Highness, such is very far from being my intention, for I know the respect I owe to her Majesty; I did but reply frankly to your Highness's remark." Madame METTERNICH walked about the drawing-rooms as usual at balls, and had dismissed this conversation from thought. But as supper was about to be served Archduke LUDWIG VICTOR came up to her and said, "I beg pardon: a place had been kept for you at the imperial supper-table, but, after the insult you have given the Empress, you can not occupy that seat." She answered, with habitual calmness and dignity, "Very well, Highness; but as I have ordered my servants for midnight, I beg your Highness to get me a hack." This insolent order (an archduke ordered to get a hack for any body, least of all a nobody not of the blood) so confounded the Archduke he could think of nothing better than to execute it. He went to the vestibule and ordered a footman to go for the hack. Twenty carriages were immediately offered her; she refused them all. She laid stress upon going home in a hack from the Archduke's house. She sat up all night packing her luggage, and she quitted Vienna by the first train the following morning. The Austrian Empress is said to be a little jealous of the Princess's brilliant success in society. Madame THIERS and Mademoiselle DOSNE were similarly affected, and managed to secure Prince METTERNICH's removal from the embassy at Paris.

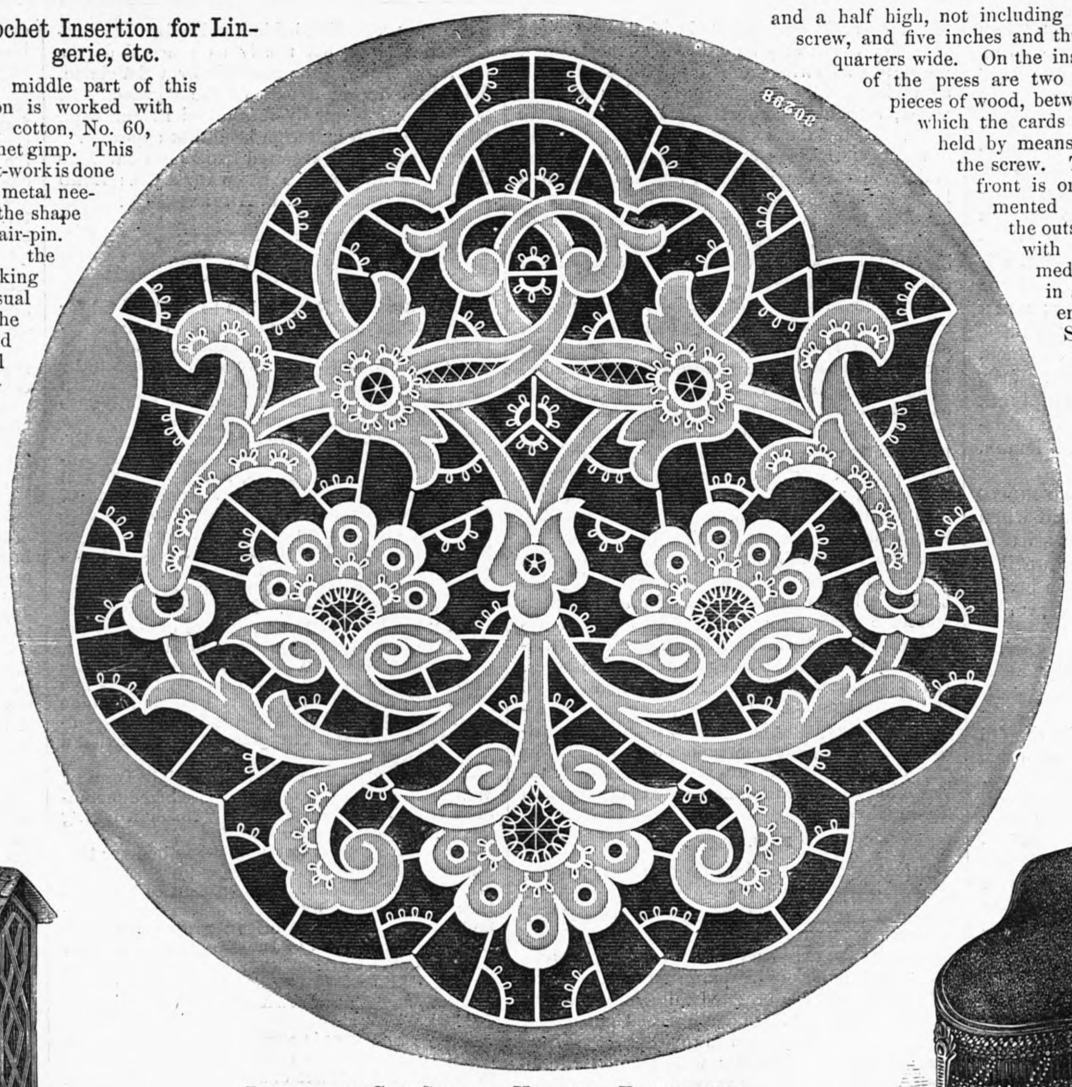
CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Crochet Insertion for Lingerie, etc.

THE middle part of this insertion is worked with twisted cotton, No. 60, in crochet gimp. This crochet-work is done with a metal needle in the shape of a hair-pin. Begin the gimp, forming a loop of the end of the working thread with the crochet needle, in the usual manner, draw the crochet needle out of the loop, take the latter between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, take the metal needle also between the thumb and forefinger, so that it rests on the end of the working thread underneath the loop, carry the working thread through to the front between both prongs of the needle, lay the thread on the prong at the right, from the front toward the back, and on the fingers of the left hand as in crocheting or knitting. Then take up the loop on the crochet needle, and draw the working thread through the loop, throwing the thread over once. Draw the crochet needle out of the loop, turn the metal needle from right to left, so that the working thread now lies on the prong at the right, * take up the loop formed previously on the crochet needle, form a new loop, throwing the thread over once, and on the upper layer of thread of the loop on the left prong work 1 sc. (single crochet). Draw the crochet needle out of the loop, turn the metal needle from right to left, and repeat from *. Work the sc. very close. Having arrived at the end of the prongs, push the finished part of the gimp close together, and only when the needle is covered half its length with loops pushed close together drop the gimp from the needle, and take up again the last two loops on each side of the gimp on the needle. Having in this manner worked a piece of gimp of the requisite length, crochet with twisted cotton, No. 80, on each side of the gimp two rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately one cross double crochet on the next two loops of the gimp; the upper veins of the cross double crochet are separated by 1 ch. (chain stitch), 1 ch. 2d round.—1 sc. on each stitch of the preceding round.



DESIGN FOR CAP CROWN.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Tatted and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

THIS edging is worked with twisted cotton. First work the tatting with one thread (shuttle) as follows: * One ring of 2 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 8 ds., 1 p., 2 ds.; repeat from *, but in working every following ring, instead of forming the first p., always fasten the working thread to the second p. of the preceding ring. Then crochet four rounds, as shown by the illustration, in the following manner: 1st round.—2 sc. (single crochet) on each tatted ring, 1 sc. on the thread interval between two rings. 2d and 3d rounds.—Always alternately 1 cross double crochet; the upper and lower two veins of the cross double crochet are separated each by 1 stitch; 1 ch., with this pass over 1 stitch. 4th round.—1 sc. on each stitch of the preceding round.

Carved Wood Card Press.

THIS card press is of carved wood stained brown and black polished wood. It is six inches and a half high, not including the screw, and five inches and three-quarters wide. On the inside of the press are two flat pieces of wood, between which the cards are held by means of the screw. The front is ornamented on the outside with a medallion, which is worked on brown faille in application, satin, and half-polka stitch embroidery, and in point Russe. Fig. 28, Supplement, gives the design for the embroidery. For the cards apply white velvet, edge it with gold cord as indicated on the pattern, and ornament it in satin stitch with black and red silk. Work the remaining figures of the design in the manner above described.

TATTED AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Design for Cap Crown.—Venetian Embroidery.

THIS pretty design is suitable for cap crowns, toilette cushion covers, and lamp-mats, and also for ornamenting baskets, etc. Having run the outlines of all the design figures, work the bars and scallops in button-hole stitch in the usual manner. For each of the small picots form a loop of the working thread, twisting the latter slightly. After finishing the bars, work the outlines either entirely in button-hole stitch, or else work the broad outlines partly in satin stitch and partly in button-hole stitch, and overcast the fine outlines. Work the small picot scallops inside of the arabesques similar to the scallops on the bars, and let them lie loose on the material. Finally, work the lace stitches, and cut away the material underneath the bars on the wrong side.

QUARTER SECTION OF SOFA-PILLOW.—APPLICATION, SATIN, AND HALF-POLKA STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Sewing-Weight with Bead Border, Figs. 1–3.

THIS sewing-weight consists of a box two inches and a half high, which is filled with a plate of lead and with emery, and is covered on the outside with linen. The under edge is furnished with maroon velvet bordered on both sides with Russia leather. On the top of the box is a cushion of maroon velvet, finished with a narrow hoop of bronze. The sewing-weight is trimmed, besides, with a border in bead mosaic, and furnished with a handle and bands of gold bronze. Fig. 2, page 565, shows a section of the border, and Fig. 3, on the same page, shows the manner of working it. Work the border as follows: 1st bead row.—On a piece of thread take up 3 black string beads, 1 satin bead, 2 string beads, 1 satin bead, 3 string beads, 5 gold beads; turn the work. 2d bead row.—1 string bead, carry the thread through the second following black string bead of the preceding row, 1 string bead, carry the thread through the following satin bead, 1 string bead, carry the thread through the second following string bead, 1 satin bead, carry the thread through the following string bead, 1 string bead, carry the thread through the following string bead, 5 gold beads; turn the work. 3d bead row.—1 string bead, carry the thread through the following black bead of the preceding row, 1 gold bead, carry the thread through the next satin bead, 1 string bead, carry the thread through the next string bead, 1 satin bead, carry the thread through the next string bead, 1 string bead, carry the thread through the following string bead of the preceding row and through the next 2 gold beads of the first row; turn the work, and repeat the 2d and 3d rows, observing the illustrations, until the border is of the requisite length; for the beads which appear lighter on Figs. 2 and 3, however, take up gold beads. Then work the raised leaves on the border with gold beads, as shown by Fig. 3.

Border for Dress Trimmings. Point Lace Embroidery.

THIS border is designed for trimming dresses, basques, mantelets, etc. The materials required for making the border are black silk point lace braid and black saddler's silk. Having drawn the design on linen, run on the point lace braid, and work the button-hole stitches and wheels inside of the scallops, and the thread bars, as plainly shown in the illustration. For the picots on the button-hole stitched bars work two button-hole stitches close underneath the stitch just worked, then carry the thread through the stitch worked last in the bar, and continue in this manner. The beads may be sewed on and the tassels knotted more or less closely to suit the taste.

Straw Parasol.

THE frame of this parasol is of steel, with sticks ten inches and seven-eighths long. The cover consists of a straight piece of plaited straw ten inches and seven-eighths wide and fifty-eight inches long, which is sewed up on the ends and pleated closely on the inner side. The layers of these pleats are covered with a straw rosette. The outer edge of the parasol is bordered with a scalloped strip of plaited straw an inch and seven-eighths wide, the seam of which is covered on the outside with a straw border seven-eighths of an inch wide. Tassels of wheat, lustring lining, and a wooden handle complete the parasol.

Straw Fan, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fan is made of a straight piece of plaited straw thirty-four inches long and five inches and three-quarters wide. It is pleated closely on one side, and is joined at each end with a handle ten inches long and three-quarters of an inch wide covered with straw. These handles are furnished on the under end with an elastic loop and a button. Straw rosettes trim the fan as shown by the illustrations. The fan is seen open in Fig. 1, and closed in Fig. 2.

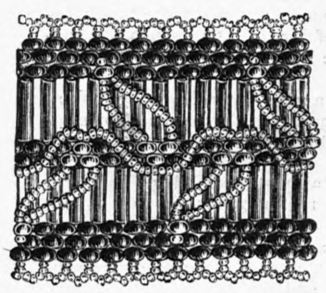

Fig. 2.—BEAD EMBROIDERY FOR SEWING-WEIGHT, FIG. 1, PAGE 564.

Application Border for Dress Trimmings.

THESE borders are worked in black for walking suits, and usually in colors for evening or opera dresses. They are worked on a foundation of stiff linen, which is stretched in an embroidery frame. Having drawn the design, underlay the leaves (each half of the leaf being raised through the middle and flat toward the sides) with dark split zephyr worsted, and then work the satin stitch with coarse saddler's silk. Surround each finished design figure with half-polka stitches, as shown by the illustration, furnish it with veins, and ornament it with beads. The stems and vines are in tambour-work. For this use a coarse and rather long crochet needle. After finishing the embroidery coat it evenly on the wrong side with white fluid lime, which is left to dry while the work is still in the frame. Then take the work out of the frame, and cut away the material between and outside of the design figures.

Quarter Section of Sofa-Pillow.—Application, Satin, and Half-polka Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 564.

THE foundation in the original is black velvet, and the application figures are of light gray cloth. These colors may of course be varied to suit the taste, using, for instance, dark brown velvet and light fawn-colored cloths instead. On the gray cloth strip on the outer edge are applied separate velvet figures. All the applied figures are partly edged with fine gray silk round cord, and partly ornamented with the latter and with satin and half-polka stitch embroidery. The embroidery, including the arabesques, leaves, and vines, which rest on the velvet foundation, is worked with coarse gray saddler's silk. For the medallion apply light gray silk (the edge is of gray cloth), which has first been ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with a small bouquet worked with saddler's silk of various colors, partly in dovetailed satin stitch, and partly in straight satin stitch, point Russe, and knotted stitch.

LEGENDS OF CERTAIN PLANTS.

SOME plants are emblematical on account of certain events or customs: of these are the national emblems. The rose of England became especially famous during the wars of the Roses, after which the red and white were united, and the rose of both colors is called the York and Lancaster; but when these flowers first became badges of the two houses we can not discover. The thistle is honored as the emblem of Scotland, from the circumstance that once upon a time a party of Danes having approached the Scottish camp unperceived, by night, were on the point of attacking it, when one of the soldiers trod on a thistle, which caused him to cry out, and so aroused the enemy. The shamrock of Ireland was held by St. Patrick to teach the doctrine of the Trinity, and chosen in remembrance of him. The leek, in Wales, as a national device, has not been satisfactorily explained, otherwise than as the result of its having the old Cymric colors, green and white. In France, the fleur-de-lis is so called as a corruption of fleur-de-Louis, and has no connection with the lily, but was an iris, chosen as an emblem by Louis VII. when he went to the Crusades, and afterward named after him.

The olive is deemed an emblem of peace, probably because, on account of its durability of growth, it was planted both in Greece and Italy to mark the limits of landed possessions.

Very many plants owe their celebrity to the healing properties with which they are probably endowed, as their common names indicate. Of these are self-heal, woundwort, liverwort, lungwort, eyebright, loosestrife, flea-bane, salvia (from salvo, to heal), potentilla (from potential), etc. But in many instances these properties used to be exaggerated and distorted in such a manner that the application of certain plants in wounds and illness merely as a charm superseded their being used in a way that might be beneficial; and the witches' caldrons (like those mentioned in Macbeth, and the old British caldron of Ceridween), which contained decoctions of all kinds of plants, mystically prepared, were looked to as all-powerful remedies when applied with strange rites and incantations.

Some plants have been famous on account of their poisonous qualities, which in various cases have made them historical. The hemlock was formerly used in Greece as the state poison, for it was the custom to put prisoners to death by its means; and it is believed that Socrates, Theramenes, and Phocion were all condemned to drink it. The darnel is a large grass, flowering in July, which grows among barley and wheat, possessed of poisonous properties; it is supposed to be the tares referred to in the parable. The monk's-hood is a very poisonous plant, even the odor of its leaves and blossoms having an injurious effect on some people; its old name of wolf's-bane was given to the plant because hunters dipped their arrows in its juice to make them more deadly. The upas-tree of Java has a great notoriety for the terrible effect it is supposed to have in causing the death of any one who lies down under its shelter, and its milky gum is also used by the natives for their arrows.

MISS GRIMP'S BOARDERS.

WILKINS COVE is a sandy, sunny spot on the Jersey shore—one of those jagged little points that jut out into the ocean, and take the wild beatings of the stormy Atlantic with an equanimity that is born of being used to it.

Almost every habitable place in the United States where people can get sea air, mountain air, or any air at all has been discovered and overrun long ago. But it was quite lately that Miss Selina Grimp, a mild-looking spinster of fifty summers and winters, fell into a state of unwonted nervous excitement over her first boarders. There was no hotel at Wilkins Cove, and none of the dozen or two families in the place had ever "put up company." That so strange and dreaded a lot should have fallen on Miss Selina seemed like such a malicious freak of fate that she could scarcely get reconciled to it.

It came about in this wise:

A cousin of hers, when both of them were girls together, had married a city clerk, and from the day of her marriage Jane Hopkins had pushed her husband ahead with a steady hand. There was one drawback, however, to his success. He had a kind and generous heart; and when his only sister died, within a year or two of her husband's death, Mark Hopkins insisted upon taking her little girl to his own home and heart. The frugal Jane objected to this, declaring that it was taking the bread and butter out of his own children's mouths. But on this one point he was firm; and little Juliet Sellingwood had at least a nominal home under his roof.

Her childhood was rather gray in hue. She was not pretty, was shy and sensitive, and seemed to have no capacity for making friends. She grew up somewhat tall, thin, and dark, with fine eyes and capabilities for beauty; but she was seldom becomingly dressed, and she did not in the least know how to make the best of herself.

Aunt Jane was too busy with her own daughters to pay much attention to "her husband's niece"—as she always designated her—until one day the unwelcome truth was forced upon her that Juliet was nineteen years of age, and could no longer be treated as a child. The girl was presuming to look pale and thin, too, with no appetite and little energy; and when the question of the summer hegira was discussed, the most troublesome point was how to dispose of Juliet.

Hitherto she had been left in the city "to take care of her uncle," by which arrangement the expense of her sojourn at the fashionable watering-place patronized by her aunt and cousins was avoided, and uncle and niece were equally pleased. But Mr. Hopkins stoutly declared that Juliet needed country air this season, and insisted upon her going to B—— Springs, in spite of Mrs. Hopkins's curtain-lectures on the palpable folly of chaperoning three girls at once.

The good lady had never known her husband to be so obstinate; but having, like Mrs. Joe Gargery, "a master mind," she spent one sleepless night in perfecting a plan that appeared like a genuine flash of inspiration. In the midst of her disquietude the spare figure of Cousin Selina had risen from the depths of memory like a very earthly angel, and come to her relief.

Selina was a lone woman, living by herself in "the homestead," a frame building of moderate dimensions, with about twenty acres of land attached to it; while the hired man resided in the bosom of his family near by. It would be a capital thing for Juliet to spend the summer with Cousin Selina, at a very moderate board; and as Mr. Hopkins offered no objection to this plan, provided that Juliet was willing—and Juliet was more than willing to get off from B—— Springs—Miss Grimp speedily received an epistle from her city cousin that threw her into an alarming state of not-know-what-to-do-ativeness.

On reflection, however, Miss Selina rather liked the idea of having company, and she was decidedly pleased with the prospect of a regular income for what would cost her very little. But, according to the invariable custom at Wilkins Cove (having fully made up her own mind on the subject), she put on her sun-bonnet and went to consult her nearest neighbor.

The neighbor gave her some not very encouraging accounts of boarders with whom her husband's sister had contended at various periods of her existence, from which it would appear that boarders were the natural enemies of the people who boarded them, but advised her nevertheless to take the young lady so unexpectedly offered, and Miss Selina lost no time in writing her acceptance to "Cousin Hopkins."

She was in the midst of a grand renovating of her best chamber, when the hired man screamed to her from below that "a feller wanted her in the settin'-room."

"Fellers" in the "settin'-room," or, indeed, any where else, were rare commodities, and when Miss Grimp, with her hair hurriedly plastered down with water, and her face shining with brown soap, adjourned to the parlor, her first glance at the "feller" established there assured her that whatever the object of his visit might be, he would be pretty sure to get it. Every one who looked into those steady, smiling eyes very generally arrived at the same conclusion.

Miss Selina was afraid the man had books to sell, and nerved herself accordingly, but her consternation was extreme when he proposed himself as a boarder. It seemed to her that it was raining boarders, and she wanted to run away somewhere until the shower was over.

The lady had opened her mouth, evidently to remonstrate, but the stranger smilingly proceeded:

"I will promise to live out-of-doors most of the time, and you may feed me on bread and milk. There are some very fine views of the ocean here, which I should like to transfer to canvas, and that and the quiet of the place have attracted me. A man whom I met on the beach thought I could get accommodated here."

That loafing Bill Hacks, of course, who seemed to think that because she hadn't a family on her shoulders she must sit and suck her thumbs for want of something to do. She'd give him a piece of her mind when she got a good chance. As Bill, however, had applied several times for the situation of permanent boarder in the character of Miss Selina's husband, it is not likely that this would have troubled him much.

The gentleman then offered a sum that seemed so munificent to Miss Grimp that she could only open her eyes in astonishment. When she found words she positively refused to accept more than two-thirds of it, and said that "she was afraid that was screwin'."

Her would-be boarder laughed, and told her that she didn't understand business. He then informed her that every thing was settled to his satisfaction; that she might put him where she pleased; and that he was going out for a long ramble. And depositing his portmanteau in the entry, he took his sketching apparatus with him and departed.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed the bewildered spinster. "I wonder how many more of 'em are coming! And I don't even know the man's name."

On went the sun-bonnet again, and, as Miss Selina expressed it, she "cut round" to the neighbor's on the other side. After solemn deliberation this Delphic oracle arrived at the conclusion that as the man had evidently come with a determination to stay, it would be as well to let him, but she strongly advised her friend to admit no more "fellers."

As the old house afforded no accommodation for more, Miss Grimp readily adopted this suggestion, and "cut" back again to devote all her present energies to the little sleeping-room back of the parlor. Here she meant to deposit the strange individual who had dropped upon her so unexpectedly. And she wished she had thought to ask him whether he liked feathers or straw uppermost, and what were his views on the subject of soap. Some folks liked brown, and some Castile. It might have startled her to hear that he abominated both.

"What shall I call you?" asked Miss Selina, a little nervously, when the artist, looking very fresh and gentlemanly in his clean linen suit, presented himself at the tea-table.

"Oh," he replied, with some confusion, "call me Ellis."

"There was a man of that name," said the lady, after the invariable manner of country people, "who kept a harness-maker's shop in Boynton—any relation of yours?"

Mr. Ellis thought not, and added that he had very few relatives.

"I'm expectin' another boarder," volunteered Miss Selina, presently; "a young lady from the city."

"I am sorry to hear it," was the unexpected reply. "I hoped to be here alone, and I don't like young ladies."

Miss Grimp regarded the speaker with a puzzled air. He was awful queer, that was certain.

"I guess she won't be in your road much," said she, soothingly. "She's a very nice girl—my cousin's husband's niece—and it's likely she'll just stick round the house, and read and sew."

Mr. Ellis wished the nice girl in Jericho; he was quite sure she would prove a regular nuisance.

Miss Selina was just dying to ask her boarder if he painted pictures for a living, and how much he got for them; but there was something about him that prevented her. In fact, she admitted that, although he was as smiling as a basket of chips, she was awfully afraid of him.

Meanwhile he settled down as naturally in his new quarters as though he had always lived there; was as easy as an old shoe, his hostess reported, and didn't give a mite of trouble. By degrees Wilkins Cove got accustomed to seeing him prowling among the rocks on the shore, and taking views—a proceeding which it had at first regarded disapprovingly; and it finally came to accept him as it would a bale of foreign goods cast ashore by the tide.

Mr. Ellis had been at Wilkins Cove about a week, when he came in from his day's work to find a gray figure opposite him at the tea-table. This, of course, was the young lady; and he was formally "made acquainted" with Miss Sellingwood, who struck him as being stiff and uninteresting, appearing to possess the sole merit of being quiet.

Miss Selina quite took to the shy girl. There was something wistful in the young face—a sort of hungry look, as if for love and sympathy, that appealed to her kind heart; and when, after addressing her alternately as "cousin" and "Miss Sellingwood"—the spinster became hopelessly confused as to what was proper under the circumstances—the girl said so appealingly, "Do call me 'Juliet,' won't you?" the worthy woman took her right in her arms, and kissed her.

"I thought you would be all alone, Cousin Selina," said Juliet, the day after her arrival, "and that we should have such nice, cozy times together."

"So did I, my dear," was the reply; "but Mr. Ellis begged so hard, and he's really a very pretty-behaved young gentleman."

"I don't like young gentlemen," remarked Miss Juliet.

Miss Grimp was on the point of saying that Mr. Ellis didn't like young ladies, but reflecting just in time that this would not be likely to mend matters, she began to talk of something else.

Miss Sellingwood did "hang round the house, and read and sew," just as her cousin had predicted, and very much more than was good for her; and Mr. Ellis kept his promise of living out-of-doors.

Once or twice, however, he found himself watching the pale young face with some interest. He believed it might grow pretty if she would only let the fresh air blow upon it, and get up a little animation.

"Do you never go out at all?" he asked, one day.

"Not very often," was the reply; "I am so accustomed to staying in the house—and I get tired walking."

"That is because you don't practice it enough," he continued, in quite a fatherly way. "This is such a fine afternoon that I am sure you would feel better for walking down to the beach. There is quite a pretty little cave almost in a straight line from here, where you can rest when you are tired. I should be happy to escort you there, but my work takes me in a different direction."

This last clause was a particularly artful one, for he had a settled conviction that the young lady could not have been induced to accept him as an escort; and he even thought it possible that the fear of encountering him would keep her in-doors.

From which it will be seen that, for a man, our artist was not at all conceited.

This conversation took place at the dinner-table, and when every thing had been put in order after the meal, Juliet succeeded in beguiling Miss Selina into accompanying her for a walk. That worthy lady equipped herself in a scanty dress of alpaca, a green-sprigged shawl, and a wonderful structure of a bonnet—her usual Sunday attire; for, with her, a walk was a solemn and extraordinary undertaking, and daily "loafing" on the sea-shore was a style of existence that met her unqualified contempt. She held that reasonable beings were sent into the world for better things—bread and cake making, for instance, and washing and cleaning up.

Juliet's sundown soon hung suspended on her neck, having been lifted from its proper place by the playful zephyrs, which cut up such impertinent antics with Miss Selina's scant drapery that she was reduced to the necessity of holding her skirts down with her parasol, and even found herself saying, "Go away! do!" as though some saucy terrier were snapping at her ankles.

The listless city girl felt her pulses stir with new life in this invigorating air, and a color came to her cheeks, and a brightness to her eyes, as she moved on with elastic step, and drew long breaths of enjoyment.

Her companion was more resigned than joyous, and she peered grimly into the cave before settling herself for a rest, expressing the opinion that it was "an awful spooky kind of place."

"I think it's lovely!" replied Juliet, enthusiastically; "it reminds me of things I've read about. Don't you know some story connected with it?"

"When I was a girl," said Miss Grimp, "I've heard folks tell of an old black man who hid himself here when the officers were after him for stealin'. That's about all there is to it, I guess."

Juliet laughed merrily, a thing she had scarcely done since her arrival; and though wondering what on earth the child found musical in her last words, Miss Selina was really glad of such a favorable sign.

The girl seemed almost mischievous as they went home; and, bounding to her room, she set about her toilette for tea with unusual energy. A very plain white Swiss muslin happened to be among her "properties," and dotting this here and there with little bows of scarlet ribbon, and fastening the same in her smoothly braided hair, she pronounced herself almost good-looking as she left the glass, while the person upon whose vision she unexpectedly burst at the foot of the stairs was startled into the conviction that she was considerably more than this.

No one knew exactly how it came about, but that evening Mr. Ellis, instead of going to his room, picked up Juliet's book that lay on the sofa, which happened to be Lays of Ancient Rome, and read aloud "The Battle of the Lake Regillus."

"What an awful fightin' set those old Romans and Amalekites was!" commented Miss Selina. "I only wonder that any of 'em ever lived to tell about it."

"You think, then, that their style of warfare was like that of the Kilkenny cats?" suggested Mr. Ellis, laughingly.

Miss Selina had never seen any Kilkenny cats—her cousin had a real Maltee once—and so on.

Juliet said nothing, but she lost not a tone of the clear, rich voice, that brought out new beauties in one of her favorite poems; and she felt, as she did on the sea-shore, that she was in a new atmosphere. A faint color tinged her cheek and a light beamed in her eyes; she forgot her shyness for the moment, and actually talked. Not in the least like a young lady, though—at least not like the young ladies of Mr. Ellis's acquaintance. It was very evident that the poor child had led a lonely and self-centred life, that her thoughts had turned inward rather than outward, and that she had formed her opinions on various subjects without having received the least bias from the opinions of other people.

She was the freshest and raciest book critic he had ever encountered; and while enjoying the discovery that her favorite authors were the same he had himself enshrined, this Mephistopheles did not scruple to put forth heretical opinions—in fact, to tell downright stories—just for the pleasure of seeing the indignant color flush up in the clear brunette cheek. Miss Sellingwood was exceedingly pretty in a state of wrath; and the artist sat admiring, while the man exerted himself to be disagreeable.

Suddenly Juliet glanced toward Cousin Selina. She was fast asleep in the high-backed rocker; and in reply to the young lady's scared look, Mr. Ellis said, demurely,

"I think she went off about the period of the Kilkenny cats."

"No, indeed," asserted Miss Grimp, with a sudden return to sublunary things; "I never heard of Kilkenny cats; but Priscil had a real Maltee once—"

"Good-night," said Juliet. "I am so tired, Cousin Selina."

"Tired!" repeated the spinster, in a tone of disgust; "I never was so tired with a big wash or bakin' as I am with this day's gaddin'. I'm clean beat out."

After that Juliet had to wander off alone, for Cousin Selina was not to be persuaded into loafing on the beach any more. How she grew to love the vast expanse of sea and sky that stretched out so illimitably, and the life-giving breeze that tinted her cheek with the hue of health, and gave strength and energy to every muscle! She would sit or stand for hours, watching the constantly changing ocean, and smiling like a pleased child in her quiet enjoyment of what most girls of her age would have voted "dreadfully stupid."

She was leaning against a rock one afternoon, with her hat hanging by its strings, and the glory of the sunset drifting over her. Lost in a happy dream—for happy dreams were natural to her now—her gaze went off into the distance beyond the breakers, and she heard no sound of footsteps, and knew not that an artist was hastily sketching her figure, as she stood there in the shadow of the gray rock, with the brightness of the sunset in her face.

Juliet did not know that at that moment she was lovely—knew not that she was a fit subject for an artist's pencil; and when she finally became conscious of Mr. Ellis's presence, she supposed him to be busy as usual with the ocean and the rocks.

"I must take a good, long, lingering look at it all," said the artist, as they walked home together, "for to-morrow I am to tear myself away."

Juliet involuntarily started. They had been under the same roof now for six weeks—had talked and read and wandered off among the rocks together; and somehow she thought that this was to go on forever. It was a very sudden awakening; and she listened like one in a dream to Robert Ellis's next words.

"I have received quite a threatening letter from my friends at B—— Springs, whom I promised to join two weeks ago."

"B—— Springs!" Then he would meet her aunt and cousins. And Miranda was so very pretty. For, like all brunettes, poor Juliet thought the possessor of a fair skin and golden hair a miracle of beauty, and loathed herself in comparison as a veritable squaw.

"So that pretty Miss Hopkins is your cousin, then?" pursued the artist, with a tone that to Juliet's jealous ear sounded like surprise. "I shall have the pleasure of meeting her very soon; can I take any message for you to your aunt and cousins?"

"I have none to send," was the curt reply; and Juliet hastened to her room and bolted the door.

What sort of manifestation Mr. Ellis expected from Miss Sellingwood on that last evening of his stay he never even told himself, for the simple reason that he didn't know. But it is a pleasure to state that our heroine, instead of appearing in a limp condition, or not appearing at all, had evidently spent the time in her room to the best possible advantage, and adorned herself with all the art of which she was capable.

Her abundant hair was ornamented with a double hollyhock—which has an absurd sound, but the effect was that of a large crimson rosette. She had a rich bloom on her cheeks, and a sparkle and dash in her whole appearance that was almost a transformation.

"I do declare for't!" exclaimed Miss Selina, in astonishment. "If I wanted to make a business of takin' boarders, I'd just send you round as an advertisement. Did you ever see any body change so, Mr. Ellis?"

He admitted that Miss Sellingwood was very much changed since he first saw her.

"I don't think I'm the same person at all," observed Juliet, gayly. "I feel equal to any thing now."

"Equal to B—— Springs?" asked Mr. Ellis, who somehow felt as if he would like to see her there.

"I hate springs!" was the reply. "I never mean to go to any as long as I live."

When Miss Grimp's first boarder departed, en route for B—— Springs, he felt as though some sort of happening that would keep him at Wilkins Cove would be very welcome just then. He never told his love. But neither did concealment prey on his damask cheek; for the girls at B—— Springs thought him positively charming, and the most delightful windfall that had come to them by boat and rail that whole season. He did not tell the Hopkinses that he had met their cousin, nor even that he had been at Wilkins Cove. There really seemed to be some foundation for Miss Selina's opinion that he was "awful queer."

This mantle of awful queerness seemed rather to have fallen upon Juliet; her cousin thought her "kinky," for she loved to sit by herself and loaf round on the beach. Dreary, drizzly days in September would find her wrapped in a shawl gazing out over the ocean, as though watching for one who had loved and had sailed away.

"Didn't know at one time but you and that Mr. Ellis might make a match of it," said Cousin Selina, as she and Juliet sat by the first fire of the season; "but I guess it's just as well as it is: travelin' artists always seemed to me like peddlers, and they're dreadful uncertain."

"What a funny notion!" laughed Juliet; "I am sure Mr. Ellis was any thing but lover-like, and as for me—"

Here she laughed again, and then she pondered sadly what she was to do with her life. She was tired of Wilkins Cove; she wished that Uncle Mark would come and take her away.

Uncle Mark did come, and Juliet went back to the old routine. Every one thought her wonderfully improved; and every one had a great deal to tell her of a certain Mr. Champton, the lion of B—— Springs, and a distinguished artist.

Juliet thought it odd that they did not speak of Mr. Ellis; but she would not ask about him. Their accounts of Mr. Champton sounded very much like many things she remembered of the artist at Wilkins Cove; but Miranda had such a way of fluttering and blushing whenever his name was mentioned, and such meaning looks were directed to her by the others, that he was evidently looked upon as her peculiar property.

Mrs. Hopkins admitted, with a sigh, that "her husband's niece" could no longer be kept in the background. She was fully three years older for her sojourn at Wilkins Cove, and quite beyond childhood. So Juliet went into company, and quite distinguished herself; received plenty of compliments, which did not at all please her aunt and cousins; and often, after passing a brilliant evening, would secretly wish herself back on the rocky beach.

One day the Hopkins girls came in full of excitement. They had seen a new picture by Mr. Champton on exhibition at the Art Gallery. It was called "An Ocean Sunset;" the scene was dreadfully bare and wild-looking, and a girl was leaning against some rocks. People were raving over it, but they didn't think it so very remarkable; the strangest part of it was that the girl looked so much like Juliet.

"Of course she is a great deal prettier," observed Miranda, "or she wouldn't be in a picture; but she certainly does look like you, Juliet, and you ought to see the painting. If Mr. Champton is in town," she added, with a conscious simper, "he will call here at once, and then I shall know all about it."

Juliet restrained herself by a powerful effort; but had any one been interested in watching her, they would have noticed that she grew red and white in quick succession, and that the muscles of her mouth moved strangely. She listened with apparent indifference to the conversation, and resolved on the first convenient opportunity to steal off by herself and take a peep at the picture.

The opportunity came on a dull November afternoon; and Juliet was glad of the change from the damp, penetrating air to the warm, softly carpeted room, and the glowing pictures on the walls of summer life and warmth.

She started as her eyes fell on the picture; it was her favorite view at Wilkins Cove, and there stood she herself, leaning against the rock, just as she had stood on that afternoon when all the warmth and brightness went suddenly out of her life. Herself, she believed—she was sure; and yet she never could have looked like that. This girl was beautiful, with a sort of glory on her face. What did it all mean?

The card on the picture said, "An Ocean Sunset—Champton, artist;" and Juliet murmured, half aloud, "Then he is the same."

"The very same," said a voice close beside her, "and that lovely girl-dreamer is really Juliet Sellingwood, just as I have often seen her—just as I hope to see her again."

Juliet knew not where she was, but the sunset glory came again to her face as Robert Ellis whispered a story that never can be new, and yet is never old.

They had the gallery and the pictures to themselves that afternoon, and they staid so long that Juliet started at length with sudden fear. The short November afternoon had glided imperceptibly into evening.

As Mr. Ellis walked with her to her uncle's door, he said, laughingly, "I have tried to answer all your questions. I am not engaged to your cousin Miranda, and I may add that I should not be if I had never seen you. My name is Robert Ellis, with the addition of Champton, which I drop sometimes in traveling, as a sort of freak. I did not get tired of you at Wilkins Cove, and run away in consequence to B—— Springs. I went to give you a chance to miss me a little, if such a thing were possible, and I was quite resolved, if I could find you studying the picture, to try my fate. I will not say how many days I have watched for you, Juliet. Why did you not come before?"

The sunset glory of the picture was rippling over the face that Juliet turned to him in answer; and the artist wished with all his heart that they could be transported to Wilkins Cove.

Their present destination, however, was Mr. Hopkins's domicile, and they accomplished the walk in the longest period of time on record. Mr. Champton did not, on this his first call, inquire for Miss Hopkins, but for her father; and the fair Miranda received a very unpleasant surprise in learning the object of his visit.

Indeed, the whole family uttered exclamations of surprise to such an extent that they seemed in danger of contracting a chronic habit of saying "Oh!" but after one stormy scene with Juliet, Mrs. Hopkins was bound over by her husband to keep the peace, and did her part so well that she was looked upon by outsiders as the very model of a kind aunt. She sagely decided that the next best thing to having Mr. Champton for a son-in-law was to have him take her "husband's niece" off her hands; and she almost persuaded herself that she had made the match by sending Juliet to Wilkins Cove. She never mentioned, though, that had she been gifted with magical lore, she would have sent Miranda in her place.

Upon counting up her profits for the season, Miss Grimp was highly satisfied with the results of her experiment in taking boarders; and the boarders themselves were equally satisfied with the results of having been taken.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XVII.

INQUIRIES upon topics within the range of these papers are always welcome. Among those not seldom repeated is an urgent demand for a prescription to keep the hair from coming out. The following part of a letter will be as acceptable to many readers as it was to the one who received it.

"I was emphatically one of the 'ugly girls,' being of a very large figure, and inheriting thin hair; otherwise I suited myself well enough. But, oh! the agonies I have suffered through my personal deficiencies. Now, with a happy home of my own and the best husband in the world, I can smile at the old distress. Yet it was no less real, and I can pity the ugly girls as no one but one who has 'been there' can.

"My hair commenced coming out when I was just in my teens, and has always been the trial of my life. I have been up and down the whole scale of restoratives, with all manner of recipes volunteered by sympathizing friends. Last fall, after returning from a two months' stay near Saratoga, where I had undergone a severe course of treatment for sundry physical ills, my hair came out frightfully, till I was almost without any, and nothing seemed to check it. A relative, an old lady, told me to use burdock-root tea. I tried it, and it worked like a charm. My hair has never grown as it does now, and it has absolutely ceased coming out—something that has not been the case for fifteen years. Something of this may be due, as far as growth is concerned, to a recipe given me by a friend a month or so ago. It is a family recipe, and something of a family secret. The ladies of the house, who use it, have magnificent hair, which they attribute to this recipe. It is a queer conglomerate, as you see: One pound of yellow-dock root, boiled in five pints of water till reduced to one pint; strain, and add an ounce of pulverized borax, half an ounce of coarse salt, three ounces of sweet-oil, a pint of New England rum, and the juice of three large red onions, perfumed at pleasure (a quarter of an ounce of oil of lavender and ten grains of ambergris would be efficacious in overcoming the powerful scent of the ingredients).

"My little girl has magnificent hair, but it troubles me a little by coming out some this winter. As she is only five years old, I have hesitated about putting any thing on. I wish you would some time tell us if it is best to doctor a child's hair, or let nature take its course. I have learned that to shampoo the head with cold water every morning is an excellent thing, as is an occasional thorough washing with soap-suds, not rinsing the soap out completely. I have sometimes checked the fall of hair by such means. The burdock root was also used by steeping it in boiling water till a strong tea was made, and used as a wash two or three times a day, then at longer intervals."

The only additions I can suggest to the excellent letter above are, that it is always well to use a cure where there is a disease, and simple remedies aid nature. A child's hair is too valuable to lose. One tea-spoonful of ammonia to a quart of warm water makes a wash that may be used on a child's head with safety. Apply it daily. This would not split the hair, as soap will if left to dry in.

One of the most powerful stimulants and restoratives for the hair, after ammonia, which reigns supreme, is the oil of mace. Those who desire something to bring the hair in again are advised to try it in preference to cantharides, the effects of which it is said to equal, if not to surpass, without the danger which sometimes attends the latter. A strong tincture for the hair is made by adding half an ounce of the oil of mace to three-quarters of a pint of deodorized alcohol. Pour a spoonful or two into a saucer; dip a small, stiff brush into it, and brush the hair smartly, rubbing the tincture well into the roots. On bald spots, if hair will start at all, it may be stimulated by rubbing the scalp with a piece of flannel till the skin looks red, and anointing it with the tincture. This process must be repeated three or four times a day for weeks. When the hair begins to grow, apply the tincture once a day till the growth is well established, bathing the head in cold water every morning, and briskly brushing it to bring the blood to the surface.

Where the hair loses its color, it may be restored by bathing the head in a weak solution of ammonia, an even tea-spoonful of carbonate of ammonia to a basin of water, brushing the hair thoroughly while wet, and washing the head with a crash mitten. Bathing the head in a strong solution of rock-salt is said to restore gray hair in some cases. Pour boiling water on rock-salt in the proportion of two heaping table-spoonfuls to a quart of water, and let it stand till cold before using.

The old specific of bear's grease for the hair is hardly found now, and one can never be sure of getting the real article; but an equally powerful appliance is discovered in pure sperm-oil, of the very freshest, finest quality. This forms the basis of successful hair restoratives, and will not fail of effect used alone. It is, however, only procured by special importation from the north coast of Europe in proper freshness for the hair.

In the list of hair-dyes one agent has long been overlooked which is found in the humblest households. It is too common and humble, indeed, to excite confidence at first; but it is said that the water in which potatoes have been boiled with the skins on forms a speedy and harmless dye for the hair and eyebrows. The parings of potatoes before cooking may be boiled by themselves, and the water strained off for use. To apply it, the shoulders should be covered with cloths to protect the dress, a fine comb dipped in the water and drawn through the hair, wetting it at each stroke, till the head is thoroughly soaked. Let the hair dry thoroughly before putting it up. If the result is not satisfactory the first time, repeat the wetting with a sponge, taking care not to discolor the skin of the brow and neck. Exposing the hair to the sun out-of-doors will hasten the darkening, and set this dye. No hesitation need be felt about trying this; for potato-water is a safe article used in the household pharmacopœia in a variety of ways. It relieves chilblains if the feet are soaked in it while the water is hot, and is said to ease rheumatic gout.

Inquiries have been made after a cure for corns. It is not always the case that they come from wearing tight shoes. I have seen troublesome ones that were produced by wearing a loose cloth shoe that rubbed the sides of the foot. It is best from ten years old always to wear a snugly fitting shoe of light, soft leather, not so tight as to be painful, nor loose enough to allow the foot to spread. The muscles are grateful for a certain amount of compression, which helps them do their work. When corns are troublesome, make a shield of buckskin leather an inch or two across with a hole cut in the centre the size of the corn; touch the exposed spot with pyroligneous acid, which will eat it away in a few applications. Besides this, a strong mixture of carbolic acid and glycerine is good—say, one-fourth as much acid as glycerine. Of course only a very small quantity will be needed, and this must be kept out of the way, for it is a burning poison. In default of these, turpentine may be used both for corns and bunions. A weaker solution of carbolic acid will heal the soft corns between the toes.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THOSE who desire to escape from the sultry city for a few hours' recreation can make an easy and pleasant trip from Fulton slip to Morrisania, and thence to High Bridge, by steamer. We stepped upon the boat one day about half past ten in the morning, with no plan except to breathe fresher air and to see what might be seen. While not by any means luxurious, the boat was neat, quiet, and pleasant, and the sail a charming one. Touching at Astoria and Harlem, we reach Morrisania in about three-quarters of an hour. We step off the boat, intending to explore the town for a brief time, when the call "Steamer to High Bridge" resounds in our ears, and being informed that it connects with the return boats to New York, we speedily transfer ourselves to a diminutive craft, which lands us at High Bridge in half an hour. We take the trouble to inquire on board concerning the time of return boats to Morrisania, and receive a printed card, which informs us that after spending an hour at High Bridge we can take a boat back which "connects" with the New York boat. High Bridge, a magnificent aqueduct, about 1450 feet long and 114 high, conveying the Croton water over the Harlem River, is an object of interest worthy of detailed examination, for which the unaccustomed visitor will require considerable time. If one is familiar with that structure, he may spend an hour very pleasantly in walking through the groves, taking an ice-cream at any one of the numerous small hotels and restaurants which are conspicuously located near the bridge, and—in watching for the boat! The small steamer returned, somewhat behind time, and took us to Harlem, where most of the passengers left, a few remaining, like ourselves, expecting to be taken to Morrisania for the New York boat. But there seemed to be no indications of its starting, and nobody on board who knew any thing about it! At length a youth who seemed to have something to do with the management of the boat returned to it, and we made inquiries. "Yes," he said, "they should go across to Morrisania to meet the next boat." "When would that be?" He mentioned the time—an hour and five minutes hence, our watch informed us. "Was that what they called 'connecting?'" He was unable to reply. We showed the printed timetable, and meekly requested to be informed of its use. We received a confused answer; and surmising that boats left Harlem for New York somewhat sooner than an hour hence—though no such hint was given—we turned to leave the now almost deserted little steamer. Just at this crisis the gangway plank fell into the water. Now we had no fixed appointments for that day, nor were we in a hurry, which was fortunate. Moreover, this unusual circumstance enabled us to preserve an equable frame of mind, and to patiently observe the ludicrous position in which this trivial accident placed half a dozen passengers who had just begun to understand the state of the case. In the course of time somebody in authority came to attend to matters, the plank was fished up, we escaped from that boat in season to take one from Harlem, enjoyed another pleasant sail, and were safely landed at Peck Slip, feeling that, as excursions go, we had experienced a very satisfactory one—a delightful sail, and a practical knowledge of what the word "connecting" means, or may mean, on time-tables.

The stayers at home in this city were somewhat surprised to experience a bit of November weather, which, by some mistake apparently, was tucked into the middle of August. A great storm came with it, making one shiver in summer garments, and think affectionately of flannels and fires. Reports from the sea-shore stated that it was a "miserable time."

The proposed balloon trip across the Atlantic seems pretty generally to be regarded as an unWise undertaking, notwithstanding the sanguine hopes of its originator, Professor Wise.

Nantucket was formerly an active, busy place, devoted to the whale-fisheries; but with the decline of whaling stagnation fell upon the island, and, like the palace of the enchanted princess in the fairy story, where every body was put to sleep for a hundred years, every thing stands in statu quo. Nobody moves in, nobody moves away; nobody is born, nobody dies. A young man, aged eighty-four, informed a recent visitor that he had never seen a train of cars. He incidentally stated that he was in New Bedford a short time since, but, on being questioned as to the precise date of his visit, admitted that it was about forty years ago that he made the trip. A well-to-do barber, seventy-five years of age, remarked, as he bent nimbly over his work, that he expected to live twenty-five years longer, as no one died at that place as young as he.

The cultivation of olive-trees in the South has become quite a source of revenue. In Georgia an excellent article of table oil is made by some cultivators. The trees average five gallons of oil each season, with but little attention.

Leading artificial flower makers of Paris have combined to send to the Vienna Exposition a specimen of their united skill, consisting of a complete greenhouse filled with flowers of every description. The whole work exhibits wonderful artistic skill.

We never before heard that mosquitoes were of the slightest earthly use except to try the patience and good temper of mankind. Therefore we are pleased to be informed that one good service is ascribed to these insects in the South. They are said to feed on the fungous spores which give rise to malaria. There are several species of mosquitoes at the South in addition to that which is common in Northern climates. One kind is chiefly busy by day, biting but never singing. Another kind is abundant in the sun, can not be frightened away, but pierce through the thickest woolen garments with their sharp bills.

The "glory of Webster"—not Daniel, nor Noah, nor Professor John W., but the town of that name in Massachusetts—is said to be a lovely lake, designated by the beautiful and characteristic appellation of Lake Chaugogmagoglagogbunagoggungogsaygogyigoggagogbegogrugogcigogmaug—to be continued in our next. Not to wear this name out by every-day use, some genius, by a liberal application of syncope, reduced it to Chaubunagungamaug. Generally, however, by Websterians it is called "the lake," or "the pond," the well-known, the proper titles being reserved as company words to be used only on choice occasions. The lake is very picturesque and beautiful, and the water remarkably pure and clear. Its greatest length is not more than five miles, nor its greatest breadth over a mile, yet following the winding of the shore in and out, so numerous are its indentations that the zigzag line would be something like fifty miles in length. It is a favorite resort for picnic parties.

An exchange gives a detailed account of the manner of catching frogs in France and elsewhere. In connection with the subject this statement is made: "The frog needs no ether or chloroform to keep him quiet: strange to say, a dip in lukewarm water for half a minute will so completely deprive a frog of sensation that he may be cut to pieces and feel no pain." Now we would simply inquire, "Who has been a frog, and tried it?" Let the one who has had the experience make the report thereof.

In Oakland, California, a dog of literary turn of mind has been detected in stealing newspapers. It appears that day after day the dwellers in a certain street missed the paper which usually had been left by the carrier at their doors. A watch was instituted, and a King Charles spaniel was caught in the act of removing the papers. He was followed to his place of refuge, and an immense number of newspapers were found partially concealed in the ground.

A curious account appears in the newspapers of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, of the building in that city of a brick dwelling-house in ten and a half hours. The house was twenty feet by thirty on the ground-floor, two stories in height, and contained eight rooms. One hundred workmen were employed, and, the cellar foundation having been previously laid, the work was commenced at precisely six o'clock in the morning, and at night it was ready for a tenant. Whether any one has applied to hire the house we know not. Most people would prefer that somebody else would try living in so speedily built a dwelling.

It is proposed to form a new State from portions of Northern Mississippi, Western Tennessee, and Western Kentucky. The boundary lines are not yet decided upon, but if the plan most favorably considered be accepted, the new State would be bounded on the north by the Ohio and Tennessee rivers, on the east by the Tennessee River through Kentucky and Tennessee, and farther south by the State of Alabama, and on the south by what would be left—about two-thirds—of the State of Mississippi, and west by the Mississippi River. Its area would be about equal to that of Vermont and New Hampshire combined, and its form almost exactly a counterpart of New Hampshire.

FUNERAL RITES.

THE ancient Persians disposed of their dead by interment. Some of the royal tombs still existing have often been described. That of Cyrus is unique, being a sepulchral chamber in the shape of a small house, placed upon seven blocks of marble rising pyramid fashion. Most of the tombs were excavations in the sides of mountains, the fronts of which were adorned with magnificent carving. There was generally room for several bodies within. It is melancholy to think that, as in Egypt, many of these ancient receptacles of the dead have been rifled of their contents, probably by the greed of some of the very numerous invaders of Western Asia. Of the lower people among the Persians there was said to be a certain class of religionists that would not bury their dead until they had first been torn by some dog or bird of prey. They were afterward covered with wax and buried in the ground. The strange custom of exposing the bodies of the dead to the beasts of prey is said to prevail among the modern Parsees both of Persia and India. There are round towers open to the sky, except for bars of iron laid across at certain distances, on which the bodies are laid. The bones, after the birds have denuded them of their flesh, slip through the bars and fall down within.

Cannibalism is the most revolting practice that has prevailed concerning the disposal of the dead. Many of the ruder barbarians, when a man grew old or sickly, offered him in sacrifice, and feasted upon him.

But if a man died of disease, they buried him. The cannibalism of the New Zealand Maories was different. They devoured only the bodies of their enemies whom they had slain in battle; and the notion was that in so doing they condemned them to everlasting punishment in the other world.

The practice of interring with the dead implements and vessels containing food was common among many barbarous nations, of whom the ancient Scythians may be taken as a specimen. When a king died, the body was embalmed with frankincense and anise-seed, and inclosed in wax. It was then placed on a wagon and conducted through the principal tribes of Scythia, in each of which ceremonies of mourning took place, including personal mutilation. It was finally deposited upon a mattress in a large, square-shaped grave. In the space around the departed were placed the bodies of his favorite concubines, his cup-bearer, groom, and various other attendants, strangled for the occasion, and some of his horses. In one of the royal tombs at Kertch examined lately there were discovered a shield, sword, and arrow-heads, vases, silver drinking-cups, wine vessels, and three large caldrons containing mutton bones. Fragments of clothes were also discovered hanging from the walls. The intention, of course, was that the departed should take with him into the next world every thing that had been specially useful to him in this life.

A BATCH OF RECIPES.

In spring, when apple-trees are crowned with blossoms pink and white,
The eye beholds the fairy scene with ever-fresh delight;
The nose rejoices equally in this excess of bloom,
Inhaling with each vigorous sniff the delicate perfume.
But beauty fades and fragrance yields to time and to decay,
And soon these lovely blossoms droop and die and blow away.
And now the tiny fruit appears, just venturing on life,
Where dangers round its pathway stand, and threatening foes are rife;
But sun and air and showers combine the embryo to nourish
Till autumn, when the stately trees with full-grown apples flourish;
Some clothed in coats of glossy green and some in brilliant yellow,
Some crisp and spicy to the taste, and others soft and mellow;
Some with a cheek kissed by the sun, some with a russet skin,
Some for the dessert or to bake, some for the winter's bin;
Some saccharine, and acid some, and some between the two;
Some fit to grace a monarch's board, and worthless not a few.
But whether dry and void of taste, or sweet and full of juices,
They all arrive, or soon or late, to culinary uses.
When nicely pared and deftly cored and cut in quarters first,
You wrap them tenderly in folds of light and shortened crust,
And boil them faithfully an hour, or steam, if that's your choice:
You dub the mixture Apple Duff, and eat it with a sauce.
Or roll your pastry out with care and spread it on a platter,
Lay on the apples evenly, and sugar o'er them scatter;
Add spice, in kind and quantity to suit your appetite,
Then spread more pastry on the top and close the edges tight.
Some people fancy with a key the outer edge to embellish,
But with or without ornament 'tis safe to say 'twill relish.
And this we christen Apple Pie—it eats with cream tip-top—
The only difficulty is, you don't know when to stop.
Or roll your paste in little bits, like biscuit, only thinner,
Whene'er you wish a dainty bite to taper off your dinner,
And hide an apple in each one of all the numerous pieces,
Then with a series of brisk pats obliterate the creases,
Till round and smooth and fair they lie; then flour the surface lightly,
And tie each in a separate cloth, snugly, securely, tightly,
And steam or boil them full an hour, perhaps a trifle over,
Then eat them with a creamy sauce—you'll think you live in clover.
Such creetur comforts well deserve a notice and a name,
And Dumpling is the cognomen with which we greet the same.
Again: you banish skins and cores, again in quarters sever:
A larger quantity this time, to last—well, not forever,
But through the year if need require, or leastwise through cold weather,
And string them on strong thread or twine all lovingly together;
Expose them to the sun and air for quite a little season,
And measurably to the frost for known and obvious reasons;
And as the seasons roll around, and fruit meets swift decay,
The palate hankering after sass, you'll find Dried Apples pay.
Or take sweet apples, large and fair, and put them in a pan,
Get in, by dint of packing close, as many as you can,
And bake them till they're brown and soft—an hour's about the rule—
Then give them opportunity (they're better so) to cool;
And when you've eaten your fill, with cream, I shouldn't be surprised
To hear you say that Apples Baked were not to be despised.
Again: take apples not so sweet and bake them as before,
Then tenderly remove the skins and banish every core;
And when they're cool, with vigorous stroke you'll beat them smooth and fine,
Then add of sugar half a cup—the granulated kind;
Then gently break a fresh-laid egg, the yolk put in a cup,
And to the pulp and sugar add the white, and beat it up.
Beat on, nor let your courage fail, until before your eyes
The mixture white and whiter grows, increasing still in size;
And when it holds your spoon upright and looks like flakes of snow
Thrown up in drifts by Boreas (you ken he loves to blow),
You have a dish called Apple Snow by some æsthetic cooks—
I simply call it Apple Foam—and how d'ye like the looks?
Have ready-made a custard soft, and eat the two together:
'Twill boost your carnal nature up till you're just like a feather.
Again: rob apples of their skins—let stems and cores remain—
And put them in a vessel lined throughout with porcelain;
Add sugar, in small quantity if your fruit is saccharine;
If vice versa, and you're not by birth and nurture mean,
Throw sugar in ad libitum, regardless of hygiene;
Add water, put it on the stove, let flames around it play,
And bring it to the boiling-point, and keep it there all day,
Not cooling off, not boiling up, but merely hot and quiet;
And then— I fain would sound its praise, but epithets run riot;
I'll merely modestly assert it makes a fattening diet;
But Potted Apples have obtained a wide-spread reputation,
And need no added words from me of praise or approbation.
Again: take apples in their prime, and with a knife of silver—
The same material as the bow of little Dickey Dilver
Was forged in, so the classics say; of course the tale's no fiction,
Though marvelous in circumstance, extravagant in diction—
Slice them up thin, and as you slice, on all occasions festive,
With alternating bits of cheese, to aid the powers digestive,
Eat them, with thanks and gratitude that such a constant sinner
Obtains permission thus to spend the moments following dinner.
The Ministry of Apples now seems quite a fertile theme:
Pursued, 'twould lead to heights and depths of which I didn't dream,
And couldn't scale, and so at once I'll drop my feeble pen,
But if an inspiration comes you'll hear from me again.

DANCE OF THE CRANES.

See illustration on page 572.

THESE birds are celebrated for the extraordinary antics in which they sometimes indulge. Our artist has depicted one of these grotesque performances, such as are often witnessed by travelers journeying by rail on the Illinois prairies. "We used to see them," says a friend, "after frost, on the high prairie land between Rochelle and Ashton, about four o'clock in the afternoon, running about and bowing their heads in the most absurd fashion, flapping their wings and dancing on the tips of their toes, and a more comical sight could not be imagined." Other birds, such as Java sparrows and blackbirds, are addicted to the same Terpsichorean performances, and chassé and pirouette about in a way that would do credit to an accomplished ballet-dancer.

WHAT HAPPENED TO A BIT OF STEEL.

ONCE on a time a small steel rod lay on a shelf in a dingy old fifth-story room in England. It had lain there so long that it was all covered with rust, and it really seemed as though it would never be of any use in the world.

But one morning something happened. A man took down the rod, sharpened one end of it, and stuck the point through a small hole in a curious-looking steel plate fastened to a sort of bench. The hole was so small that only the sharp end could go through, and then it was seized by a pair of pinchers with an awful grip.

These pinchers were very peculiar; on the end they had a stout hook. And running over and over the bench was a long heavy chain, worked by steam.

Now when the pinchers had a good hold of the end of the steel rod, the workman quietly slipped the hook into one of the links of the iron chain. Something had to give then. The chain was worked by steam, and couldn't stop; the hook was strong, and wouldn't break; and the pinchers' grip was for good and all, and it wouldn't let go. Steady and strong came the pull; the steel rod yielded and yielded, and finally was pulled through that small hole.

Of course it was no longer a rod, but a round wire. And the man again sharpened the end and started it through a still smaller hole. Again he fastened on the pinchers and slipped in the hook; again came a tug; and, as before, the wire gave way, and became a much smaller and much longer wire.

So he went on, that relentless man, till the wire was very fine, and of course very long, when he put it up in a coil and sent it off to a big manufactory.

We'll follow it there in a minute; but I want to tell you that this curious workman is called a wire-drawer, and he not only draws iron and steel through these wonderful little holes, but he draws brass to make pins, copper to make telegraph wires, and gold and silver to make jewelry.

The smallest wire he draws is to make gold-lace, and it's very interesting to see. First is made a rod of silver, perhaps an inch thick and two feet long. This rod is heated and covered with gold-leaf, which is gold beaten out till it is thin as paper. Several thicknesses of gold-leaf are put on and thoroughly burnished, till it looks like a rod of gold. It is then drawn through the holes in the wire-drawer's plate till it is fine enough to go through the most minute holes, made through rubies. When done it is no thicker than a coarse hair. This most exquisite wire, still perfectly coated with gold (for the gold stretches as far as the silver), is then made flat, and by machinery wound around fine thread or silk.

Girls who embroider with gold or silver thread have probably noticed that the gold thread is, in fact, yellow cotton thread, with a most fairy-like ribbon of gold closely wound around it. This gold thread is woven into lace for various uses.

But we mustn't forget our steel wire, which has gone to another wonderful fifth story, where one hundred and fifty pairs of hands wait to help it through the house.

You think it could get through with less help? Well, wait till you see what's going to be made of it: the finest, smoothest, sharpest, most useful little thing in the world; famous in song and story; hated by some and loved by others: only a needle!

The first thing on the way to its high honors is to have its temper tried.

(I might put in a moral here, and tell you that you too, on your way in life, etc., etc., but I won't, and I hope you'll give me credit for resisting a temptation.)

The temper of the wire is not tried by having to take care of a younger brother, go to school, wear a shabby dress, or go to bed at nine o'clock, as your temper is, but by cutting a piece from the end of the coil, heating it, and plunging it into cold water. That hardens it, and by snapping in his fingers the workman can judge of its quality. If too brittle, it is put aside for some peculiar needles.

Being all right, however, the next thing is to wind it on a large wheel. For a medium-sized needle the coil is about two feet in diameter, and one mile and a quarter long. This will make forty or fifty thousand needles.

From this wheel it is wound on to an eight-sided wheel, and from that it is cut in two twice, at points opposite each other, making two bundles of wire about three feet long, with seventy or eighty wires in a bundle.

Do you wonder how it's cut? Well, it's done by the funniest pair of shears you ever saw; they look like the grandfather of all shears, and are worked by steam, opening and shutting about twenty times a minute. All the workman does is to hold the bundle into the jaws. Each wire is cut the length for two needles, by a gauge, and then thrown into a box. That is one of the busiest machines in the factory. You'll think it needs to be worked by steam when I tell you that it cuts, in the ten hours of a working-day, eight hundred thousand needles; and in the neighborhood of Redditch (where our needle is going to be made) are made one hundred millions of needles every week. Let me put it into figures, and see how big it looks—100,000,000.

It seems as though they would stock the world in a few weeks, don't it? But the year after our war thirty millions a week came to us. And we had needle factories of our own too.

The next operation is to straighten them. They were wound on a wheel, you know, and that would bend them somewhat; besides, they get bent in cutting. For straightening they go to another machine. The workman takes two strong iron rings and packs them full of needles, standing up, you understand. It will hold five or six thousand. When they are tightly wedged in, the rings are put on an iron table, where there is a groove made to receive them. Over this table hangs a rule, as it is called, which also has grooves to fit the rings. The rule is brought down tight on the bundles of needles, and then by machinery moved back and forth. Of course the bundles of wire turn round, and so tightly are the needles pressed together that they are instantly made straight.

Needle-straightening used to be a trade by itself, and when a manufacturer tried to introduce this simple machine into a factory in England the straighteners thought they were to be thrown out of work, and they mobbed the man and drove him out of town. But that is nothing unusual for ignorant workmen: they always fight against any improvement.

After straightening, the needles are taken to the pointers. These men sit all day at the grindstone. There are twenty or thirty of them generally, in two rows down a room, and all driven —the stones, not the men—by steam or water power. The stones are about eighteen inches in diameter, and go so fast that they are apt to fly to pieces; so they are partly incased in iron to hold them together. A workman takes up fifty or sixty wires in his hand and holds the ends against the stone, at the same time turning them between his finger and thumb to make the points round. He has a thumb-piece of leather, and it is done in a minute. It is called "roughing down." They can't use water on their grindstones, because it would rust the needles.

There's a great deal of steel dust flying around these grindstones, and though the workman used to tie a handkerchief over his mouth, he could not help breathing it, and it was very unhealthy. It would give a man the consumption in a few years. He got extra pay on that account. Now here's another instance of ignorant prejudice: when a machine was invented to drive away the dust, the grinders opposed its introduction, because they would no longer get extra wages. It made no difference, though; the machines were soon in use. They drive the dust away from the workman, as fast as it is made, by a strong stream of wind, blown on the stone by two immense pairs of bellows, something like a blacksmith's, only they are worked by steam-power. The wind is turned exactly on to the grindstone; as the dust flies up it is blown back of the wheel into a sort of box built on purpose, and there it falls harmlessly out of the way.

Now, you remember, our needle is as yet two needles joined by the heads. In some factories the eyes are cut while in this shape, but in the one I'm telling of they are first separated.

They are cut apart by help of a gauge. This is a square piece of copper, with two sides turned up to make an edge. Not two opposite sides, but two adjoining sides. You see they put a pile of the double needles on the gauge, with the points resting against one of the turned-up edges, and kept from falling off by the other turned-up edge. This plate is just the length of the needle they are making, and the workman holds the edge of the plate of needles up to the steam-scissors, which instantly cut them off. Then he puts into a box the ends he has on the plate, gathers up those he cut off, and then they're ready for the head-flattener.

You didn't know they had flat heads? Look carefully at one and see for yourself.

The head-flattener seizes between his left thumb and finger twenty or twenty-five needles by the points, spreads them out like a fan, and lays each head in succession on a square block of steel three inches each way.

(A cube, did you say? Well, I knew it, but how did I know that you did?)

As each head rests on the steel, the workman gives it a blow with a small hammer. That flattens it, but also hardens it, so it has to be annealed before the eye can be cut.

There's a hard word, I declare! I meant to keep them out of this paper. People who want to be very wise may go to the big books and dig out the hard words for themselves. Now for annealed they might just as well say softened, for that's exactly what it is. It softens the needles and makes them easy to cut.

When annealed, it is taken to the piercer. This is a child, boy or girl, who lays the needle on a block of steel, places a tiny punch on it, and gives it a tap with a hammer. A very tiny punch it is, too.

Some factories punch the eye by a stamping machine. The piercers punch first one side and then the other, and they get to be so expert that they are fond of astonishing visitors by punching a hole in a hair and threading it with another hair. Wonderful as that sounds, it isn't any more so than punching the eye of a No. 12 needle.

The next operator, also a child, has a lump of lead before him; on this he lays the needle, and drives a punch through the eye, which is left very sharp by the first punch, and would cut mamma's thread terribly. While the punch is still in the eye he lays the needle over on its side, on a piece of steel, and gives it a tap each side to make the eye take the right shape. He can do four thousand in an hour—at least they say so.

The next thing is to make the gutters. Did you know a needle had gutters? Look carefully at the eye of a needle, and you'll see a sort of groove to guide the thread into the eye. That's what they call a gutter. The man who makes gutters takes a needle in a pair of pinchers like the figure 8, lays the head in a groove made on purpose for it, then takes a tiny file, places it on the eye, and with one blow forms the gutter; he turns it over and does it again; then he takes his file and rounds off the head of the needle, opens his pinchers, and lets the finished needle fall out. In some factories they have stamps for this too, worked by the foot, as we work our sewing-machines.

You remember the first thing that happened to the steel wire in the needle factory was to have its temper tried. Well, after they get the needle all made they have another fuss about the temper. The fact is, it's as important to the usefulness of a needle to have a good temper as it is to boys and girls.

So the needle goes to a man called a temperer. He takes thirty or forty pounds of them—that is, from two hundred and fifty thousand to five hundred thousand needles (according to size)—lays them on iron plates, and heats them red-hot. In this state he throws them into a cistern of cold water.

It's a funny idea to throw needles into a cistern; but the temperer's cistern isn't like ours. It is made on purpose for needles, and the water can be drawn out, leaving them dry on the bottom. Then they are tempered—that is, they are stiff and hard. You know you can't bend them as you can pins; they will break.

Not all tempering is alike. In one place the needles are fried, or at least they are put into a frying-pan with some grease. The grease burns out, and the needles are then tempered. By this time many of the needles are bent and twisted, and they have to be straightened again before they go on.

Perhaps you think they ought to be done by this time; but so far from that, they have to be polished, which is the longest and most expensive part of making a needle. For the first operation of polishing—and there are five—the needles are rolled up into bundles in canvas, with emery powder and oil between the layers. Each bundle is about one foot long, it holds five hundred thousand needles, and is thoroughly tied with cords. A man takes twenty or thirty of these bundles, puts them in a machine, where they are pressed down and rolled back and forth by steam-power. This makes every needle rub against the others and the emery. Here they roll for eighteen or twenty hours.

It seems as if that ought to polish them to perfection, don't it? But needle-makers don't think so. They undo the bundles, put them up afresh, and roll ten times to make the best needles. When sufficiently rolled they go into wooden bowls, with sawdust to absorb the black grease. Nice, dirty-looking things they are, too. After the bowls they are put into a cask with fresh sawdust, and turned around till clean in the eye. This operation is also gone through ten times.

The next thing is the last you would expect in a needle factory; it is winnowing. The sawdust and grinding powder are blown away, leaving the needles bright and clean. They have, however, still another scouring in a copper cask with hot soap-suds. It turns slowly around, and they are thoroughly washed.

How would you like to spend your life wiping these needles on linen rags? Many little girls do it in England. Then they go to the sorting-room. This is a very dry room at the top of the building, and here they are laid the same way, as to heads and points, and those with broken points are picked out. The man who does that puts two or three thousand needles in an iron ring about as big as your napkin-ring, then he very carefully examines the points, and pulls out the broken ones with a hook, which looks as much like one of your jackstraw hooks as any thing. They don't throw the broken ones away; they grind them down again and sell them for an inferior needle. If they are at all bent, they must be straightened again. And then they come to the last operation—bluing.

That seems funny, but no more so than tempering, frying, and winnowing. The bluer takes twenty-five at a time and holds them against a fine hone stone, turning them briskly around. It gives them a bluish look. Nothing remains now but to put them in the little blue papers we know so well, stick on the two printed slips, and pack them in boxes. One factory keeps busy quite an army of packers.

I have read somewhere of two wonderful needles made as curiosities, just to show what could be done. One was presented to some monarch, and was covered with engraved scenes that could only be seen with a microscope. The other also presented to a crowned head, was still more wonderful, being a needle inclosed in another, which opened to allow the inner one to be removed. This also was exquisitely engraved.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Editorship not its own Reward.—A Veteran Rifle-Shot.—Sensationalism in Religion.—Like Counsel, like Claimant.—Playing at History.

MR. MIALL, M.P., the editor of the Nonconformist, was entertained the other day at our Crystal Palace, and presented by his political admirers with a little present of ten thousand guineas. I think I would be an editor myself at that price. So far as I know, there is no parallel to so large a gift—though Cobden had sixty thousand pounds given to him—to any one in this gentleman's profession. Years ago, I remember, a similar expression of political feeling (though, as it turned out, on a smaller scale) was designed for the editor of the Scotsman, which is the North British Times. It was a matter of doubt with him, however, whether he should accept a money gift, since his doing so might destroy his prestige, and he took counsel with a fellow-countryman upon the subject. The advice of his friend was characteristic: "Sandy, my man, if it's five thousand pounds, tak' it; but if it's less than five thousand, don't tak' it, and say you would not have taken it had it been fifty thousand." As far as I recollect, however, it was less, though not much less, than the figures fixed upon, and he did "tak'" it.

A testimonial has also been given of late, though not of such material value, to Captain Ross, the veteran rifle-shot, by the Wimbledon volunteers, upon his retirement from public shooting. As a sportsman his career has probably been unrivaled. His walking, when he had been training for a month or two, averaged five miles an hour. Indeed, he once accomplished, "fair toe and heel," six miles in fifty-six minutes on the road between Melton and Leicester. However, his greatest feat on feet was performed not as principal, but as umpire, which shows us that there were other giants of pedestrianism in those days (I think the date was 1837) as well as he. A large party of sportsmen were assembled at Black Hall, in Kincardineshire, Scotland, about the beginning of August. All of them had been shooting snipe and "flapper" ducks in a large morass on the estate, and wading among bulrushes for seven or eight hours, since which they had had a capital dinner. It was not a moment to propose walking any where, yet at nine o'clock, when the ladies had gone to the drawing-room, and Ross had dropped asleep in his chair, he was awoke by Sir Andrew Hay with these unseasonable words: "Ross, old fellow, I want you to jump up and go as my umpire with Lord Kennedy to Inverness. I have made a bet of £2500 a side that I get there on foot before him." Over the Grampian range the straightest path that could be taken from Black Hall was about one hundred miles, certainly over ninety. Ross's answer was short, but to the point—"All right; I'm ready." They started at once, in their thin shoes and silk stockings, but their servants rode after them with better foot-gear, and overtook them after they had gone about seven miles. "My idiot, however," to use Ross's own words, "brought me certainly worsted stockings, but instead of shoes a pair of tight Wellington boots. His excuse was that my shooting shoes were damp from wading in the morass in the daytime, so that I had to make the best of it in the Wellingtons. The sole of one boot vanished twenty-five miles from Inverness, and I had to finish the walk barefoot." They walked all night, next day, and all next night—it rained torrents all the way—and got to Inverness at 6 A.M. Sir Andrew Hay had gone by the coach road, a good one, but thirty-six miles further round, and arrived at 10 A.M. However, in his umpire's (Ross's) opinion, Hay had won, because Lord Kennedy, "being a good deal beaten," had leaned on the arm of his attendant in going up and down hill. The question, it was agreed, was to be referred to Captain Barclay, the then great authority on walking, but was ultimately dropped, luckily for his lordship, since afterward Barclay said he should have given it against him.

This Lord Kennedy was a sporting wonder in his way, and jealous of Ross's reputation in the same line. He could not ride so well as "the captain," but he thought he knew a man that could (one Captain Douglas), and backed him for a very heavy sum to win a certain steeple-chase against the former. The night before the race his lordship sent for his adversary, and said that as so large a sum was pending on the race, it would be well that there should be no opening for a quibble, and that therefore the jostling and crossing which invalidates a flat race should be permitted.

"Ah, you mean that we may ride over or even kill each other, if we can," said Ross.

"Just so," was the other's candid reply.

Ross, on Clinker, and Douglas, on Radical, met, therefore, on that understanding. The first jump was a five-barred gate, and Ross, when within fifty yards of it, saw that Radical meant to refuse; so, recollecting the bargain of the previous evening, he held his own horse well in hand, and when the other, close to the gate, turned round in front of him, he stuck the spurs in and rode at horse and man, knocking Douglas over the gate and leaving Radical on his own side of it. "In these shop-keeping days," remarks Ross in the letter which describes this little circumstance, "killing a man that way would be brought in willful murder, but it was not so in 1826." This was rough riding indeed, but, except Osbaldistone ("the squire," as he was called), no man was his equal across country.

Of his shooting, those who understand such matters will appreciate it when we state that he once shot ten brace of swallows in one day with a pistol and single ball. And it is very significant that though living in fire-eating times, and acting as second in sixteen duels, he never acted as principal. Professional duelists, with all the nice sense of honor with which they are credited, took care, it seems, not to quarrel with really "good shots," and Captain Ross, it is interesting to know, has stated it as his opinion that people are now much more guarded in their language than when swaggering and offering to fight went a long way toward whitewashing a scoundrel, and therefore incited him to pick a quarrel. Of his skill in that particular line of shooting which has just gained this veteran his parting cheer at Wimbledon, we may mention that in his time the gallant captain has won all the three great cups there—the Association, the Wimbledon, and the Duke of Cambridge's—while no one else has won more than one.

A curious example of the popularity of what is contemptuously termed sensational writing is evidenced by the fact that the style is being adopted by religious writers. This will not, indeed, be new, as sensation itself is not new, to those who remember the play-bills of the Rev. Rowland Hill, in which the Last Judgment was described under the guise of a theatre, but it is deserving of notice nevertheless. Every week, in the most largely circulated weekly paper in England, Lloyd's News, an advertisement in the nature of a tract is inserted by an enthusiastic clergyman, and this is his last production:

"THE TWO RAILWAY LINES.

"THE UP LINE

"Is an immense undertaking; its length beyond all calculation. Grand Terminus, 'The City whose builder and maker is God.' Its Engineer and Contractor, the Lord Jesus Christ. The gauge is narrow. Cost per mile enormous. Neither silver nor gold could pay for a single foot of it: being nothing less than the life of Him who made it. Trains have been running on it with perfect safety for 1800 years and more, and are running still. All tickets are first class; and notwithstanding the difficulties of construction and costly character of the line, they may be had without money and without price. Yet, strange to say, the Trains are by no means crowded. Most people are shy of them; and those who do travel this way vary in their occupation of the time. But varied as the people in the several carriages appear—some doubting, others enjoying perfect assurance—the train is perfectly safe, and the Terminus will soon be reached. A magnificent City, whose very paving stones are gold, and whose walls are jasper set with precious stones, is not far from them.

"THE DOWN LINE.

"This too is a daring undertaking. Satan was its Engineer and Contractor. The gauge is broad. The trains have been running for centuries. The great and awful Terminus—HELL. The undertaking has been a great success. The carriages have been made most roomy and comfortable. The Guard is Beelzebub. The Engine-driver, Apollyon. Every effort is put forth to secure passengers. Tickets for nothing! Drink, Music, and various Entertainments on the way. See how fast the trains fill with people. Not a thought do they give to any thing beyond present enjoyment, and the train whirls them on to the frightful precipice of Destruction. Steam is on! Away they fly! Do they know where they are bound for? Sound the alarm! hoist the red flag! danger ahead! Ahoy, there! ahoy! Shout louder! louder still! The pit of hell is before ye! Faster and faster they rush along! Nothing alarms them. They near the precipice! They are alarmed now! They cry out, 'Stop the train!' 'Too late! too late!' and with shouts for help and yells of despair, over they go. Reader, which train are you in? Up or down? Don't shirk the question, I pray you! Your eternal destiny is at stake, remember!"

It is doubtful, of course, whether this sort of appeal is really efficacious, but it is certainly not wanting in vigor.

The claimant's defense has been commenced by his advocate, Dr. Kenealy, of whom it may almost be said, "like counsel, like client." His speech, so far, has been a mere tirade of abuse against every body connected with the prosecution, and even against every body—which includes all the intelligence and respectability of the country—who believes the defendant to be a butcher. Curiously enough, the line he has taken is to prove young Sir Roger to have been a base and vicious lad, in order to assimilate his character to that confessed to by his own client. One whole day has, therefore, been devoted to reading (ladies being excluded from the court) passages from the works of Paul de Kock, of which author the youthful baronet had, as Mr. Kenealy assumes, because he possessed some of his works, a particular admiration. One might almost as well conclude a man to be a religious character because one finds a Bible in his house. But apart from this humorous logic, this spectacle of an advocate demolishing the morality of the man he is paid to defend is very curious and noteworthy.

The greatest piece of humor "out," however, on a very grand scale is without doubt what is now occurring in the Spanish peninsula, where, between Don Carlos and the Irreconcilables, anarchy has got to such length that a private citizen having obtained possession of six cannon, and having a little money of his own, I suppose, has been going about the country taking little towns, and dictating his own terms to their inhabitants. We have read nothing in history, in the way of what is called "private enterprise," at all equal to this.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

CONSUMPTION OF HUMAN HAIR.

THREE Leipsic establishments, employing several hundred persons, have so increased their consumption of human hair within the last few years that the price has steadily advanced; and Bohemia, Moravia, and Hungary (the chief sources of supply) not furnishing enough, large quantities have been brought from France, as well as some from Westphalia, Thuringia, etc., and lately even from Sweden. Quite recently Chinese hair has been put into the market, from Liverpool and Paris, at a price one-third that of a good quality of European hair; but its use is limited, on account of its stiffness and prevalent dark brown color.

THE HAT ON THE HEAD.

"HAPPINESS," echoed the Setter of Things Right, looking doubtfully at Mr. Luke. "Alas! only too many of you pursue happiness as an absent-minded man looks for the hat that is on his head, and if you have unconsciously lost it in the mistaken search, who can restore it? However, the answer is not with me, but in the chamber of past opportunities. Go in there. Look with the rest, and see what you have left for yourself, if any thing."

Mr. Luke started. For the first time he saw that he was not alone, and, preoccupied as he was, stared in some wonder at the anxious faces about him. Rachel, the gay young bride, who had just secured the best match of the county; Mrs. Vhasti, prominent in church matters, and a saint; Mrs. Jonas, comely and complacent, mother of five daughters, and looking almost as young as they. Mr. Luke knew the trouble of his own heart, but what did these want here? What need had they of added happiness, and why should they come groping among past opportunities as he did? As if reading his thoughts, the Setter of Things Right smiled slightly, and opened a door, revealing the chamber of past opportunities, dusky and dim, as it should be, filled with shadows, and wearing that silent look that you sometimes see in a face. The little group hesitated a moment on the threshold, and then entered, seating themselves carefully apart each from the other.

Mr. Luke was a man of success—one of those whom shifting, uncertain, struggling people had in mind when they carped bitterly about luck. The world delighted to honor him. Yet Mr. Luke came to the Setter of Things Right for happiness, as the remedy for a certain constant craving—vague, but he wished to be rid of it. Now, staid man of business as he was, his heart beat rapidly. What should he see? He was conscious of a curious power of beholding himself, as if he stood apart, and took an outside view. As if it had been some other man, he watched himself at his desk and in his counting-room, only there was an evident change in his ideas of proportion, due no doubt to the shadows of the mysterious room in which he sat. Actually in his office, he felt himself in the heart of the world, all its pulses throbbing audibly in his ear through the telegraph; but here— He saw his warehouse on one side, out of line of his home and of that great outside world in which dwelt all the brothers and sisters of his race, and, oddly enough, recognized the fact with discomfort and a painful belief that in home and the sympathies of this outside world were the missing elements he craved; so that he cried out at his other self, intrenched there behind safes and ledgers. He said that he was a death in life; that only his money getting and keeping faculties and perceptions were alive within him; that the rest of his soul and heart, for want of contact with his race and growth in his home, had starved slowly, and that miserable craving was simply their hunger; and he was morally drawn and shrunken and shriveled, and more hopeless than the cripple of Bethesda; for what water could revive the love he had repelled, and the faith, hope, and delights he had killed? He had invested his opportunities in misery, put them out at compound interest, and was undone.

Rachel, the bride, looked timidly around her. She hoped no one had recognized her under her veil. People were such gossips! If she was noticed—she who was just married—Mr. Lolly would never forgive her if it was discovered. He would say it looked as if he ill-treated her, coming there for happiness; and yet how should she live on through the slow years, if this were all? She must know what remained for her, if any thing; and, growing desperate here, she looked and saw. Well, as you perceive, every visitor there saw himself or herself, only proportions and relative values were changed, as with Mr. Luke. Her father had blessed her. She had made his heart glad, and crowned his pride. The prim women who never lost a chance to flout her saluted her now with sour respect. The girls envied her. Yet, as she saw herself now, she had married bricks and mortar, oak and silver, and Axminster and lace and velvet. It was like the fairy tales she read when a child. The greed of society had transformed a man into all these, and she had married it or them—as you may choose to say—and for her now but one opportunity remained. She might transform him back into a man, set him free from that for which she had married him, and in the years of patience it would need, learn from the pain it cost her to love him. Would she prove strong enough? Was her heart great enough?

Mrs. Jonas glanced sharply at Rachel. The slender figure was not unlike one of her own daughters, and at the bare suggestion Mrs. Jonas recoiled in dread. People cited the Jonas family as cheery and united, and quoted the mother and daughters as filling the relations rather of sisters; yet Mrs. Jonas was always conscious of an odd sense of intrusion in the society of her daughters. They were affectionate, respectful; but she had somehow lost the key to their hearts, and could not find it. She had been a proud and watchful mother. She saw them again, as she thought of it, toddling babies: misses in short frocks, well-kept, well-dressed, fair, fat, but in want of something. Little hands were constantly pulling at her skirts. She was a comely woman now; she had been marvelously pretty. It was one of Jonas's sources of pride, the compliments so often paid to his girlish wife. She was always one of the best-dressed women in town. She could see herself now as she looked in her green cloth habit and Leghorn hat. She embroidered the habit herself, and time enough it cost her. They were popular in the neighborhood, the cheery man and his pretty wife. Their invitations were many; their house was always gay with company, for, added to the rest, she was a notable housewife, and gave good cheer. She was a very busy woman. Her children were never neglected; fathers quoted them to careless mothers. But they had odd tempers. The oldest was so easily hurt, the youngest so silent even under injustice, the second sister had such odd, unchildlike fancies! She was wanted to explain, to soothe, to encourage; to hear with patience, and deal out cautious judgment, to explain the child and her fancies to herself. As I said, their little hands were forever tugging at her skirts, offering her the key of their hearts, and somehow it was dropped at last in a silent despair and indignation, to which children are much more liable than we think. Mrs. Jonas thought nothing about it then. She was so busy with plans for her wardrobe, her housewifery, her friends, her embroidery, though she was careful that the children wanted nothing that could be worn or eaten or bought with money. And so the key was lost! And if they wished now to give it to her, that would be impossible. There is no such impassable gulf as the quiet, kind, cold separation of years between members of the same family.

Mrs. Vhasti sat sternly communing with sombre doubts. She believed; else why did she live a life of faith in the unseen world and of systematized benevolence? Her face was set and pinched with anxieties concerning fairs, donations, visiting committees, Bible classes, sewing circles, orphans' homes, mothers' meetings, missionary boxes, Easter bouquets, baptismal fonts, clerical misdemeanors, church matters in general. She was an encyclopedia of such experience, a recognized authority in all kindred undertakings, a female pope in benevolent societies. Many will give you money, but she added time and strength, and she had spent years in the cause. Her health was breaking, and a subdued acidity of expression told of the ingratitude of the poor, the perversity of sewing circles, the stupidity and obstinacy of clergymen, teachers, and Bible-readers. Now the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace; but a general sense of disappointment, irritation, and weariness was the fruit she gathered. What could ail Mrs. Vhasti? Doing the work of the Lord, where was her reward? If she had been self-loving and self-centred like —well, say, Mrs. Paula. Here she started. Had her thoughts actually evoked that indolent, purposeless woman, or was she talking close beside her? For she heard her voice not ten steps away.

"Yes, she is insolent at times, and untidy too, miserably untaught, and so provoking! She sticks my whole day full of pins. If I send her away, I shall have peace and ease, for Nettie is breaking up, and would send me her own cook. But how do I know if any one else would remember that she is, after all, of our own family, and that some one of us is bound to Jesus to look after her? Very likely that some one is me, Harriet Paula, since the thought has occurred to me. I can teach her. She is beginning to feel that I care for her personally, outside of what she can do; and my patience with her has made her more penitent and ashamed than sharp reproof and dismissal could have done. Now, if I send her away it may be into outer darkness, and she may lose her last chance for rising above her present level. I think I had better keep her, although she is such a trial."

A deep flush burned suddenly in Mrs. Vhasti's cheeks; for, whether it was fancy or not, she heard a solemn voice—"She hath done more than they all!" And, as if the lightning had burned it into her soul, she found the conviction there that on all sides she had passed by and missed similar opportunities for doing her Master's work, and that intolerance and self-righteousness had bound her so fast that she walked crippled, and had no hand free to stretch out and grasp the reward for which she sought.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE IN ITALY.

THE Venetian provinces were the scene of a lamentable calamity on the 29th of June, which has proved to be far more serious than was at first reported. In the districts of Treviso and Belluno scores of victims were buried under the ruins of public and private edifices, and Belluno itself was so cruelly shattered by shocks of earthquake as to be now wholly uninhabitable. A terrified crowd of men, women, and infants are hopelessly wandering about even at the present time in quest of shelter—tents of refuge have been erected in open spaces—and the damage to property is reckoned at several millions of lire. The fine old cathedral of Belluno has been hopelessly destroyed, as well as the interior of the not less fine old town-hall, while the handsome residential palace of the bishop, as it threatens to become a ruin, is to be demolished. Nearly the whole city, in fact, will have to be pulled down and rebuilt to make it habitable again. But the most appalling incidents of the disaster took place in the Church of S. Pietro di Feletto, in Conegliano, shown among the illustrations on page 572, where no less than thirty-four persons were killed, and nearly as many more or less seriously wounded. The scene after the calamity baffles description; and we leave, under the circumstances, the imagination of our readers to realize what followed the melancholy event. The bodies of the victims taken from beneath the ruins were most horribly mutilated and disfigured. A poor laborer was on his way to the church, when he felt the ground was giving way under his feet, and being unable to remain upright, lay down at full length, when he saw the old tower oscillating like a tree agitated by the wind, and large volumes of smoke issuing from the church, where the first morning mass was being celebrated.

The church was one of the oldest monuments of the district, it having been built in the year 1000, and was situated on the top of a hill, forming part of a most attractive chain of heights, with the river Piave on one side and the Alps on the other.

WEDDING DRESS.

THIS elegant wedding dress is of the creamy white faille called orange-blossom faille. The skirt is a long demi-train, trimmed to represent a court train and tablier. Around the bottom is thick kilt pleating of the silk, and a flounce of round point lace headed by silk folds; this lace flounce is carried up the front side seams to the waist; two lace flounces trim the front breadth; four-looped bows of silk, with orange-blossom clusters, are set on the folds at intervals. The vest-basque is longer in front than behind; point lace of medium width edges the basque, while narrower lace and folds outline the vest and trim the sleeves. A ruff of lace is around the neck. Orange-blossom bouquet in front of corsage, and a wreath above the forehead. The long veil is of Malines tulle. Solitaire pearl earrings. White kid gloves. White silk slippers.

BLUE-JACKETS' PETS.

BLUE-JACKETS, as sailors are sometimes styled, are passionately fond of pets. They must have something to love, if it be but a woolly-headed nigger boy or a cockroach in a 'baccy-box.

Jock of ours was a seal of tender years, who for many months retained the affection of all hands, until washed overboard in a gale of wind. This creature's time on board was fully occupied in a daily round of duty, pleasure, and labor. His duty consisted in eating seven meals a day, and bathing in a tub after each; his pleasure, to lie on his side on the quarter-deck, and be scratched and petted; while his labor consisted of ceaselessly endeavoring to enlarge a certain scupper-hole sufficiently to permit his escape to his native ocean. How indefatigably he used to work day by day, and hour after hour, scraping on the iron first with one flipper, then another, then poking his nose in to measure the result with his whiskered face! He kept the hole bright and clear, but did not sensibly enlarge it, at least to human ken. Jock's successor on that ship was a youthful bear of Arctic nativity. He wasn't a nice pet. He took all you gave him, and wanted to eat your hand as well, but he never said "Thank you," and permitted no familiarity. When he took his walks abroad, which he did every morning, although he never went out of his road for a row, he walked straight ahead with his nose downward, growling, and gnawed and tore every thing that touched him—not at all a pet worth being troubled with.

Did the reader ever hear of the sailor who tamed a cockroach? Well, this man I was shipmate with. He built a little cage, with a little kennel in the corner of it, expressly for his unsavory pet, and he called the creature Idzky—"which he named himself, Sir," he explained to me. Idzky was a giant of his race. His length was fully four inches, his breadth one inch, while each of his waving feelers measured six. This monster knew his name and his master's voice, hurrying out from his kennel when called upon, and emitting the strange sound which gained for him the cognomen Idzky. The boatswain, his master, was as proud of him as he might have been of a prize pug, and never tired of exhibiting his eccentricities. I met the boatswain the other day at the Cape, and inquired for his pet.

"Oh, Sir," he said, with genuine feeling, "he's gone, Sir. Shortly after you left the ship poor Idzky took to taking rather much liquor, and that don't do for any of us, you know, Sir. I think it was that, for I never had the heart to put him on allowance; and he went raving mad, had regular fits of delirium tremens, and did nothing but run round his cage and bark, and wouldn't look at any thing in the way of food. Well, one day I was coming off the forenoon watch, when what should I see but a double line of them 'P' ants working in and out of the little place: twenty or so were carrying a wing, and a dozen a leg, and half a score running on with a feeler, just like men carrying a stowed mainsail; and that, says I, is poor Idzky's funeral; and so it was, and I didn't disturb them. Poor Idzky!"

Peter was a pet mongoose of mine, a kindly, cozy little fellow, who slept around my neck at night, and kept me clear of cockroaches, as well as my implacable enemies, the rats. I was good to Peter, and fed him well, and used to take him on shore at the Cape among the snakes. The snakes were for Peter to fight; and the way my wary wee friend dodged and closed with, and finally throttled and killed, a cobra was a caution to that subtlest of all the beasts of the field. The presiding Malay used to clap his brown hands with joy as he exclaimed, "Ah! sauvé good mongoose, Sar, proper mongoose to kill de snake!"

"You don't object, do you," I modestly asked my captain one day, while strolling on the quarter-deck after tiffin—"you don't object, I hope, to the somewhat curious pets I at times bring on board?"

"Object?" he replied. "Well, no; not as a rule. Of course you know I don't like your snakes to get gliding all over the ship, as they were the other day. But, doctor, what's the good of my objecting? If any one were to let that unholy beast in the box yonder loose—"

"Don't think of it, captain," I interrupted; "he'd be the death of somebody, to a dead certainty."

"No, I'm not such a fool," he continued. "But if I shot him, why, in a few days you'd be billeting a boa-constrictor or an alligator on me, and telling me it was for the good of science and the service."

The unholy beast in the box was the most splendid and graceful specimen of the monitor lizard I have ever seen. Fully five feet long from tip to tail, he swelled and tapered in the most perfect lines of beauty. Smooth, though scaly, and inky black, tartaned all over with transverse rows of bright yellow spots, with eyes that shone like wild-fire, and teeth like quartz, with his forked tongue continually flashing out from his bright red mouth, he had a wild, weird loveliness that was most uncanny. Mephistopheles, as the captain not inaptly called him, knew me, however, and took his cockroaches from my hand, although perfectly frantic when any one else went near him. If a piece of wood, however hard, were dropped into his cage, it was instantly torn in pieces; and if he seized the end of a rope, he might quit partnership with his head, but never with the rope.

One day, greatly to my horror, the steward entered the wardroom, pale with fear, and reported, "Mephistopheles escaped, Sir, and yaffling" (rending) "the men." I rushed on deck. The animal had indeed escaped. He had torn his cage into splinters, and declared war against all hands. Making for the fore hatchway, he had seized a man by the jacket skirts going down the ladder. The man got out of the garment without delay, and fled faster than any British sailor ought to have done. On the lower deck he chased the cook from the coppers, and the carpenter from his bench. A circle of Kroomen were sitting mending a foresail; Mephistopheles suddenly appeared in their midst. The niggers unanimously threw up their toes, individually turned somersaults backward, and sought the four winds of heaven. These routed, my pet turned his attention to Peepie. Peepie was a little Arab slave lass. She was squatting by a calabash, singing low to herself, and eating rice. He seized her cummerbund: it was her only garment. But Peepie wriggled clear—natural—and ran on deck, the innocent, like the "funny little maiden" in Hans Breitmann that "had got nodings on." On the cummerbund Mephistopheles spent the remainder of his fury, and the rest of his life; for, not knowing what might happen next, I sent for a fowling-piece, and the plucky fellow succumbed to the force of circumstances and a pipeful of buckshot. I have him yonder on the sideboard, in body and in spirit (gin), bottle-mates with a sand-snake, three centipeds, and a tarantula.

With monkeys, baboons, apes, and all of that ilk, navy ships, when homeward bound, are oft-times crowded. Of our little crew of seventy, I think nearly every man had one, and some two, such pets, although fully one-half died of chest diseases as soon as the ship came into colder latitudes. These monkeys made the little craft very lively indeed, and were a never-ending source of amusement and merriment to all hands. I don't like monkeys, however. They "are so near, and yet so far," as respects humanity. I went shooting them once—a cruel sport, and more cowardly even than elephant-hunting in Ceylon—and when I broke the wrist of one, instead of hobbling off, as it ought to have done, it came howling piteously toward me, shaking and showing me the bleeding limb. The little wretch preached me a sermon anent cruelty to animals that I shall not forget till the day I die.

Do parrots know what they say? At times I think they do. Our parson on board the old Rumbler had no more attentive listener to the Sabbath morning service than wardroom Polly; but there were times when Polly made responses when silence would have been more judicious. There was an amount of humor which it is impossible to describe in the sly way she one day looked the parson in the face as he had just finished a burst of eloquence both impassioned and impressive, and uttered one of her impertinent remarks. She was guilty of a still greater indiscretion. For some months she was denied access to church because she had once forgotten herself so far as to draw corks during the sermon—this being considered "highly mutinous and insubordinate conduct." But she regained her privilege. Poor Poll! I'll never forget the solemn manner in which she shut her eyes one day at the close of the service, as if still musing on the words of the sermon, on the mutability of all things created, and remarked, "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity, says—says—" She could say no more—the rest stuck in her throat, and we were left to ponder on her unfortunate loss of memory in uttering the admonitory sentiment.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. D. B.—Get dark blue or purple English waterproof cloth, and make by the pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., if you want a cloak; if you prefer a suit, use the Double-breasted Polonaise pattern shown in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI. Merely bind the edges, or else hem flatly, as cloth is done, with a raw edge.

KATHLEEN.—Read answer given in Bazar No. 35, Vol. VI., to "Leontine," and do not have a white bonnet, as they are not worn by brides who know how to dress. The brown velvet bonnet, or else one to match your best suit, and a round hat of dark straw for second best, is what you want. You should be married in your traveling dress, unless you insist on white. In the latter case get muslin, or else Irish poplin.

JULIA H.—Use a vest-polonaise pattern for your black striped grenadine. Silk lining is preferable to any other, but farmer's satin will answer. Any lining in the skirt of the polonaise will spoil it. Put lace for trimming, headed by folds or pleating of grenadine.

BEATRICE.—The bride should wear white gloves with her light wedding dress, and the groom's gloves should correspond. A white, lavender, or black neck-tie for the groom. The bride should be escorted to the table by the bridegroom.

"GRACIE H."—Do not get tarlatan, but fine clear muslin, or else tulle, for your wedding dress. Trim the skirt with gathered flounces, have a round apron-front over-skirt, and an unlined basque, if of muslin; if you get tulle, have the flounces doubled and side-pleated, a draped over-skirt, and a lined basque with a bertha. The sash should be of white watered silk.

L. A. C.—Oxidized silver jewelry will continue in fashion next season. Blue linen would scarcely be heavy enough for a traveling suit in September weather. Get blue camel's-hair serge, or else water-proof.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Trim your striped jockey basque suit with bias silk of solid color, and with flounces made like those in the illustration. A black chip or straw English walking hat, with the turned-up sides faced with velvet and a scarf of soft turquoise or Orient black silk, some flowers behind, and an ostrich tip, is a good hat for traveling and general wear. A black velvet hat or bonnet, or else one of steel-colored silk like the dress, would answer with the other suit. A velvet cloak should be lined with thin silk, wadded, and quilted. It is too early to select a pattern for such a garment.

MRS. K. B.—It is very difficult to wash blue linen well. Instead of having it regularly washed, you can wear it a season by merely moistening with a cloth dipped in starch-water, and pressing immediately with a moderately hot iron. Spots that are very much soiled should be scoured with a nail-brush dipped in white soap-suds.

AN INTERESTED INQUIRER.—To make your bordered percale with a blouse-polonaise will be the most stylish plan; a basque-waist not lined will be more dressy than the pleated waist. The plain blue vest front will scarcely be suitable for so simple a costume. It is safe to make your dress with a Spanish flounce sewed on the skirt about the knee, but do not cut off your skirt and add the flounce. If these flounces are not worn next year, the material is not cut up and can be altered to suit new styles.

NELLIE H.—A German remedy for making a red nose look white is to put on borax every day and let it dry there; also bathe it now and then with camphor.

A WESTERN READER.—You are not too small for lace flounces, and that is the best use you can make of your lace. A loose sacque or mantle, or a polonaise of black dotted or sprigged net, would be very pretty, trimmed with your lace.

MISS P.—Nine or ten yards of silk will make a double-breasted polonaise.

M. N.—Wear white silk or muslin ties, black lace ties, or else green silk ones, with your sage green suit.

EDEN.—Simply bind your long silk walking skirt with braid, and put inside the back breadths a facing of wigging pleating, or else of oiled silk or morocco.

N. L. H.—Dark cloth colors, olive green, olive, brown, plum, and bronze shades, will be worn again, also very dark blue. The bronze shades will be a good choice for you. Get a vest-polonaise of white alpaca, and trim it and your skirt with pale blue silk, piped with black velvet.

S. F. S.—You can obtain the "Ugly Girl" papers by buying the back numbers of the Bazar containing them. There are seventeen papers, costing ten cents each.

MRS. J. W. V.—Read reply above to "N. L. H." for hints about colors. Madame Raymond's letters from Paris published in the Bazar will give you the earliest hints of fall fashions.

MILWAUKEE.—Polonaise is pronounced as if spelled po-lo-naze, with the accent on the last syllable.—You do not need a neck-ribbon around a fraise made of the dress material.

ALUMNA.—A dress of fine Swiss muslin is prettiest for a graduating dress. Put pleated flounces on the skirt, a single flounce on the round apron over-skirt, and have a pleated full blouse-waist. Wear a white watered silk sash, and have a ruff of Valenciennes lace or else of muslin around the neck.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for September is remarkable for the variety of its contents. The description of General Sherman's tour in Europe and the East is resumed, accompanied by several magnificent illustrations of Constantinople. There is a beautifully-illustrated article on the Protestant Cemetery of Florence, where rest the remains of Mrs. Browning and Theodore Parker. Judge CAMPBELL contributes a brief illustrated sketch of two islands of the Hebrides—Colonsay and Oronsay. CHARLES NORDHOFF concludes his description of the Sandwich Islands, with a comprehensive review, profusely illustrated, of the characteristics of the native population and of the resources of the islands, with special reference to the question of annexation. Another illustrated article describes, in the most entertaining fashion, the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

MONCURE D. CONWAY gives some very interesting reminiscences of the late John Stuart Mill. The Rev. W. H. MILBURN, the "Blind Preacher," contributes a narrative of his experiences with oculists, including a very characteristic sketch of the remarkable career of Albrecht von Graefe. R. H. STODDARD tells the story of the twenty years' imprisonment of Leonora Christina in the Blue Tower of Copenhagen; a portrait of the Princess is given, also a view of the Tower. JAMES GRANT WILSON contributes a pleasant account of grouse-hunting in the Yorkshire moors; HAMILTON BUSBEY a spirited review of the trotting turf in America; and EMILIO CASTELAR another of his papers on the Republican Movement in Europe.

The Poetry of the Number is contributed by ALFRED H. LOUIS, WILLIAM C. RICHARDS, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, RICHARD REALF, ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN, and CARL SPENCER.

The Number contains stories by ROSE TERRY, C. P. CRANCH, and CONSTANCE F. WOOLSON; and CHARLES READE'S serial story is continued.

In addition to this rich store of various reading, there are the five Editorial Departments with their inexhaustible resources of information and amusement.

GOOD MEN TO ATTEND AUCTION—Men whose faces are forbidding.

An engine-driver and stoker on the Midland Railway recently called at the shop of a well-known temperance man and Good Templar in Derbyshire, and asked him to show them where Messrs. ——s' spirit vaults were situated. "Yes," replied the Good Templar, "come this way;" and taking them through his shop and house, the back of which faces the parish church-yard, he said, pointing to the graves, "There are the vaults, but the spirits are all gone."

A Roman Catholic bishop of Newfoundland had a piano of which he wished to dispose, and which a friend, a Protestant doctor, desired to purchase. Considerable chaffering ensued before the bargain was consummated, and the doctor finally secured the instrument at a price which the bishop declared ruinously low. The only vehicle in the town which would accommodate the piano when the time came for its delivery was the hearse; and in this it was accordingly driven to the doctor's door. Down came the doctor in high dudgeon.

"Why on earth," he asked, "did you act thus ridiculously, and send my piano home in the hearse?"

The bishop's eyes twinkled as he remembered their hard bargain, and he answered, "Oh, because it was such a dead bargain!"

Precautions against cholera are very numerous at present. Taking all the advice given, we learn that if a man eats nothing, drinks no liquors, drinks no ice-water, drinks no warm water, drinks nothing else, wears flannels, bathes three times a day, keeps his back-yard clean, pays his taxes, avoids water, drinks brandy, eats ripe fruit, wears nothing, does not smoke, and follows such other methods of prevention as his common-sense may dictate, he need have no fears of cholera.

One stormy night last winter a poor weather-beaten gauger, who had stood the pelting of the pitiless storm through the course of a severe winter day, arrived at a small town in the North Highlands, and being benumbed with cold, and almost frozen to the saddle, he made for the only house where he could see light, and called for assistance. Not finding himself attended to, he roared out at the top of his voice, "Will no good Christian come and help me off my horse?"

Awakened by the noise, a sturdy old Celt opened the door and asked if it was "Chisholm's" he wanted.

"No," said the impatient inspector of spigots, "I want some good Christian to help me off my horse."

John Varnum, Jun., is a practical joker. A few Sundays ago, in returning from church, he was conversing with his wife on the subject of the sermon, and remarked that he couldn't believe saint and sinner ever dwelt so near together as the sermon represented. His wife intimated that they could, and instanced the following case: "Haven't you and I dwelt in the same house for several years?"

This was a square hit on John, but he wormed out of it, and closed the case with the following argument: "Yes, to be sure; but did I ever call you a sinner?"

THIS dress is made of plain blue and blue and white dotted foulard. The underlapping front breadths of the skirt are of plain material, trimmed with folds of gros grain of the same color. The back breadths of the skirt, which are arranged in a puff, and the waist, are of dotted foulard. The trimming consists of rolls and bows of gros grain and white lace.

SUCCULENT PLANTS.

FASHION appears to have sway in every department of taste, and even extends to floriculture. At one time bulbous plants are all in vogue; then the fashion changes to massing in color, and zonale geraniums and similar plants are all the rage; anon and planting in ribbons of color is the fashion; that changes to making collections of plants with curious or variegated foliage; and now succulent plants, as they are called, are the fashion of the day.

By the term succulent is meant plants with thick, fleshy foliage, like the well-known houseleek. Many of them are very set and stiff in their appearance; but in the hands of a person of taste and experience in arranging plants many excellent effects can be produced, and groups of much beauty and interest either for out-door or in-door culture can be made.

We do not now propose to write any thing about selections for out-door planting, but to call attention to the suitableness of this class of plants for in-door or house culture. They have the great merit of being able to withstand the dry heat of our dwelling-houses in winter, of not requiring constant and unremitting attention in order to grow them well, freedom from the attacks of insects, and of having a style of beauty quite novel and peculiarly their own. They are well suited for hanging-baskets or rustic plant stands, as they do not require any great depth of soil in which to grow. All that they require is a soil composed of one-half loam and one-half sand, with a liberal allowance of well-rotted manure added. They require to have the pots or baskets in which they are grown well drained, as an excess of moisture is the principal thing that is inimical to their successful cultivation.

As the florists are making collections of them for supplying the demand that is springing up, we make selections of some of the most curious, grotesque, or interesting species for the guidance of such of our readers as may engage in their cultivation, those we name being most readily obtained:

Sempervivum tectorum, the common houseleek. S. ciliatum has the edges of the leaves fringed with hairs. S. tabulaforme has a peculiar habit of growth, spreading out flat and level, like a table. S. arachnoideum looks as though it was covered with a spider's web, as the tips of the leaves are each connected with the other by delicate thread-like filaments. S. soboliferum is called the hen-and-chickens houseleek, because of the many short globular offsets that surround the main plant.

Sedum sieboldii has glaucous green foliage, beautifully variegated with golden yellow. S. sempervivoides has much the appearance of a houseleek. S. acre is the stone-crop of our gardens, and is useful for planting among the other species for the purpose of covering and hiding the soil.

Echeveria secunda glauca has rosettes of leaves of a glaucous hue, and blooms freely; the flowers are orange and scarlet; it is a charming plant. E. californica has the leaves tipped with a dark reddish-brown color. E. metallica is a strong-growing species, with the leaves of a peculiar rosy lilac tint, which change according to the light they are seen by, as changeable silks do. E. metallica glauca is said to be a hybrid between the first-named species and the last, and is said to have the color of the latter with the dwarf close habit of the first.

The Mesembryanthemum, or fig-marigold, family are very numerous—mostly natives of the Cape of Good Hope—and afford a large number of species suitable for our purpose; many of them bear very beautiful flowers of various colors, which, however, only open in the sunshine; other species are curious and grotesque in appearance, having very singular foliage. Of these M. minutum, which only grows about an inch high, M. uvaforme, which looks like a cluster of green berries, M. ficiforme, which looks like a green fig, M. tigrinum, which has the edges of the leaves jagged like a tiger's chap, M. felinum, whose leaves resemble a cat's chap, and M. caninum, whose leaves resemble a dog's chap, are very unique forms. Of those especially desirable for their flowers, and yet of moderate growth, M. deltoides, with pink flowers, M. micans, with scarlet flowers, M. glaucum, with orange flowers, M. grandiflorum, with yellow flowers, M. spectabile, with red flowers, and M. fulgidum, with bright purple flowers, would make a desirable half dozen; but as there are about four hundred species, it is difficult to make a selection. There are but few of them but are desirable plants for house culture. They need but little water in winter, but will need water frequently in summer.

Some of the different species of aloes are very desirable for this purpose, such as A. retusa, the thumb-leaved aloe, so called on account of the peculiar shape of the leaves; A. ciliaris, which has the edges of the leaves fringed with fine hairs; A. margaritifiera, which has the leaves covered with white tubercles, giving them the appearance of being sprinkled with pearls; A. variegata, which has the leaves beautifully striped with white (called the partridge-breast aloe, on account of the character of the variegation); A. arachnoidea, which has the leaves covered with fine threads, like a spider's web; and A. reticulata, which has the leaves prettily netted with glaucous green.

To the above may be added some of the most curious and dwarf-growing of the cactus tribe, especially those of the Mammillaria tribe, such as M. caput medusa, M. senilis, and M. stellaris.

A NEW AND STRONGLY ADHESIVE PASTE.

AN extraordinarily adhesive paste, useful for leather, cloth, or paper, may be made, according to Sieburger, as follows: Four parts of glue are well softened in fifteen parts of cold water, then moderately heated till the solution is accomplished, when sixty-five parts more of boiling water are stirred in. In another vessel thirty parts of starch paste are mixed with twenty parts of cold water to a uniform fluid. Into this the boiling solution of glue is poured, stirring continually, the heat being kept up. After cooling, ten drops of carbolic acid are added, and the paste is preserved in closed bottles to prevent evaporation.

KISSES.

LET thy kisses, I entreat,
Have a language of their own,
When they bring to me, my sweet,
What no other lips have known.

Is it welcome? Bid them bear
From thy heart love's sweetest sign,
That my own thenceforth may wear
Sweeter grace received from thine.

Is it parting? I would fain
Know what language fails to tell;
Kiss me close, and share the pain
With no whisper of farewell.

Always, darling, grant me this,
At love's noontide or eclipse:
Kiss me not, or ever kiss
With thy heart upon thy lips.

THE REFORM IN DRESS.

THERE are always a certain number of agitators who, other things failing, turn their thoughts to the subject of a radical reform in dress to take place in a day—and we suppose there always will be. Satan began the work in Paradise, to be sure, and those who stir in the matter now probably think they are only casting out the devil, whose cloven foot is still so apparent to them in the paniers and puffs and powders of to-day.

Of course there is nobody that claims modern dress to be perfect, or even passable: it is an improvement, in its thick shoes and short skirts and less voluminous draperies, on the antique dress; but the general dissatisfaction with it is marked by the recurring fashions. Every season we shape our new garments after another model, in the vain hope of finding the perfect thing at last; every season we trust we have made one advance toward comfort and propriety and whatever shall be the future standard of dress.

In the dress of the masculine portion of the community it is, however, claimed that something like a standard has been reached. That this consummation, though convenient in the main, is ugly from its high-topped hat to its square-toed shoe does not matter; nor that it hides all shapeliness, and hangs usually as well on two sticks as on its owner; nor that the linen and scarf portion garrote a man before his time. But we do not see that the variations from this standard, allowing it to be one, are any less in number than the variations in feminine costume. In one year, as every body knows, the prescribed coat is a long and priestly garment, in another year it is a cut-away; one season it is long-waisted, another season it can not be too short; sometimes it is a sack, sometimes it is a jockey; and for ceremonious occasions it is a ridiculous garment, always a padded monstrosity of stiffness, with no excuse for its curtailed and abbreviated being. This masculine costume has an inner vestment, too, that varies as the coat does: to-day it is single-breasted, to-morrow it is scooped out, with a generous display of the linen that is plain, ruffled, or embroidered as the fashion orders, and never uncrumpled at the button-holes; it has a neck arrangement, moreover, that varies as the weather does, though without regard to weather, now a scarf, now a tie, now a stock that was named from the pillory. If its trowsers are tights to-day, yesterday they were meal-bags, and to-morrow may be peg-tops; while its hat is no more in fashion a second season than a lady's bonnet is, for at one time it is a bell crown rounding out, and the next time you see it it is a steeple crown slanting in; sometimes it is the regulation silk that a rain-drop spoils, sometimes it is a hundred-dollar Panama straw. So that when all is said, even confessing that the dress affords freedom of motion, that it suspends every thing from the shoulders, that it is healthy and tolerably comfortable, we yet see, by the constant changes it undergoes, that it is either still unsatisfactory, or that men, who are supposed to think little of dress, are as fickle in their love of novelty, as desirous to present a fine appearance in their persons, as are their weaker-minded complements who are supposed to think of nothing but dress.

Of course it is not to be supposed that women are going on revolving in the vicious circle from fold to ruffle, and from ruffle to pleat, and from pleat to fold again, and so forever. By those slow degrees, in which we have advanced from the skins of beasts and bark of trees to the use of the spare covering of the sheep and goat, to the fibres of flax and cotton, palm and pine-apple, to the product of the silk-worm, by just such slow degrees we shall probably proceed to the fitting shape of the material. It is but a few thousand years since an emperor refused his wife a gown of silk, and certainly we must allow a space of time corresponding to that which it has taken to put a silk gown within the reach of almost every woman, before we can expect it to be shaped according to the best need of almost every woman.

Our own opinion in the matter of dress reform is that it is as requisite as any other reform, and more inevitable. But we do not believe that it is ever to be brought about by gatherings, or public speeches, or loud-mouthed iterations of the assertion that the present is something altogether indecent and abominable. In old times it was not those who cried out against the broad phylacteries of the Pharisees that abolished them, but phylactery and Pharisee went down together; and the Bloomer Convention of yesterday brought to pass little but Dr. WALKER. Sumptuary laws are as idle in dress as in morals, as they found in England when King JAMES had to repeal the law of Queen MARY'S reign forbidding all but people of quality from wearing costly stuffs under penalty of imprisonment and fine. A sudden edict will not sweep beauty and the love of pleasing from the face of the earth; and whatever the future styles are to be, if they are to endure they must be summoned by the necessity and not the whim of those that wear them.

As one by one we slowly recognize our requirements for health, decency, comfort, grace, all of which elements are to be consulted, so one by one we shall adopt the things that meet the requirements. But in the mean time we are confident that nobody need approach the world of femineity with a shirt waist in one hand and a plain, short, scant petticoat in the other, and expect to be disembarrassed of the riches. The short petticoat has been welcomed both by health and cleanliness, but feminine instinct must ornament it—for feminine instinct turns toward the beautiful, as every admitted fact in the doctrine of natural selection goes to prove; and as for the shirt waist, baggy at the best, there are other ways of cutting one's cloth exactly as beneficial, and far more attractive, as witness the new redingote, the Alexandra, with its loose Watteau fold in front, which leaves the figure as unconfined as nature would have it, and gives it a Greek line of flowing drapery besides. We can imagine that in some millennial state of society a dress may be ultimately chosen that shall in many respects resemble the present pretty gymnastic dress, with the addition for street or ceremony of a Greek cloak; but who supposes that weariness of a plain tunic will not presently bring about an ornamented one, or that the lower garments will not to-day hide the feet with amply falling folds, and to-morrow leave them in plain view? And is it at all likely that HELEN'S peplum was cut to a dot precisely as LEDA'S was? Nothing could be more beautiful, nothing more womanly, than such robes as those soft falling things, in which RACHEL played her part of Phèdre or Hermione; but as no woman could possibly get over a fence in them, we do not imagine that they will be so fortunate as to make part of the standard dress of the future.

Yet let the design of the dress be what it may, let it be only a Mexican poncho with a hole for the head and a slit for the arms, it is useless to suppose that the wealthy woman will not make hers a means of displaying her wealth, or the young woman of displaying her youth, or the lovely woman her loveliness. It is useless to suppose that it will not be made of every rich and noble fabric; that this will not be diaphanous as the clouds over the dimpled elbow and creamy shoulder of beauty; that that will not be stiff with wrought work and heavy colors to sweep round the feet of the queenly dame. And though there may come a time when there shall be no poor woman, it is too remote for our vision, and we can only see her, then as now, eating of the crumbs that fall from the rich one's table in the shape of the more generous price that she will be receiving for the work she lavishes upon the robe in the spinning, in the weaving, in the cutting and adorning; for the love of adornment, we think, will only die when the love of woman dies. Fair women will make themselves fairer by the fine accessories of their dress; plain women will atone for their deficiencies by the superfluity of their ornament. They desire to please; and we do not see how the matter can be mended until they all become a part of the cherubim, and have souls, and do not have bodies. Nor do we think this love of ornament is to be regretted, when it is kept within bounds. It is the love of the beautiful, and it is refining and elevating to all who use it without abusing it. There are few pleasanter things to see than a beautiful woman beautifully dressed—with hues chosen to bring out the color of the hair, the sparkle of the eye, to relieve the rose of the cheek, the purity of the skin; with shapes chosen to reduce an angle or allow a curve; with every eccentricity of style toned down toward simplicity, but with the sheen of lustrous stuffs and rich colors, with the hoar-frost of lace and the glory of jewels. And since the stoutest opponents of the extravagances of fashion would not hesitate to expend fortunes on the decoration of their houses, on their walls, their floors, their chairs, their consoles, we do not see any consistency or reason in their putting themselves out of harmony with such surroundings, and moving, where painter and carver and architect have done the utmost, the only stiff, ungraceful, and ugly objects in a region of beauty.

MISCONCEPTIONS OF BEAUTY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WHO is it that gives us our views of life? Whence come the conventional opinions? Whose are the eyes that, seeing, see not, and the lips that speak? A notion runs through the world, torn by every bristling projection of solid fact, but essentially unharmed and vital to the last. Is it error or truth, which, crushed to earth, shall rise again? In great things, in recondite matters, the mysteries, the conjectures, the half-discoveries of science, it is not strange that we blunder, make the worse appear the better reason, and mistake shadow for substance. But in minute points, in the trifling occurrences of every day, why should we not be right as well as wrong?

The cheap novelist can not be expected to create for the world another world as does the master of his craft; but why should not the cheap novelist, even the merest little weaver of one-column romances for the weakliest of weekly papers, recognize and signalize the fact that the conquests of the world have not been made by beauty; that it is not power—is only one, and not the strongest, element of power? Yet not only the penny-a-liner, but the sensible and even the devout, close their eyes to the palpable and indisputable fact, and accept the theory that beauty is sovereign and omnipotent; and in consequence they bow down and worship with a misleading and false and fruitless homage.

Equally useless and wrong is it to attempt to impress upon the infant mind the idea that "looks are nothing, behavior is all." No one heartily believes it. Why not acknowledge and applaud the truth that looks may be largely the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace, that the pure heart is symbolized by the spotless robe, the gracious soul by the graceful garb, the delicate taste by the fine texture and the modest tint? It is true that Great Heart may be a man of small stature, the most unbending Integrity may have a stoop in his shoulders, the sweetest Lady Una in the land may be but a swarthy, shrinking girl. But inevitably the lady is shown in her array. Lady Una is dark, but she is comely. Great Heart is only small by measurement. We are given into our own hands to make the most of ourselves, body and soul. Let not the little girls be taught that beauty is irresistible, not because it will make them frivolous, but because it is not true. Let them be taught rather that power alone wins, and that beauty may be powerlessness; while mind, wit, tact, gentleness even, may be power. The charm of the most charming women it would be difficult to name. It is certainly not beauty, for the charming women, although often beautiful, are also often far less so than the indifferent women. The Charmer is, above all things, sincere. She assumes neither ignorance nor learning. She may be the owner of one or the other, but she makes no parade of either, and has great good sense. If circumstance or taste has forbidden her to be well-read, she is not ashamed, but neither is she proud of the fact, nor does envy induce her to put scorn upon those that are, nor does she attempt to conciliate Superiority by infantine artlessness. The Charmer is inwardly exacting, but not outwardly querulous. She renders to every one his due, but loves to receive her own as a grace. She has a superb self-respect, and is seldom wounded save by intentional stabs. She is benevolent and beneficent. She says pleasant words, not from design, but instinct. She is not easily, but she can be thoroughly, offended, and the stars are not more remote than is she from the offender. She does not obtrude her opinion, but, appealed to, she is so faithful, sympathetic, sound, that she helps, be it only by listening, and clouds of doubt and hesitation are dissolved by the sweet shining of her clear eyes. More than this, if my little lady is resorted to in vain, if her advice be not followed, she is not thereby estranged. She is not concerned to establish a reputation for cleverness or beneficence, or any reputation whatever; but when a fellow-mortal comes to her, it is simply that her heart goes out to him at once in succor and good cheer.

The Charmer is not necessarily perfect. She may be impulsive. She may be sometimes even petulant. She is serene or wayward according to temperament. But she is always magnanimous; never petty, never hard, never hateful. She never uses sharp, disagreeable speech, except, possibly, at long intervals, in the service of the oppressed, to rebuff an overweening and obstreporous aggression; and though one should go on describing her to the least lifting of the eyelash, still the charm of the Charmer would escape him, for it lies below and behind all traits, no trait, but the last subtle essence of a refined and cultured nature, of a rare and perfect womanhood.

Teach the little girls to make themselves as pretty as is becoming, with all the puffs and bows and ribbons that may be consistent with peace of mind and unselfishness and untouched honor; but teach them also that this is but a small part not only of what pertains to the conduct of life, but to the attainment of position and worthy influence. The first thing is to be. But Nature has so made men and women that they care also to seem—to seem pleasant and desirable in each other's eyes. Who shall say that this, too, is not a powerful motive to excellence? Let us not scorn it, but use it. No father but rejoices when his son turns from the athletic but somewhat rude sports of his male mates, and begins to seek and to enjoy the gentler gayeties of female society. No mother but is pleased to think her bairn's respected like the lave. In each sex the desire to please, whether its own or the other, is instinctive and blameless. Yet so delicate is it that it can hardly be touched without danger. It can hardly be guided except indirectly. To say to girls—as I have sometimes heard it said—men like this, men dislike that, therefore be thus and so, is coarse and cruel and servile. Yet can the honorable, the high-minded mother, teacher, friend, with dignity and sweetness, guide her girl to a womanhood reserved, commanding, reasonable, however piquant, merry, and arch; guide her to a fitness for companionship with the wisest and the greatest of men, as well as for solace to the weak and erring; guide her into attractiveness and grace and ornament, which are to be attained only by virtue of unconsciousness, uprightness, and unhampered individuality.

One is troubled to see beauty wasted as well as wealth, or time, or mind, or any other gift of God. A lovely little maiden making herself lovelier before the glass to greet and gladden the eyes of all beholders is not a sorry sight, if beneath the visible loveliness lie a tender heart, a mind under control, a strong and active will. But to see a silly little girl rely on her colors and contours, and neglect mental culture, social grace, one might almost say Christian courtesy—this, indeed, is melancholy. Her selfish little heart, her barren little mind, lord it already over her cheap, superficial beauties, and will soon leave nothing behind but a dreary waste. Her little victories are temporary, her little failures lasting. She can never be a power. She can scarcely help becoming a drag. Her companions must be among the commonplace, not to say the vulgar, for she has nothing in common with the lofty and the grand. She would gasp on the heights. She can assimilate nothing beyond the material. There is danger that she will soon be unable to rise above the mean. While there is yet time, let her learn that in both sexes, in all ages and all worlds, to be weak is miserable, and though petty men and petty women may well enough consort, large souls love largely.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL BONNETS.

FALL bonnets, as foreshadowed by imported French models, will show a comfortable improvement on those now worn, inasmuch as they will cover more of the head. The new shapes have low but capacious crowns that fit smoothly over the high coiffure of soft puffs now worn in Paris, clasp the head snugly on the sides, and have broad coronets with a full face trimming beneath. To be well worn they must be neither too far forward, nor, in the other extreme now fashionable, too far backward, but on the top of the head, the place where the bonnet ought to be. The material, usually velvet, is placed smoothly on the frame, and the latest importations even omit the tiny piping folds used for borders. The face trimming under the coronet or inside "scoop" fronts is the conspicuous feature of bonnets, and is also seen under the brims of round hats. The novelty for this face trimming is a band of closely curled ostrich feathers; and as this is introduced by a leading Parisian milliner, it will doubtless be successful. The coronet is plain and high, and stands out from the bonnet instead of resting against the crown. The intermediate space is not, however, left bare, but is filled by a scarf of soft silk, either repped or twilled, twisted around the crown in easy, careless fashion, and a Shah ornament of some kind, either the Shah aigrette of feathers, or a cut steel ornament, or else a rosette of clustered loops of ribbon. Flowers, especially roses, are in order any where on the bonnet, either as a wreath for face trimming, or clustered in front of the crown on the left side as a base for plumes, or else low behind as they are now worn. Two demi-long plumes of shaded ostrich feathers curl over the back of the bonnet. Streamers behind that bend down high ruffs are seldom seen, and thus the bonnet is left compact, and is, besides, picturesque, pretty, and will be generally becoming.

TRIMMINGS.

Bias strips of soft flexible silks are used for trimming velvet bonnets and the fine chips and straws that are shown in black and various dark colors. Gros d'Orleans and gros de Suez, finely repped silks, are more choice selections than the turquoise now used by milliners. Newest of all is the gros d'Orient, twilled like serge, mentioned in a previous paper. These bias silk bands are finished with a French hem on each edge, and are used as scarfs around the crown and as long loops placed erect on the sides. Gros grain ribbons three inches wide are chosen for strings and for rosettes. Double-faced ribbons are largely imported; these are black on one side and a color on the other, or else each side shows different shades of one color, or perhaps the sides contrast, as in the Pompadour colors, having one side pink and the other blue. Very eccentric combinations of colors are found on French bonnets, yet French taste succeeds in making these oddities very pleasing.

FLOWERS.

Of flowers we have already spoken. The quaint Persian greens—olives formerly, but renamed in honor of the Shah—prevail among flowers. There are wreaths of roses with natural red centres and half their outer petals green, vines of green buds, new satin leaves, beautifully shaded, tricolor clusters of rose-buds, many dark bronze brown roses, and, indeed, roses of every hue, both natural and unnatural. There are also many bacchanalian wreaths of grapes, with leaves and tendrils, and strewed among the leaves are the inevitable roses. There are mammoth roses of muslin petals, fresh and natural-looking, while among them is a single velvet petal, black, as if blighted by frost, or else brown and flecked with yellow. The grosaille roses of warm, bright crimson are the favorite choice with Parisian milliners, who place them upon bonnets of deepest blue, black, or myrtle green velvet.

SHADED FEATHERS, ETC.

Shaded ostrich feathers are the most perfect garniture of the winter bonnets. Four or five shades of one color or of two appear in these plumes, and they are curled and twisted most fancifully. Two demi-long plumes, or perhaps three, are preferred for bonnets, while a single long plume sweeps over round hats. Soft willow plumes are again offered, but they are very frail. The high Shah aigrette is shown in white marabout tufts, with heron feathers and a mother-of-pearl ornament. Slender wings of tropical birds are imported for round hats, but the first choice is for a cluster of two or three long cocks' plumes of bronzed green. Aigrettes of game feathers are also shown, and other large round feather tufts, as conspicuous as that on a drum-major's shako. The finest novelties are the exquisitely curled ostrich bands for face trimming or for the brims of round hats, and the long soft plumes of camel's-hair fleece, made either in very dark or very delicate tints. In buying ostrich plumes remember that the real feather has a single quill down the centre: in very fanciful long plumes it is sometimes necessary to add other pieces, but the foundation should have the long quill.

STEEL, JET, AND PEARL.

The cut steel or diamond-steel ornaments are very handsome, and also expensive, a single ornament sometimes costing $6 at the wholesale houses. The steel aigrette for the front will perhaps be the most fashionable ornament of bonnets for young ladies. A very slight beading of cut steel is in excellent taste around the brim of black and other dark velvet hats. The new jet ornaments are exquisitely fine. They are made of tiniest beads sewed on black net in patterns of leaf and flower, or blocks, or Greek squares. There are jet coronets, either very massive-looking or else as light as lace, jet plumes, wings, aigrettes, bands of jet passementerie all beads like embroidery, and beautiful diadems with drooping fringes. Simple hoops, merely large rings of jet or of cut steel, are used amidst loops of silk or ribbon. Slides of jet and steel mingled are shown in square and oval shapes, and there are horseshoes of jet with cut steel nail heads in them. The handsomest buckles and slides are of brown smoked pearl, very large and oval. These are especially admired when associated with black velvet.

NEW COLORS.

Perruche, or parrot-color, a delicate blending of pale yellow with green, is imported in trimming silks, to be used as facings for black and dark green velvets. Seal-skin red, precisely the color of the dark fur-seal, is a rich hue found in velvet bonnets. Slate and granite are the names given to dark blue-gray shades that will be stylishly worn this winter.

DRESS GOODS.

TUFTED CAMEL'S-HAIR, ETC.

A novelty for winter polonaises is called tufted camel's-hair. This has the soft twilled camel's-hair surface, with small clusters of raised loops set about on it in diamond shape half an inch apart. It is already displayed on counters of retail stores, and meets with great favor. It is found in dark brown and gray shades, is double width, and costs $4 75 a yard. Plain camel's-hair of heavier quality than that worn last year, and showing quantities of the loose fleece, costs from $3 50 to $4 75 a yard; this is nearly a yard and a half wide. Camel's-hair serge is merely an imitation of the real fabric, but is a soft, warm, all-wool material of serviceable iron gray shades, excellent for making polonaises and redingotes that must endure hard usage. It comes in double fold, is a yard and a quarter wide, and costs $2 50. Another fabric of similar quality and very good style is a single-width camel's-hair serge showing the heavy, broad diagonal lines that form a feature in fall goods. It may be had in all the dark fashionable shades of blue, gray, brown, and drab. It is three-fourths of a yard wide, and costs $1 10.

CAMEL'S-HAIR CASHMERE.

A new product of the loom called camel's-hair cashmere bears away the palm for softness and fineness, and will probably be the choice of the season for over dresses. This is almost as closely twilled as French cashmere, but has the rough lustreless surface of camel's-hair, with its many loosely woven fleecy ends, and its unctuousness so pleasant to the touch. It represents all the stylish tints of slate-color, dark blue, olive, brown, tea, gray, and myrtle green; it is double fold, and costs $3 25 a yard. An imitation of this fabric is sold for $1 75. Jacquard striped cashmeres showing reversed diagonal lines that form narrow stripes cost $2 a yard. Single-width French cashmeres of admirable quality are 85 cents a yard; these are preferred to double-width goods when bought for a whole suit. Double-width cashmeres sold for over dresses cost from $1 25 to $2 25 a yard; four or five yards are required for a polonaise. Myrtle green cashmere, so dark that the color is almost invisible, finds favor, even at this early day, for polonaises to be worn throughout the fall and winter. Dark blue cashmere is also being sold for this purpose, and merchants anticipate that these colors will rival the iron gray and marron brown over dresses that are now so popular.

SERGE DE BÈGE.

The light sleazy fabric called de bège found such favor for summer traveling suits that manufacturers have made a similar soft material heavy enough for winter use, and, having woven it in stylish "diagonals," have renamed it serge de bège. It is pure wool, not of the finest quality, but in its undressed state, and natural brown and gray shades; it is three-fourths of a yard wide, and costs 75 cents a yard.

ENGLISH DIAGONALS.

Among other standard fabrics are the English serges woven in stylish broad diagonals. These are firm, heavy, and serviceable, and though harsh to the touch, are of pure wool. They are three-fourths of a yard wide, and cost 75 cents a yard in all the dark cloth colors. French serge of similar twill, but softer, is 90 cents. Various lower-priced goods, costing from 40 cents upward, are shown under the general and popular name of "English diagonals." These are usually mixtures of wool and cotton, and though some of them appear well in the piece, they shrink after being dampened, and do not wear well. The best qualities are sold for 60 cents a yard, and, it is said, will take the place of satines, cheap empress cloths, and other goods of the same value. Glossy satines are shown again, but they do not wear satisfactorily, as their lustre is scarcely surface deep, and soon disappears, leaving a thin sleazy fabric: price 50 cents and upward. Empress cloths of admirable quality and stylish colors are 75 cents a yard; coarser empress cloths are 50 cents.

DESIGNS FOR WOOLEN SUITS.

The best designs for making the woolen materials just described will be found in illustrations on page 569 of Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI., and patterns thereof are given in the Supplement. The new polonaise, with low, round collar and lapped front, swinging cords, stylish back drapery, and piped folds, is well represented in one suit; while other figures show the jacket-waist opening over the vest or plastron in the fashion mentioned in Madame Raymond's last letter from Paris.

PERSONAL.

RINALDO RINALDI, the last pupil of CANOVA, has just died. His first statue, a figure of St. ANTHONY, was executed when he was only fourteen, and is now in the church of St. Arcella, near Padua. He came to Rome at twenty, and asked CANOVA to accept him among his pupils. The great master was one day so struck with a group which the young man had just modeled that he exclaimed, "You are a born sculptor! Would to Heaven that you were my son!"

—Admiral POPOFF (suggestive name—pop-off) is the inventor of the most remarkable vessel ever afloat—the circular iron-clad now at Nikolaïef. The ship is perfectly circular, and is driven through the water by six propellers. Of course there is no stem, nor stern, nor beam; and going ahead, astern, or spinning around like a top, she is equally at home, while for buoyancy she is said to be unsurpassed.

—MARETZEK is to pay TAMBERLIK $100,000 to sing eighty-four nights. No family should be without a tenor.

—Mr. SMALLEY, the London correspondent of the Tribune, writes that "Mr. MOTLEY, after quitting London, some six weeks ago, was ordered back to it by his physician, on the pretext that the climate was good for him. One of General SCHENCK's good sayings is that London has an atmosphere, but no climate. The true reason in Mr. MOTLEY's case I suspect to have been his physician's desire to have him under his eye, and constantly within reach of the best attendance. Whether the attack under which he now suffers was foreseen I can not say. He has had a slight paralytic stroke. It occurred as Mr. MOTLEY was taking Lady MARGARET BEAUMONT down to dinner. His right arm suddenly fell powerless by his side, and the side itself was also somewhat affected. He was carried to his hotel in Dover Street, and has not since left his room. The physicians agree in regarding the paralysis as by no means serious, nor likely to disable him for any long time. The truth I believe to be that Mr. MOTLEY's nervous system has suffered partly from overwork and partly from the circumstances of his retirement from the mission to this court. He has never ceased to regard himself as ill treated and insulted, and being a proud and sensitive man, the injury has not been forgotten. His habits of study have been severe. I remember his telling me that he always rose at six, and was at work, and very hard at work, with books and papers during a great part of the day. The manuscript of his last book, The History of John of Barneveldt, was put into Mr. MURRAY's hands only two or three weeks since, and the book will be out this autumn."

—Mr. CUSHING remarked recently to a friend that he believed his late dog suit had given him greater notoriety than any affair in which he had ever been engaged. For weeks past he had been receiving papers from all parts of the country containing marked paragraphs in relation to it, nearly all of them with editorial comments.

—Among the littérateurs who were candidates at the late election for Parliament were Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHENS, an editorial writer for the Pall Mall Gazette; Mr. JENKINS, author of Ginx's Baby, and a writer for the Daily News; Dr. BAXTER LANGLEY, and Mr. CONINGSBY. In the matter of those who have been newspaper and literary men we can do much better than that in our national Congress. In the Senate are CAMERON, SUMNER, BROWNLOW, CASSERLY, and SARGENT. In the last House of Representatives were COX, BROOKS, ROOSEVELT, KINSELLA, and ROBERTS, of New York; ACKER, GETZ, HALDEMAN, and MEYERS, of Pennsylvania; BLAINE, of Maine; HAWLEY, of Connecticut; HAY, of Illinois; PACKARD, of Indiana; WALDEN and PALMER, of Iowa; HAVENS, of Missouri; M'CORMICK, of Arizona; ARMSTRONG, of Dakota; and WADDELL, of North Carolina.

—M. CAPOUL, who is to warble to New Yorkers in opera next autumn, is studying English under the tuition of a young lady, an American, who has figured somewhat prominently in public. Easy way to learn. He is well enough off to own a villa near Toulouse.

—Speaking of CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, who has an elegant summer residence at Newport, a writer says: "The health and vigor of her personal appearance, the sprightliness and magic of her conversation, the deep and cordial sweetness of her smile, her warm and unaffected hand-clasp, unite, as they have for so many years united, to win the stranger and to retain their magnetism over old friends."

—The coming industrial exhibition at Cincinnati will have something novel in the way of decorative art. Messrs. WILLIAM MORRIS & Co., of London (of which firm WILLIAM MORRIS, author of The Earthly Paradise and other beautiful poems, is senior member), propose to send thither specimens of their work, similar to those which adorn some of the finest homes in and around London. With them are associated such artists as BURN JONES, D. G. ROSSETTI, MADOX BROWN, and W. B. SCOTT, the original pre-Raphaelists, who gave RUSKIN his first hope that there might be "something pretty in England." It is stated that the colors of their stained windows are such as can not be made in any of the famous glass-works of Europe, neither in Munich nor Glasgow. It is with some surprise that one finds a gentleman who has gained so much eminence as a poet as WILLIAM MORRIS engaged in making designs for decorations.

—M. THIERS was lately asked his opinion of a bill to prevent the use of insulting language in the Legislative Assembly. He said: "All the precautionary measures which the Chamber seems to take resemble the straw which is laid down before the door of a sick person, and which does not prevent either the carriages from rolling or the patient from dying."

—PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON, whose Intellectual Life is just now among talked-of books, is but thirty-eight years old, a man of some fortune, and who has always associated with the very upper ten.

—Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON's daughter, an accomplished young lady of nineteen, and a fine linguist, has recently deceased. She was her father's secretary. A year ago, hearing her father express a wish to have certain Spanish works translated into English, she learned Spanish, and in six months made the translations.

—Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHENS, one of the editors of the Pall Mall Gazette, was a candidate for Parliament from Dundee, and this was the way in which he addressed the voters: "If you don't want me, don't have me; leave me to return to London to my ordinary business. I stand here before you as a candidate, not to spend money, because I have not got it, and if I had I would not spend it."

—The Earl of Dunraven, now in this country, is understood to be the capitalist and co-proprietor of the London Opéra Comique, in association with Mr. HINGSTON. It is understood to pay his lordship. When formerly in this country himself and wife spent much time at the house of their old friends ALICE and PHŒBE CARY.

—Speaking of names, there died near Zanesville, Ohio, on the 30th of July last, SHERIDAN STONEBURNER, aged seven years. He was one of triplets born to SOLOMON and HANNAH STONEBURNER November 15, 1865. The children were named ULYSSES S. GRANT, WILLIAM T. SHERMAN, and PHILIP H. SHERIDAN. GRANT and SHERMAN, the other two boys, are in fine health, and promise well.

—Sir CHARLES WHEATSTONE has been elected foreign associate of the French Academy of Sciences in place of the late Baron LIEBIG, the highest honor that it is in the power of that body to bestow upon a foreigner. The election was nearly unanimous, he having received forty-three out of forty-five votes. Sir CHARLES has also lately received from the French Society for the Encouragement of National Industry the great medal of Ampère, which is awarded every six years for what is considered the most important application of science to industry. The former recipients of this medal were DEVILLE, who introduced the manufacture of aluminium, DE LESSEPS, the engineer of the Suez Canal, and BOUSSINGAULT, distinguished for his researches in agriculture.

—The regret so generally felt in England and this country at the accidental death of Bishop WILBERFORCE is tempered somewhat by the fact, transpired since his death, that he was suffering from a painful disease, which threatened an early termination of his life. A cancer was forming at the root of his tongue, which could never have been excised, and must sooner or later have proved fatal. It showed the deceased prelate's power of will that, with the knowledge of this fact, he nevertheless maintained his cheerfulness up to the last moment of his life.

—Mr. MOWBRAY MORRIS, for many years manager of the London Times, is seriously ill. In former years the paper owed much to his energy, sagacity, and good sense. Mr. DELANE, who has been editor of the Times for over thirty years, is still in vigorous health.

—EMMA BLACK saved a man's life the other day on the Mississippi in a curious way. He was fishing, and was spilled out of his boat. Being unable to swim, he would have perished had not the maiden, discovering his danger, swam out to him, and throwing into his hands her back hair, four feet in length, towed him back to the land. We believe the narrative.

—The Czarowitz is described as of medium height, very solidly and athletically built, with a martial figure, and the carriage of a haughty and courageous soldier; a countenance oval, full cheeks, full lips, a handsome, round, determined chin, large, stern, dark eyes, and lowering brow. He can not be called strikingly handsome, but he is a young man who would be noticed for his manly bearing and expression any where. His creamy complexion is smooth and soft, and he has the appearance of having lived on the fat of the land. He is evidently of a luxurious as well as active and enterprising temperament, in both respects being thoroughly unlike his imperial papa. In one thing, however, he resembles the Czar, and indeed this is a traditional trait of the ROMANOFF—he wears a habitual expression of haughty melancholy, which seldom melts into a smile, and almost never into hearty laughter. The Emperors PAUL, NICHOLAS, and ALEXANDER II. were all melancholy men, and ALEXANDER I. had a deep underlying sadness under his cheery and bluff exterior. This has been accounted for by the fact that the Czars, from their position, live in constant danger of assassination, and never can know from what source or in what manner the blow may come. Certain it is that the present Czar is timid, and is a victim to hypochondria, which is accounted for by some by his habit of taking too much alcoholic stimulant, and by others as the result of a constant wearing fear of his life. The Czarowitz, on the contrary, is a thoroughly brave man, but has probably got his melancholy by inheritance. Accompanying him is a very fascinating little lady, who can not, with her pleasant, open, cheerful face, but win golden opinions wherever she goes. The Princess DAGMAR of Denmark, or, as she is now called, the Czarevna MARIE-FEODOROVNA, is at twenty-six more girlish than womanly, and seems to have maintained the vivacious temperament of her family despite her rather grim husband. She strikingly resembles her sister, the Princess ALEXANDRA of Wales, though she is now far prettier, and has bright blue instead of soft brown eyes. Her face is one of the most innocent and attractive possible. She does not in the least share her husband's haughtiness of manner, but her roguish eyes look as though she were in constant expectation of a good frolic.

THE MINOR VIRTUES.

IN the whole string of the virtues, major or minor, cardinal or otherwise, there is not one about which the possessors are so abominably conceited as this—early rising. People endowed with so uncomfortable a gift are, no doubt, entitled to some little indemnification; but no degree of self-mortification could justify the preposterous airs of superior virtue which people who turn out of bed earlier than their neighbors always give themselves. Nobody was ever ten minutes in the society of a confirmed early riser without being made aware of the fact, and, directly or indirectly, snubbed for not being one himself. Now is early rising such a virtue, and are these early birds so very virtuous, that we are bound tamely to submit to this? Of course we know all the stock arguments; they impress them upon us often enough. It is they who get the worm. Well, for our part, they are welcome to it; we don't want worms. Then they gain so many hours over us who lie abed, in proof of which they point out that the "Waverley Novels" were all written before breakfast. Very good; let them produce their "Waverley Novels;" meanwhile we shall take leave to remain skeptical as to the reality of this gain of time. The practice is a healthy one, they say, and they always brag of their superior appetites at breakfast, as if there was something meritorious in an extra consumption of ham and eggs. Now the simple fact of the matter is that in at least nine cases out of ten your early riser is merely a fidgety, restless animal, who is incapable of reposing after the fashion or at the season ordained by civilized mankind; and as to his inhaling the pure morning air, that is all moonshine; it is pure self-conceit that he inflates himself with. In fine weather he struts abroad, crowing over a slumbering world; in wet, he moons about the house, a reproach and hinderance to the servants setting about their morning ministrations, and all through the period of family prayers he is filled with pharisaical pride that he is not as other men whom the prayer bell sometimes catcheth at their toilette. That he makes any use of the hours so gained is in general pure fiction. But even if he does, what then? He adds to his day very much after the fashion of the man who tried to lengthen his blanket by sewing on to the top what he cut off from the bottom. He is very brisk, not to say arrogant, in the morning, but he is useless for all social purposes in the evening. Drowsy after dinner, torpid after tea, he hibernates like a bear during the sociable season ushered in by the candles, and is most lifeless when civilized man enjoys life most. But even in that abject condition he finds something to brag of; for, with an insolent yawn, as he takes his bedroom candle, he reminds us that he was up four hours before any of us were stirring.

The cardinal virtues, it may be observed, very often have minor virtues attached to them which play a part something like that of the tender to a man-of-war. The cardinal virtue is too mighty, stately, and imposing an affair to be put in motion on every trifling occasion. It lies at anchor for the most part, reserved for great emergencies, while certain little minor virtues in attendance on it are constantly on the move, keeping up its connection with humanity. Benevolence, for example, can not be always brought into action in the intercourse of every-day life. You are bound to have benevolence ready at the service of your fellow-creatures, but you can not be benevolent to your neighbor at dinner or to the man next you in a railway carriage. Under such circumstances you must be content to allow the work of benevolence to be done by some such little virtue as sociability. Unfortunately, however, the tender in this case is very apt to forget its subordinate position, and give itself all the airs of a first-rate, and then the minor virtue becomes distinctly objectionable. There are few greater social nuisances than the man who plumes himself upon his sociability, and makes a sacred duty of talk. He is a sort of human sparrow, a bird from whom you get neither song nor silence. To keep up a perpetual game of verbal shuttlecock (which he calls conversation) is with him a condition of existence.

Akin to the sociable talker is the "good correspondent," as he calls himself. As the former piques himself upon his readiness to chatter with any one he comes across, and his ability to keep up chatter for any length of time, so the latter prides himself upon a faculty for spinning letters out of nothing for the purpose of laying distant friends under an obligation. Both are firmly convinced that they are most meritorious persons and undeniable benefactors to their species, and both consider you a very defective character if you do not fully reciprocate their attentions. We may be excused, however, if we doubt the validity of their claims. If the chatterer is a sociable being, it is simply because he is afflicted with an incontinence of words and a penury of ideas; and as for the good correspondent, his goodness is chiefly due to the fact that time hangs heavy on his hands, and that he is sorely put to it to find something to do.

This is what makes the minor virtues so aggravating. It is bad enough to be crowed over by any one, but to be crowed over by people whose coign of vantage is the possession of an entirely negative character is what flesh and blood can not help resenting; and it is on these grounds that we hold that society has a right to resist their pretensions. We do not question the virtue itself. We say to them: sociability is very desirable; punctuality, orderly habits, love of cleanliness, all these are excellent things; and there is even a good deal to be said for early rising in moderation. But what we do not admit is your right to give yourselves those airs of superiority which you are so fond of assuming. Be as punctual as you like, get up at any hour you choose, cultivate the art of writing long letters about nothing as much as you please, but don't call upon us to admire you as model characters on the score of these virtues, for we don't!

HOW TO LIVE WELL IN PARIS.

THERE is one piece of advice which all those who sojourn in Paris beyond a few days ought to observe if they want to dine well and be well waited on. It is this. So soon as you have found a restaurant that you like—a house where the cookery suits you, the wine is good, the waiters not too radical, and the prices in accordance with your means—stick to it. Be not fickle or wandering in your attentions to the eating establishments, but having selected your grazing ground, be not tempted, save on rare exceptions, to roam into other meadows, no matter how green may be the grass, or how clear the brook. This is the grand secret of living well in Paris. When you have been some half dozen times to the same house the master of the establishment begins to look upon you as an acquaintance; after a fortnight of breakfasting and dining in the same place you are numbered among his friends; and if you go there regularly for a month he regards you as an habitué, a being that to him is something very little lower than an angel. Once you become wedded to the house, there is no little comfort within its limits that you may not command. The waiter becomes less republican in his manners. The freshest of the morning's fish, the best of the day's meat, the choicest of the cellar's wine, will be recommended to you. Your favorite newspaper will be found by the side of your plate at breakfast; the warmest-placed table will be reserved for you in winter, and the coolest-situated one in summer will be tabooed to others, until, your usual hour being long past, the people of the establishment begin to think you are not coming that day. You will eat partridges when others have to put up with fowl for their roast; will be told when the first quails of the season find their way to the larder, and will have twenty-four hours' notice of the first asparagus being brought from the market. To a Parisian restaurant un habitué de la maison is a sacred being, and one to whose comfort every thing and every body must give way. The longer you frequent the house, the better you will be treated. There was once a French gentleman who for twenty odd years of his life had breakfasted and dined every day at a restaurant in the Rue de Bac—one of the houses burned down in May, 1871, by the amiable patriots of the Commune. After frequenting this restaurant for nearly a quarter of a century the habitué came to grief in money-matters. He wished for the future to eat at a less expensive establishment, and told his host so. But the latter would not hear of his leaving. To lose an habitué, he said, would be a lasting dishonor to his house; and so he insisted upon his customer remaining, eating and drinking of the best in the establishment, and only paying as much for his meals as they would have cost at the cheapest gargote. And this singular arrangement continued for ten years, until the habitué had to leave Paris for another world. When he was buried at Père la Chaise the master of the restaurant made the usual speech over the grave; and to this day he and madame boast that they once had an habitué who for thirty-five years of his life ate and drank at their establishment, and only left them to go to where there was neither dining nor giving of dinners, and where even the chef of a Paris restaurant may repose in peace.

TINTS IN WATER.

SPEAKING of the beautiful tints observed in water, Professor Tyndall says: "The green color is, I think, correctly accounted for in Hours of Exercise in the Alps. In crossing the Atlantic I had frequent opportunities of testing the explanation there given. Looked straight down upon, there are portions of the ocean to which we should hardly ascribe a trace of blue: at the most a hint of indigo reaches the eye. The water, indeed, is practically black, and this is an indication both of its depth and its freedom from mechanically suspended matter. In small thicknesses water is sensibly transparent to all kinds of light; but as the thickness increases the rays of low refrangibility are first absorbed, and after them the other rays. Where, therefore, the water is very deep and very pure, all the colors are absorbed, and such water ought to appear black, as no light is sent from its interior to the eye. The approximation of the Atlantic Ocean to this condition is an indication of its extreme purity. Throw a white pebble into such water; as it sinks it becomes greener and greener, and before it disappears it reaches a vivid blue-green. Break such a pebble into fragments, each of these will behave like the unbroken mass; grind the pebble to powder, every particle will yield its modicum of green; and if the particles be so fine as to remain suspended in the water, the scattered light will be a uniform green. Hence the greenness of shoal water. You go to bed with the black Atlantic around you; you rise in the morning, and find it a vivid green; and you correctly infer that you are crossing the Banks of Newfoundland. Such water is found charged with fine matter in a state of mechanical suspension. The light from the bottom may sometimes come into play, but it is not necessary. A storm can render the water muddy by rendering the particles too numerous and gross."

THE GYPSY'S LOVE.

By KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

Nay, pale trifler, I have you fast!
So! there was guile in that glance of the dove's?
Lukewarm blood! will you learn at last
What is the way the Gypsy loves?

One hand to hold you, in spite of you,
As soft—and as fast—as your silken glove;
And the other to stab my rival through!
That is the way of the Gypsy's love!

A passion as hot for either part
As the hell below or the heavens above;
A kiss for your lips, or a knife for your heart!
Now do you know it, the Gypsy's love?

L. H.: THE STORY OF A RING.

PRELUDE.

"September 13, 18—.

"MY DEAR NELLY,—Such a strange thing has happened to me. You know I have always been waiting for a romance, and at last I believe I have found it.

"Frank and Isabelle are spending these last summer days in a tumble-down little cottage far away in the woods. Our household is reduced to the smallest possible size. Indeed, I tell Isabelle that I am asked here as a cook—an idea which she scorns, and at once asks me to peel the potatoes.

"I feel like the Pilgrim Fathers, or Juan Fernandez, or somebody of that sort; for not a house is in sight, and we are in a wilderness of forest. The sea is two miles away, and last week we spent a day on the shore. It is down on the maps as 'Ipsequoi Shoals,' and I suppose it is because of the shoals that the place is so desolate, and nobody but the Ipsequoi Indians and a stray woodman or two ever lived here. They are all gone now.

"I never saw any thing so grand as the rocks, with the surf pouring over them. I climbed about and amused myself like a child, digging in the sand, making wells and fortresses for the sea to wash away, and in the midst of this play my eyes were attracted by something shining very brightly.

"It was a ring!

"I felt almost afraid at first, and thought to see the genius arise with smoke and a hoarse voice, saying, 'I am the slave of the ring, and I serve those who wear it.' But he didn't appear, so I examined the ring. It bears my own initials, 'L. H.' cut in a deep blue sapphire, and set in heavy gold. Within the circle of the gold I can just distinguish a date, '1620.'

"Frank, of course, could give no explanation, and only promised to advertise the discovery. 'And if we can find no owner, Lou, keep the ring for seven years, and then return it to Neptune.' So he advises me. The fact of my initials being cut in the stone does not affect him. Men are so prosaic. I am all excitement, and can not but wonder and speculate about it. Who was the other 'L. H.?' and the mystery of all, how did it come to this lonely shore? I am forever thinking of Sir Patrick Spurs, with the Scotch lords at his feet.

"Good-by now. We shall strike our tent here in another week, and be in Beacon Street by the 25th. Always your loving

"LOUISE HARLEY."

I.

Who would now recognize Ipsequoi Shoals? No longer the melancholy wilderness of barren rock and sand, but a magnificent watering-place called "Ocean Town."

Somebody, with a business eye for beauty, saw the wonderful natural resources of this waste, and at once conceived the bold idea of building a hotel that should outrival all other hotels, and should monopolize the pleasure-seeking populace.

Among the crowd of summer guests at the "Pavilion" were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Newman, with their two little girls and a cousin, Miss Harley. She was fair and lovely. Her face full, with a delicate chin, and great round hazel eyes that had a sort of trusting surprise and a twinkle of fun in them. She was possessed of a most gentle, affectionate nature. She was neither cold nor unsympathetic; but she had never fallen in love, nor had any lover excited in her heart the least throb of answering admiration.

"Oh, Lou," said Mrs. Newman, "I can't understand it of you. You are so nice, and yet I think you will never marry. Of course I never really loved any body but Frank; but before I was engaged I had imagined myself desperately in love at least three times. I have never heard you say that you even admired any body."

"Nonsense; yes, you have, Belle. I am sure I admired that Mr. Magraggett intensely. Don't you remember how he brought me all the trout he caught that summer at Conway, and how you always ate them? Of course I admired him; but it is perfectly true that I have never admired any one enough to marry him, even though he should offer me every thing he could catch in the world."

"Of course I like to think that you will always be with us, but still I do wish sometimes—"

Lou burst out laughing at the doleful expression of her cousin's face.

"I am twenty-six, and I do not feel as romantic as I did at nineteen. I am very happy now as an old maid; and when I become too decrepit to be longer an ornament to society, then Bessie will take care of me. Won't you, Bess, take care of Lou when she is old?"

Louise caught up the little white rolly-poly girl, who was tumbling about the floor with a Spitz dog as round and white as herself, and made her say "yes" very solemnly.

Miss Harley was the chosen companion of half the children who knew her. She had a remarkable attraction for boys of the hobbledehoy development, who are always in somebody's way, who play ball and shout when they shouldn't, who have dirty hands and muddy boots, who fall out of trees and off docks, who are forever being repressed, but never depressed. I have seen Louise climbing over the rocks with a troupe of these fellows following, talking to them, keeping them out of mischief by the hour. She would come home with her hands full of sea-weeds and queer shells and pebbles, interested and excited as though her afternoon had been spent in the most charming society.

One day it had been raining, showers alternating with sea-fog, and the little people in the house were becoming unmanageable, having nothing to do, poor things. In truth, every body felt gray and despondent, for thick fogs are dampening to the spirits as well as to the salt.

Finally came Lou Harley, like an angel of mercy, and gathered some of the most noisy and fretful children to a corner of the long hall near the staircase. She sat down on a low seat, while her little audience ranged itself near, and she told them a wonderful story of giants and fairies, caps of darkness and purses of plenty. The children were open-mouthed with interest as her clear voice went on with the romance.

"And just then," she said, "there was a loud strain of music, and suddenly the fairy prince appeared, all dressed in gold and scarlet."

The three little girls who were sitting on the second step of the stairs had to jump up to let somebody pass. As the stranger followed the servant to his room, he half turned and looked for a moment at the group in the hall below.

Two hours afterward Mrs. Newman and Louise were standing together by one of the great windows that look toward the sea. The rain was over, and the rays of the setting sun were dividing the mist into fantastic shapes, and tingeing the waves as the fog rose and cleared away.

"We have been so surprised," Mrs. Newman said. "Last week we heard that Uncle Scott's partner had come from London, and behold Lawrence Osborne arrived here to-day with letters and messages from all our English cousins. I saw him in London years ago, but should not recognize him now. Frank is delighted with him. Oh, where is Frank, and why don't he come?" and at that moment Mr. Newman appeared, with "Mr. Osborne, of London."

Lawrence Osborne was a man of perhaps thirty-five years. He was tall, with high, square shoulders. His hair was black, and his eyes were blue. His features were finely cut, and almost Grecian in their perfection, except that the face was a trifle too short. He wore no beard, so that a noble chin, and a mouth whose smile made you smile in return, were not hidden.

Most of Miss Harley's days were spent out on the shore; sometimes alone, more often accompanied by three or four of her very youthful admirers, who were always making heavy but valueless collections of stones and mosses for her acceptance. She used to give them lectures out there on the rocks, with illustrations from nature; and one day as she was bending over a pool that the retreating tide had left in one of the great boulders, and explaining something to the boys, a shadow fell before her, and Mr. Osborne's voice asked,

"May I be a 'boy again,' and listen to Miss Harley?"

For a moment she blushed, and lifting her head, pushed back the soft brown hair with her wet hands. Then she laughed, and said, very sweetly,

"Oh yes, if you like. I am only telling them about sea-anemones. There are so many among these rocks. But you must be very quiet, and not interrupt," she added, smiling; and in a moment was talking as easily as before.

"Are not those nice boys?" asked Miss Harley, as they hastened up the cliff after her little audience, who had scattered at the sound of the dinner-bell.

"They are always interesting, I think, and especially American boys. They have such active minds; and the constant intercourse they are allowed with older people gives great chance for development. English boys are so shut away from their parents, and when they leave the nursery are so often sent from home, that, until they cease to be children, one can scarcely know them. Afterward— But you know I am an Englishman, Miss Harley; perhaps I should not speak."

"But you have paid a compliment to American boys," she answered, laughing, "and you can not take it back again."

II.

As the summer days went on, Mrs. Newman watched with interest the friendship between their English friend and Miss Harley. Isabelle felt sure that she could read more than mere admiration in Osborne's quiet attentions; but Louise completely baffled her; for she treated him with a dignified cordiality that was too kind, Mrs. Newman thought, to mean other than indifference, but that still seemed to give Osborne hope.

"Lou, bring your sketching-block, and come," cried Isabelle, one morning, putting her head, bright with its red-plumed hat, in at Miss Harley's door. "Frank and I are going away off on the beach, and there is an old tree I want you to do for me."

Frank and his wife were like children, skipping over the rocks, hand in hand, and singing together snatches of all the tunes in the world. Louise followed, laughing at them and their antics; while Mr. Osborne and Bertie Wingate—a lad who had begged to accompany Miss Harley—made short excursions on side paths, bringing back spoils of deserted birds' nests and queer lichens.

"There!" exclaimed Isabelle, stopping short in the midst of a wonderful roulade she was trying to execute; "there's my tree, Lou."

"Beware the pine-tree's withered branch," said Frank, with dramatic voice. "Ah, but that is fine, Belle."

From the point where they were standing the ground rose and formed a sort of promontory jutting out to a reef in the sea. The entire base was of red sandstone, broken and worn into rugged shape; and above, ghostly and desolate, was a great pine-tree, still defiant, standing there to fight against the storms of that wild coast.

"Poor, deserted, proud old tree. It has such a lonely, tragic look, holding out its weird gray arms to invite the wind to battle. I must find a better position than this—out on the rocks, perhaps. Oh, Belle, I hope I can get a good sketch of it."

"Miss Harley," called Osborne's voice, "here's just the place for you. 'Come where glory waits thee,'" he sang.

Then they saw the Englishman standing on a great round stone that he had mounted. All the afternoon he had carried Mrs. Newman's scarlet shawl over his shoulder, as a Highlander wears his plaid. Now he unfolded it, holding one end in his hand, while the wind blew the heavy folds about his feet. Behind him the sun was sparkling on the waves like gold dollars tumbling and bobbing about.

"Oh, Miss Harley!" cried Bertie Wingate, "he makes me think of the fairy prince you told us about, dressed in scarlet and gold. Don't you remember?"

Mr. Osborne spread the scarlet mantle on the stones—for a throne, he said—and Louise was comfortably installed with her drawing things, Bertie being perched on a high rock above to criticise her work, while Lawrence took up his station near at hand. He was half reclining in the shadow of a great boulder, and lazily watching a ship that rocked on the ocean. Sometimes his eyes turned for a moment toward Lou's eager face; but she was either bending over her drawing, or looking intently at the tree. She had forgotten all about his presence, so engrossed was she with her drawing; and for a long time they were both still, when suddenly on the wind from a distance came the Newmans' voices, singing the "Non ti scordar di mi," and she saw her cousins a long way off, apparently standing in the ocean. For a moment a thrill of apprehension passed over her.

"Mr. Osborne!" she called.

"Here I am," he answered, quietly.

She started, not thinking him so near.

"Do you see what has become of my crazy cousins? I am afraid the tide has overtaken them, and they can not get back. Are they safe?"

"Perfectly safe. I have been watching them. They have almost reached the end of the reef, and the tide is going out, Miss Harley." He looked up with a smile, and she began to laugh at her ridiculous fear.

"I had not been thinking of them, and certainly never imagined them walking about on the waves."

"How do you succeed with the picture?"

"Oh, pretty well. It is not finished yet, though." And then she saw a pencil in his hand. "Have you made a sketch too?"

"Yes; after a fashion, that is. Will you let me show it to you?"

"May I see it? But that is only fair, for you may see mine in return."

"It is only a fancy that I have had for some time, though I have never tried till now to express it. Its sole merit is the thought that prompted it. Will you promise to look at it carefully but not critically?" he asked.

"Yes, certainly," she said; "I will look at it with eyes closed to its faults by special request." Then as she looked at him, smiling, she saw on his face an almost solemn expression that forbade her merriment. He put something on her drawing-case, and turned, jumping over the rocks, away toward the Newmans.

"Bertie!" he called, "come here."

"That's not a picture," said Bertie, as he ran after his friend.

"What nonsense!" soliloquized Miss Harley, glancing at the paper. "I thought he had been drawing. I had no idea that he was a poet. Does he ever sketch, I wonder?"

Then she read these lines, written roughly in pencil:

"As one who in his prayers adores
Some sculptured saint in pious niche
(The while through painted windows pours
The sun in radiance rich,
And casts on all within those walls
A holy color pure and free)
Upon his knees devoutly falls,
In deep humility,
So I, when gazing on thy face,
Dare not in thought aspire to thee,
But only hope thy saintly grace
May sometimes rest on me."

She folded it up and put it in the pocket of her drawing-book, then finished the tree.

In a moment they all came back to where Louise was sitting. Frank and Isabelle praised her work, but Lawrence staid at a little distance and said nothing, till Belle, wondering, asked, "May not Mr. Osborne see the sketch?"

"Certainly," said Miss Harley, handing the book to her cousin, as she rose and gathered up the red shawl.

Mr. Osborne just glanced at it, and said, "Ah, yes; very nice indeed," with the most inscrutable face. He walked by Mrs. Newman's side all the way back to the hotel. He saw Miss Harley only for a few moments afterward, as they were standing in a little crowd of people on the piazza. Early the next morning he was off with a yachting party, bound for a week's cruise along the coast; and poor Belle, who was certain that something had happened to change the even tenor of their ways, could only wait for the dénouement of the romance till the hero should return, and the principal actors be again upon the scene.

Louise Harley was rather glad than otherwise at Osborne's absence. She was obliged to own to herself that things were not with her as they had been before that day on the rocks. It was not the rhyming verses that had worked the difference, but she had been startled from her pleasant dream of friendship. "It's not very good poetry, and is a little mixed as to the sunlight and the young man's knees, but there is a pretty sentiment in it. I think Belle would like to see it."

She took the sheet of paper and tore it half across, and then as suddenly threw it into her desk and turned the key, as Mrs. Newman entered the room.

"It is all arranged, Lou dear. For the grand finale we are going to the old place in the woods, and to that beach where you found the ring. Do you remember? I wish that Lawrence Osborne may get back in time; it will not be half so nice without him. Do not you think he is very interesting?"

Belle was so frightened at her own temerity in thus trying to probe her cousin's feelings that she scarcely heard Lou's quiet "Yes, I like him extremely, except that I think he is rather—rather—" And then Miss Harley blushed a rosy red as she glanced toward her writing-desk.

"Lou, truly tell me, do you think you could like him—very much, I mean? Oh, my dear, I think he is lovely; and you know I love you better than any body, except Frank and the children; and if you—"

Miss Harley just laid her hands on Mrs. Newman's shoulders.

"Isabelle," she said, very solemnly, so solemnly that the quick tears came to her cousin's eyes—for Belle always cried when she was excited—"Isabelle, I declare I have never liked any one in that way. Don't bother me again. I was not meant to be the 'dearest partner of any body's joys and woes,' as Becky Sharp called poor Rawdon."

Late that evening Miss Harley was standing by one of the pillars of the great piazza. From the ball-room within came sounds of music and dancing. At the other end of the porch two figures were walking—a girl wrapped all in a soft gauzy mantle, with her lover beside her. Louise was alone, and the moonlight shone full upon her white dress, and lay in a bright pathway across the lawn, out over the sea. She was dreaming; and singing softly, under her breath, she stretched her arms out toward the soft south wind that blew over the water. The music from within clashed loud; then some one stood beside her, and turning, she saw Lawrence Osborne. She had thought him at sea with the yachts, and as he came quietly to her side she gave a little cry; she had been staring at the moonlight till her eyes were dazzled, and he looked unreal in the white, still radiance.

"I thought you were dead. I thought I saw your ghost." Then she blushed, and held out her hand to greet him. "I am very glad you have come home," she said.

"I have come home," he repeated, gently; and then, looking at her, he turned his back to the moon, and his handsome face became dark in the shadow.

"Do you indeed think it is possible for us to know by supernatural means of a friend's departure from this life?"

"I can imagine it. Ah, yes, it must be true. I should know if—" Then she stopped, thinking of his ghost the moment before.

"That knowledge could be only between very dear friends. I too can believe it where there has been a perfect love."

"Look!" whispered Louise; and then silence fell upon them, as out of the night a white-sailed ship glided across the track of the moon, mystical and still and dazzling bright for a moment, fading away and departing as she entered the darkness again.

A clock somewhere struck twelve, and the dancers came out to look at the beauty of the night. Miss Harley moved toward the door.

"Surely neither of us is Cinderella. Let me tell you how glad I am of the storm that overtook us in the yacht, and brought me home in time for to-morrow's ride. That ill wind blew me good fortune. When shall the horses be here, Miss Harley? You will let me be your cavalier?"

"A preux chevalier," she answered, laughing. "I think every body is to be off by twelve o'clock; let us say a quarter before. That will give me time to keep the horses waiting. I hope we shall have bright weather. Good-night!"

III.

A glorious day—the air fresh and crisp, the sea a sparkling blue.

"Just the day we prayed for, Miss Harley!" said Osborne, as he lifted her into the saddle at precisely five minutes before twelve.

Frank and Isabelle were mounted and riding about, marshaling the forces, and making ready for the start.

They rode all the afternoon through a land of forest, with here and there a track of charred and blackened trunks, where fire had passed the year before.

Late in the day they reached the desolate shore where they were to halt for a little time. The woods came down almost to the sand, and the girls, with their long gowns kilted up like Leezy Lindsay's in the song, went wandering about, adorning themselves with bright leaves and berries.

"What a melancholy place!" cried Charlotte Miller. "Were any of you ever here before to-day really?"

"I know this part of the coast only too well, Miss Miller," said Osborne. "I was here just seven years ago, and met with a rather unkind fortune too."

"An adventure! What was it? How delightful!"

"No, not very delightful, but tragic, on the contrary. I lost just here a curious and valuable ring. There was a romantic story connected with it that you might like to hear."

Louise Harley was on the grass, leaning against a fallen tree trunk. She had taken off her hat, with its long feather, and thrown it and her riding-gloves on the ground beside her. As she heard Mr. Osborne's words, the quick color came into her face.

Frank and Isabelle exchanged smiling glances, tempered by a frown on his wife's part that told Mr. Newman he must be silent on the ring question.

"Oh, tell us the romance, pray, Mr. Osborne, while we are waiting here," cried Charlotte, in a youthful and impetuous manner.

"With pleasure, if Mrs. Newman allows me to do it."

Isabelle nodded her approval, and he began the little history.

"Long ago, in the days of the Puritans, one of my great-grandfathers lived, and was called Lawrence Haresdale. A Cavalier, a man of rank and political consequence, he had fallen in love with the daughter of a psalm-singing Puritan blacksmith. At this time the universal opprobrium lavished upon the sect was so terrible as to make it almost dangerous for my grandfather to take off his hat to Love Hapgood when he passed her in the street, and, of course, under such circumstances, there could be no betrothal between them. But still the story says that, on her twentieth birthday, he declared to her his love and gave her a ring, which she swore to keep till the day of her death. When the Mayflower set sail from Southampton, in 1620, as you all know, Love Hapgood stood upon the deck beside her father, the blacksmith—two devotees, whose way was only lit by faith, seeking the unknown land of freedom. And as the little vessel sailed away, she, standing in the high clumsy stern, held her hand out toward the shore, and the ring sparkled and flashed so that a Cavalier who had come down to the shore, hoping at the last moment to turn the purpose of the girl he loved, saw the white hand stretched toward him in farewell, and the token that he had placed upon her finger. And then gradually her form grew dim in the fading light, and Lawrence turned back toward London, a sad and lonely man. He never saw her again; but after many years, when the American colonists had gained a sure home in the new country, and Haresdale was an old man, married to the Lady Sarah Edgarton, then the ring came to him again, and he knew that his first love was dead, and that she had never forgotten him. She had married, too, and had been an industrious, sad woman, severe and hard: yet think of the romance and sorrow which she had known, and of which that ring was always a sign! It was a sapphire, cut with the initials of the two lovers, L. H., and the date marked within the circle. It has been regarded as a sort of talisman in our family since then, and has been handed down from father to son until my time, when it came to me as my grandfather's heir."

Mr. Osborne finished the story, and Miss Harley rose quietly and walked away into the woods. That morning she had put on the sapphire ring, with a romantic fancy that she would wear it once more in the place where it had first come to her. She knew now that the jewel belonged to Lawrence Haresdale Osborne, and only one thought had possession of her mind—the ring must be given to its rightful owner.

Louise was wandering among the trees, treading the dry, brown leaves beneath her feet with a pleasant, crackling sound as she went. Then a footstep followed, and Lawrence Osborne's voice said,

"I am glad to see you are not fatigued after the long ride."

"No, I am not tired, and if I were, this walking is so pleasant. Mr. Osborne—" She stopped short. The ring on her finger seemed to burn; she must give it to him at once, without a moment's indecision. He waited for her to speak.

"I have your ring."

"My ring! I do not understand."

"The old seal. I found it seven years ago." She spoke excitedly, and pulled off her riding-gloves. "See! it is yours," she cried. Her hands were trembling, and the ring did not come off easily.

Lawrence was looking at her with his steady eyes. Suddenly he took her hands in his and held them tight.

"Do you think I want it?" he asked. "Oh, Louise, will you not wear my ring?—for I love you."

"It is yours," she said again.

"Not in that way. Not unless you too are mine. It is a sign to you. My beloved, all my heart is yours!"

It was growing dark, the picnic tea was over, and every body, tired out with the day's search after happiness, was glad to turn homeward.

"Where is Lou Harley?" called Isabelle.

"Here," answered a voice. She was already mounted, and waiting at a little distance. Beside her horse stood a riderless steed, whose bridle rein she also held.

Lawrence came to Isabelle's side. "Mrs. Newman," he said, "I have found my ring."

She held out her hands to him. "Have you nothing else to tell me?"

"Ask Louise," he answered, smiling. "But she surely can not mind my telling you how happy I am."

"So am I. Bless you both!"

Then he mounted his horse, and Louise and he rode home through the quiet evening.

"Lawrence, I never thought to marry an Englishman."

"Nor I an American; but we couldn't help ourselves; it was preordained," he said, laughing.

"Don't laugh, for do you know there is something solemn about it all? You said that our ring first belonged to Love Hapgood. Lawrence, she was afterward Love Harley, and she was the first of our family here. Do you see how strange it is?"

He looked at her, and saw how full of feeling her sweet face had become.

"My darling," he said, "please Heaven, nothing shall part thee and me."

THE MYTH OF ROBIN HOOD.

WE doubt whether ordinary readers have seriously thought of the contradictions involved in the ordinary stories respecting Robin Hood. Let us state a few. First, as to the time in which he lived. He is placed in three successive centuries. According to the common theory, which considers him a Saxon outlaw, he lived at the time of the Conquest. "About this time (1189–99), as I conjectured," writes Mair, a Scottish historian, "the notorious robbers, Robert Hood, of England, and Little John, lurked in the woods, spoiling the goods only of rich men." This account is repeated by Stow and Holinshed. Charles Knight and others regard the hero as one of the adherents of Simon de Montfort. Fordun is quoted as an authority. His Scotochronicon was written between 1377 and 1384, and received large interpolations from his pupil, Boner, Abbot of Columba. The account of Robin Hood is one of these interpolations. It reads: "At this time (1266), from the number of those who had been deprived of their estates, arose the celebrated bandit, Robert Hood (with Little John and their accomplices), whose achievements the foolish vulgar delight to celebrate in comedies and tragedies, while the ballads upon his adventures sung by the jesters and minstrels are preferred to all others." The Rev. John Hunter carries the hero into the following century. In 1322 Edward III. suppressed an insurrection in Yorkshire, and he conjectures that Robin Hood was one of the rebellious band who took to the woods of Sherwood and Barnsdale. An old black-letter legend represents Robin as pardoned by the king and taken to court. In certain Exchequer accounts for 1324–25 Robert Hood is spoken of as one of the "porters of the chambers." The Robin Hood of the ballads is buried at Brickless, in Scotland, and Kirklees, in Yorkshire: Little John dies in Dublin, at Hathensaye, in Derbyshire, and at Pelte, in Murranland, where Hector Boece, a Scottish chronicler, professes to have seen his bones. Neither of the three accounts we have mentioned is attested by good authorities. The Saxon chronicle makes no mention of Robin Hood. The ballads about the De Montfort rebellion do not refer to him, but lament that the times are sad; and one written shortly after Evesham runs,

> "No good, I ween, of late is seen
> By earl or baron done;
> Nor knight nor squire to fame aspire,
> Or dare disgrace to shun."

This plaint would have been impossible had Boner been correct. Further, a local historian who wrote during Edward the Third's time in Leicester Abbey—Henry of Knighton—has not a word respecting Mr. Hunter's hero.

The conclusion is forced upon us that all the supposed facts in the chronicles where Robin is mentioned were derived from the ballads. This fact seems incontestable, and Boner gives us a hint of the process of manufacture—first ballads, then "gestes," and then history. Nearly every wood in earlier times had its outlawed hero, and it was easy to clothe them with romantic qualities. Even France had its Robin de Bois, a child's bugbear.

However, to the ballads. Robin Hood, William Cloudesly, Adam Bell, and Clym of the Clough all belong to the same cycle. The famous shot attributed to the second is also attributed to Woden, and the key is a strange one. We use it, and it opens a new land. Woden, the Teutonic god, was the symbol of spring and victory. Now all the Robin Hood ballads mostly begin with a description of spring, or the month of May, and in the oldest celebrations of May-day—such as that of Helston, in Cornwall, which has puzzled the antiquaries—Robin Hood is introduced, and the "Hal-and-tow" party, as they dance through the main street and in and out of gentlemen's houses, sing a ditty about Robin Hood and Little John. The connection between May and the forest hero is thus doubly established—by the ballads and by popular celebrations. In some of the May pageants a horse and man are introduced, the rider carrying a bow and arrow. This is common in Germany, and the rider is always called Rupert, or Robert. The ceremony of the horse is known as a hovdening, the horse being the hovden. In Kent hovden is pronounced wovden. Now, in old mythology the sun is frequently spoken of as a horse, especially the rising sun, and one of the Vedic hymns addresses it wholly under this image.

We have thus in the legend of Robin Hood a pretty myth. The May games were common in pagan times. Woden was the horse, the sun god, the victor of winter, swift and strong, and the sheath of arrows represented his fierce, far-darting beams. The man who mimicked him was called Robert, in common parlance. The transformation of Woden into wovden, and wovden into wood, was not difficult, and thus the way was open for connecting the name with any hero whose existence would be acceptable to popular feeling. Spring conquered winter, and why should not Robin Hood hold out against William, the Saxon against the Norman, the forester against the soldier? But most likely there were Robin Hood ballads of a much more simple and antiquated form than those now preserved, and linking Saxon to Teuton, paganism to Christianity, and a realm of dim fiction to one of hard reality and cruel strife.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"OLD PROBABILITIES"—as our Signal Service is irreverently personified, in common parlance—is an individual of growing importance. His opinion is sought by old and young before engaging in the duties of each day, as well as upon special occasions. He kindly tells us whether to take an umbrella or an overcoat as we are about to leave home for any little trip. Generally we follow his advice, and find it good. Sometimes he makes a mistake—who, indeed, does not?—and then how people abuse him and laugh at him and accuse him of ignorance! Does any body learn every thing in a minute? Why not give him a little time? For though we call him "Old," "Probabilities" is very young. We do not now recall the exact date, but only a short time ago he made his public appearance as a daily contributor to numerous newspapers. He is never humorous or poetical, his contributions being purely didactic, and his style laconic. Sometimes "Old Probabilities" appears to be quite uncertain himself what meteorologic changes are to be apprehended; but this does not disconcert him in the least, as he then expresses his views in such terms as "partly clear or cloudy weather," "possibly local rains," "variable winds," etc., which are sure to be moderately correct in any event. Rarely, however, he makes any great error, though he seemed to have "missed a figure" somewhere in his reckoning about the middle of August, when he predicted for this section of country one day "cloudy weather, with occasional light local rain," and there came forthwith the heaviest storm of the season. For some days thereafter "Old Probabilities" kept saying "clearing and clear weather," but it did not come in these parts; it rained every day or every night, and when it was not rainy it was murky. So finally he settled down upon "threatening weather," which turned out "just so." In process of time we apprehend that our valued friend will give to the public such exact and extended details as to forth-coming weather that people can make their plans for voyages and travels, for business and pleasure, a week or two in advance, relying upon the infallibility of "Old Probabilities" in deciding various details.

At a recent meeting of the students of the Anderson School on Penikese Island, held in view of the fact that many were about to leave the school to return to their ordinary duties, a committee was appointed to draft a series of resolutions. These resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, recognized most gratefully the services of Professor and Mrs. Agassiz, and the instruction and assistance received from other professors, and from gentlemen who furnished instruments to be used in study. It is noticeable that the committee consisted of two gentlemen students and three ladies.

The heavy rain-storms in this section of country have thoroughly cleansed the streets of the large cities, and thus have proved a valuable sanitary agent.

Whatever causes may have produced the fire by which the ill-fated Wawasset was destroyed, and whether those in charge of her were in fault for the conflagration or not, it is clear that the unusual loss of life is directly due to the overcrowded condition of the boat. She was licensed to carry a limited number of passengers, but this number was far exceeded on the day of the calamity; hence every element of alarm and peril was heightened, and all the ordinary means of rescue were rendered inadequate. There can be no excuse for the master of a steamboat taking on board a greater number of passengers than the law allows. It is necessarily a willful offense, committed merely for the sake of gain. The most stringent penalties of the law should be rigidly enforced in all cases of overcrowding, whether disaster results or not.

Saratoga is to have another large hotel, to be erected near the white sulphur springs. This arrangement for increased accommodations must, indeed, be necessary if many of the visitors are accompanied by such an array of pets as one lady of whom we have heard. She has nine singing-birds, one parrot, one tame dove, one peacock, six dogs, nine cats (some of which are kittens), two squirrels, two gold-fish, three turtles, and a young alligator. Among the dogs is a black-and-tan, weighing only two and a half pounds, for which she paid $75. We are given to understand that the owner of this menagerie is only abiding at the springs for the season, but we are forced to believe that this is a mistake, and that she is a permanent resident.

A tract of land, including a fine grove, has been purchased at Old Orchard Beach, and laid out for a camp ground. The recent opening of the Boston and Maine Railroad through various sea-side towns has brought many hitherto quiet resorts into prominent notice. Old Orchard has one of the grandest beaches in the world, but we fear the quiet retirement of the place has passed away.

Too Soon, by Mrs. Macquoid, is an entertaining story for those who in their summer recreating desire some light reading. Moreover, scattered through the book there are bits of thought which are worth remembering after the mere incidents of the tale have passed out of mind. As specimens we quote:

"We seldom realize while we are young that we are living our life in each of those hours which we often leap over in imagination, so desirous are we of those ahead, which we fancy will be so much fuller of happiness. And yet to most of us the day, it may be the hour, in which we make our most important step comes to us unexpectedly, with no warning for the preparation which we should have thought necessary beforehand."

"Looks are wonderful things—telegrams of thought, except that instead of giving mere fragmentary corners of it, as any words would, they tell just the essence—that spirituality of feeling which can never be spoken, which the mere fact of shaping into words destroys, as exposure to the broad face of daylight evaporates the fungus we gather under-ground."

"'Aunt Sophy, do you think you could go on all your life eating mutton-chops every day for dinner? Frank is very nice and kind and good—why, he's excellent.' She gave a little weary sigh. 'I have known Frank ever since he was three; there's nothing to find out in him; I know his thoughts and ideas inside and outside too.'"

For ten years past an eccentric man has been living the life of a hermit on a lonely island in Moosehead Lake, Maine. In summer his house has been a large dry-goods box, in winter a hogshead. His food was such as he could find on the island, and he seemed happy. His friends, however, have succeeded in persuading him to return to civilized life.

Suitable nourishment for the dependent poor in severe sickness or in long-continued feebleness is something very difficult to obtain, as benevolent laborers are well aware. "The New York Diet Kitchen" is an organization to establish in each dispensary district a kitchen, to be in charge of an experienced matron. Proper food and delicacies for the sick will be well prepared, and sent out in generous portions by order of the visiting physician of the district.

It certainly seems strange to a reflective mind that the hottest weeks in all the year should be chosen for the heating amusement of racing and violent contests. It would naturally be supposed that people would prefer to keep the blood cool. But no: there are horse-races, boat-races, foot-races, and base-ball contests. We suppose this latter game must be very funny to the participants: knocks and bruises and wounds dwindle into insignificance compared with the brief glory to be won. But base-ball players certainly do not always present a comfortable appearance.

How comfortable for a young wife to feel that her husband is a bountiful provider, and that she will never want for the necessaries of life! A newly married man was recently directed by his wife to order some yeast, and not having a very well defined idea of yeast himself, he told the baker to send up a couple of dollars' worth. At nine o'clock next morning three men might have been seen tugging and sweating up the front stairs of that man's house with a cask of yeast.

A South Carolina journal discourses at some length upon "second love," in a quaint sort of way, being of the opinion that new things are not always the best—that "many a second-hand thing, although somewhat battered and bruised, is more highly prized than its tawdry, flashy neighbor, which will fall to pieces as soon as any strain is put upon it. There is," the writer goes on to say, "a Dora and an Agnes in well-nigh every life. Is the first novel, or the first song, or the first poem as likely to live as the ripe production of later years? Not it. There are men who became famous by a single speech, or by a single verse; so there are men, perhaps, who have had but one love. They are not many, and 'tis better so. The world would soon come to a stand-still without the help of second-hand swains!"

"The Tombs," the dark, damp, and gloomy prison of New York city, is to give place to a more wholesome building for the confinement of criminals. A site for a new prison has been selected on the block bounded by Canal, Bayard, Mott, and Elizabeth streets, and the work of building will soon be commenced. "The Tombs" is built on land which was once a marsh, which accounts for the great dampness of its walls.

Somebody who has been investigating matters by the aid of the census reports informs the public that an individual is six times as likely to kill himself as the lightning is to kill him. This is comforting to those who suffer fears of sudden death during every thunder-storm. This conclusion is drawn from the fact that in 1870 there were 1375 deaths by suicide, and only 202 by lightning. During the same year there were 397 deaths by sun-stroke, so that the sun itself is more to be feared than the fiery flash. Another singular circumstance is that of the 202 persons struck by lightning 148 were males, and only fifty-four females.

In olden times children were early taught that the instant they woke in the morning they must bounce out of bed, not waiting for a moment's consideration until they were safely landed on the floor. Some wide-awake children, whose eyes naturally opened with the coming dawn, could easily accomplish this feat; but alas for the poor little creatures who found it nearly impossible to shake off the drowsiness that pervaded their entire systems! In a pitiful state of semi-sleep they dragged themselves from bed and tried to dress. Those who retain vivid remembrances of such experiences of childhood will be gratified to know that Dr. Hall says that up to eighteen years every child should be allowed to rest in bed, after sleep is over, until they feel as if they had rather get up than not; that it is a very great mistake for persons, old or young—especially children and feeble or sedentary persons—to bounce out of bed the moment they wake up; that fifteen or twenty minutes spent in gradually waking up, after the eyes are opened, and in turning over and stretching the limbs, do as much good as sound sleep, because the operations set the blood in motion by degrees, tending to equalize the circulation; for during sleep the blood tends to stagnation, the heart beats feebly and slowly, and any shock to the system sending the blood in overwhelming quantities to the heart is the greatest absurdity.

THE ORNITHOLOGIST.—[From the Picture by H. Stacey Marks, A.R.A., in the Royal Academy.]

THE ORNITHOLOGIST.

THIS picture has been one of the chief attractions of this year's exhibition of the London Royal Academy. Last season Mr. Marks excited general admiration by the minute Dutch-like treatment of his "Bookworm;" "The Ornithologist," however, even surpasses "The Bookworm." It is necessary to stand for some time in front of the picture before the eye can master a tithe of the innumerable details. It tells its own story. An old gentleman, evidently some ancien militaire with a taste for sport, has formed an ornithological museum—perhaps of specimens he himself has shot in days gone by—and is busy arranging, dusting, and rearranging his treasures with his old servant, evidently a faithful follower of his master's fortunes. The whimsical look of the man, as he stands at the foot of the steps with flamingo and stork under either arm, the intensely interested and anxious expression on the face of the master, are rendered to the life. Seldom also, even by the most exact Dutchman, has any thing been better painted than the bell-glass on the left, with its reflection of the window and its contents of bee-bird, oriole, and kingfisher. All around is one confused mass of plumage and brilliant color. Herons and penguins, kingfishers and storks, dead jays and cases of humming-birds, grave-looking owls and a heterogeneous flock of feathered kind, combine, with the soft and silvery light shed over the whole, to produce one of the most charming effects ever attained by a modern artist.

THE TALKATIVE MAN.

THE talkative man has not, as a rule, the ability to make either a good set speech or to write; so he adopts a middle course, and tries to talk. He is never content unless he is hearing his own voice and monopolizing the lion's share of any conversation in which he may be engaged. He is constantly hunting up jokes which somebody else has made, and retailing them as if they were his own whenever he is afforded the opportunity of doing so, while he positively revels in weak and utterly preposterous puns. These latter are of such a character that they unmistakably show that he is led to play upon words not because he can amuse his friends by doing so, but so that they may see and be led to appreciate his extraordinary talent. He generally speaks in a loud voice, so that every body may hear what he says. This is undoubtedly very kind of him, though those who are principally benefited are not slow to confess that a little of such charity goes a very long way. Let any one relate an anecdote, and after he has pooh-poohed the same, and indulged in sundry contemptuous snorts, the talking man will hasten to cap it with a more extraordinary one, which, he flatters himself, is really worth hearing. He has a fondness for talking of his doings, his possessions, and what he has seen, but he doesn't appear to care about hearing of any thing that you have done, got, or viewed. He is supremely contented if your share of a conversation is confined to a number of well-interjected ahs, yeses, hums, noes, and a few approving nods. He will, in a burst of confidence, which would be extremely gratifying if it didn't come so often, inform you of many matters which tend to show that he is really a most important being. It may be that he has done nothing in particular calculated to bring him into favorable notice—that he has, indeed, on the contrary, somewhat come down in the world—but then the great achievements of his father or his mother, or some other member of his family, more than compensate for his possible deficiencies. No one could hear him speak, giving credence to what he said, without coming to the conclusion that talent is bred in the bone and merit runs in the blood of the distinguished family to which he has the priceless honor to belong. He is very fond of detecting and exposing the blunders of people in general. Though he has never seen you before, he will kindly take upon himself to set you right if he imagines you are making an error, and he will do so with an energy which should go a long way toward convincing you of his sincerity. If you are traveling in a railway train, an omnibus, or a steamboat, you must not be surprised to hear him breaking in upon a conversation you may be having with a third party, and, after begging your pardon, politely telling you, in effect, that you are a nincompoop for venturing upon such utterly ridiculous statements as those which you have just been making. He does not appear to advantage when engaged in controversy, being very apt to lose his temper, and to be led into making uncharitable remarks about his opponent.

There are two kinds of the talkative man. The one is well educated, the other is not. The educated representative reads, and lets all the world know that he does so. Though he never, perhaps, gives utterance to a gem of original thought, he quotes very largely from poets and classical authors, so that no one can be excused for not knowing that he is thoroughly acquainted therewith. His great erudition, he seems to imagine, firmly establishes his claim to a position of superiority, and so he takes one, except when there is a possibility of being challenged by a more powerful man than himself. The uncultivated talker rarely gives poets and classical authors a thought; indeed, he has rather a contempt for them. The newspaper furnishes him with as much literature as he cares to have. He scorns what is theoretical, and swears by that which is practical. Though he would not be entrapped into discussing a Homeric legend, he will talk unceasingly of the political situation and the prospects of trade. The learned talker haunts conversaziones, drawing-rooms, and wherever else he imagines he can get a crowd of apparently accomplished people, who are really, however, surprisingly ignorant, to listen to him. The "practical" man is to be found in less aristocratic places, and he endeavors not so much to air his extensive knowledge as to prove that whatever he says is correct, and that he is able accurately to forecast the future. Both are disagreeable as companions. They either arouse in you a combative feeling, or make you appreciate your own weakness and inferiority.

THE MOOTED QUESTION.

"I CAN'T stand this any longer, and I won't!" Marcia stopped in her uneasy walk, and stood in a bolt upright, uncomfortable attitude before the table.

"Why, girlie, what is the matter now?" inquired Susie's gentle voice.

Girlie seemed the most inappropriate name for the large-framed woman, with heavy masses of red hair (no subterfuge of auburn possible), pale face, and deep-set black eyes, that burned under level dark brows.

"It's too ridiculous; it's hateful and abominable; and I intend to put an end to it as far as I am concerned," continued Marcia, glaring sternly at her mother.

"You look as if you'd put an end to any thing that vexed you," said Edith, calmly, looking at her with eyes of disapproval. "One, two, three—I've lost a stitch in some way. Won't you turn up the light a little?"

Marcia complied with such vigor that Susie interposed to save the shade, and patted Marcia's arm on the way.

"No, you can't stop me!" blurted that irate young woman. "I am going to have my say now, once for all."

"You act just like a man," said Edith, with a tinge of contempt in her voice.

"You ought to be the last one in this family to scorn a man," retorted Marcia, pointing to Edith's diamond, which was brilliantly asserting itself whenever she moved her hand. "But if I'm like a man, I'm going to have some of their privileges. I won't be cooped up in the house like this because I happen to be a woman."

"That's the Divine ordering," said her mother.

"What's the Divine ordering?—that father and George should go out evening after evening, and I should never hear or see any thing? I scarcely believe that."

"No; you must lay that to society," replied Susie.

"Well, it is not to be any longer. I am going where I please, and when. I could not hear Froude, because every body was scandalized at the idea of my going without a man tagged on to my cloak, like Gratz Brown on Greeley; I didn't see Pepper's Ghost; I can't ever make a call in the evening; I—"

"Goodness! Marcia, stop—do, for common decency's sake!" cried Edith. "You'll be wanting to call on gentlemen yet."

"I want to do so now," replied the daring dissenter. "I wanted dreadfully to go in the other day and ask Mr. Beman about the magnesia in the sun, and couldn't, because he was a bachelor, and people would talk."

Susie looked up once, and then went on with her darning, with fingers that trembled slightly; but Mrs. Dey declared, with more force than usual,

"Marcia, you are talking preposterously. No right-minded young woman feels in that way."

"Then I'm not right-minded. But I mean to go, and let there be an end of the word woman being put up as a bar across my path."

"Really quite eloquent!" said Edith, scornfully, bending a graceful head over her bright worsteds.

"You're very ungrateful, Marcia," said her mother. "Your brothers would always take you if you asked them."

Marcia had thrown herself into a chair, but at this she sprung up.

"I thought it was not delicate for ladies to ask gentlemen to take them out; and if I did, what then? George is so tired with having been out all the night before that he groans and sighs, looks glum, and hurries one so, or else treats you with such solemnity that you feel like a criminal. I don't like going to concerts with martyrs, and especially the kind that don't smile as they go to the stake. No matter how much I want to go to some places, I would rather stay at home than have escort doled out in such unpleasant doses."

"I don't see why you make such a fuss," said Edith. "It's natural that women should stay at home; it has always been so; and you can't change the world."

"Well, it's not natural selection on my part, and that's what elevates the animal."

"Marcia, what language!" interposed her mother.

"You don't stay at home," continued the Darwinian, addressing Edith. "Because you're soft and pretty, you'll marry and perform the old poetical figure of the ivy and the oak; but it's different with me, and I don't intend to be tied down by sex any longer, but am going to have the rights of a rational human being."

Edith leaned back in her chair so as to bring the softened light on her face, and clasped her white hands on the black velvet of her work, where they lay like lilies. It was true, Marcia would probably never marry; plain women were apt to act in this way. Now dear, good little Susie, so plump and rosy, would make an excellent wife for some plain, substantial man, while she herself would certainly be in her proper place at the head of Robert Thornton's elegant establishment.

"It's a pity you did not proclaim your independence before the election," said Mrs. Dey, with a feeble attempt at scorn.

"I don't want to vote," said Marcia, stopping in her walk on the floor. "Politics are too dirty."

"They might be reformed," quietly remarked Susie, looking up with a bright light in her eyes.

Marcia stared at her a moment, and continued, "If you and Edith want to stay at home—"

"I don't want to," said Susie.

"—Why, you are welcome to do so. Cousin Edith has a lover who thinks she is the only mortal in the world; and as long as my money lasts I mean to go. I shall hear Lucca to-morrow night."

"Oh, don't!" cried Edith; "I wouldn't have Mr. Thornton see you there alone for any thing."

"No danger," replied Marcia, shortly. "What do you snobs in the five-dollar seats know of us music-lovers toasting for a dollar apiece in the top of the house?"

"Not even a reserved seat! Why, that is not respectable."

"I think I've got beyond the point where men and reserved seats make me respectable."

"Marcia, you don't really mean to go! Some dreadful thing will happen to you," urged her mother. "Ask one of your brothers."

"What, take a boy of fourteen, about half as large as I am—away from his studies, too! And if I ask George, he'll be sure to have some other engagement. No, I have taken my stand at last."

"Oh dear!" groaned Mrs. Dey.

"I'll talk to her about it," said Susie.

"Will you?" exclaimed Marcia, going to the window to cool off, where in a few minutes Susie followed her.

The result of their conversation was Marcia's saying, as she went up stairs,

"I'll do as you say this time, and you'll see it will be just as I told you."

The next evening, as the family gathered about the table for dinner, Marcia exclaimed:

"This is Lucca's last night in Faust; I do so want to go."

A silence followed this remark, Edith lifting her eyebrows in remembrance of Marcia's declaration, but being too indifferent to say any thing. The door-bell rang, and George sprang up, saying,

"That's Boker! I'm off."

"Are you going out, father?" inquired Marcia.

"No, I'm too tired to go any where to-night. When a man has been out all day, he wants to rest at home sometimes."

Marcia made no reply, but her black brows seemed to form a barricade behind which some kind of a battle was to take place. She was ominously silent during the evening, hardly civil to Mr. Thornton when he came for Edith, and sat a long time in the dark in her own room. There was something in the steady energy of her face that haunted Mr. Thornton as he looked at the pretty silken woman by his side, and he remarked,

"Your cousin Marcia must be a person of considerable character."

"Marcia is peculiar," replied Edith, with a tone of artificial pity. "You must excuse her roughness."

"Oh, I rather like it. Sometimes the best gems have the most unprepossessing exterior, but the skilled hand brings out untold beauty."

Edith softly murmured "Yes," for her feminine ear had detected a note of feeling in his tone which she seldom heard, but her mind was occupied with the wonder what he would give her for Christmas.

"Susie," said Marcia, the next day, "I am going to the lecture to-night, and if you want to go, I'd like to have you."

"I don't quite like to have you go alone, Marcia; so if you insist on this course I shall always accompany you."

"I am glad of it, for you don't go out any more than I do, and we both need it."

"I think so," replied Susie. And here the matter ended—with them.

A fearful domestic storm arose when the girls announced their intention.

"You are not going alone?" asserted George.

"Yes."

"No; I'll take you up, and come for you."

"It is not at all necessary."

"I'm not going to have my sisters run over New York in that way in the evening."

"There's no use in talking about it, George."

"There's no question about the impropriety of it."

"Yes, there is. Put it in this form, Can women who have no escort quietly go about unmolested in New York in the evening, or can they not? And Susie and I, like Miss Emily Faithfull with her type-setting, will prove in person that they can."

"You have an escort."

"How often?" And the girls left the room.

George had his way in so much as he attended them to the hall; and when the lecture was over they looked for him among gentlemen about the door. He was not there, and Susie thought they had better wait. So they did until every one was gone, and the janitor, looking suspiciously, came to lock up. As they walked to the cars the few passers in the street glanced at them, for they lingered and looked, expecting George every moment.

"Looking for any one, miss?" asked a man, putting his face close to Susie's.

She started back, and clutched Marcia, who sternly said,

"No," in a naturally deep voice, delivering the word as if it was a stone.

"Beg pardon," said the man, hastily retreating.

"That comes of looking for a man!" said Marcia.

Susie was too disturbed to speak, expecting unpleasant encounters at every corner; but when they moved as with a purpose they had no other adventure, reaching home in safety. George apologized, saying he really forgot until it was too late, and then he walked home with Boker, as he thought there was no use going for them. Marcia accepted his excuse, but told Susie to mark the value of leaning on a "broken reed."

"Putting my hand to the plow and turning back is not my way, and you'll be convinced some day, too."

From that time Marcia and Susie pursued their course undeviatingly. George and the father were thoroughly unreconciled at first, talked much, and, to do them justice, would have acted also, but Marcia was inflexible. Sometimes, when it met their engagements, all went together, but more often the girls alone, and the matter finally settled itself. As the girls pursued their way quietly and simply, they elicited no remark, and met with nothing unpleasant. Their faces became familiar to some inveterate lecture and concert goers; but as they assumed the position as a matter of course, others accepted it in the same light. Neither of them looked the least like strong-minded women in the usually accepted sense. Marcia's defiance was truly feminine in its character; and a bright blush and sudden tumult in her bosom, if too closely approached or contemplated, betrayed a delicacy of character which in a measure unfitted her for actual conflict with the world. Susie was eminently a fireside body in looks and manner. Gentle and soft, a little trim, bright person; but once look into the earnest dark eyes and you'd shake your head. There was a something in them that suggested change, and surely they were the outlook of a thinker. Susie was not entirely content with things as they were; but the success of the experiment gradually convinced her, and she began to see that woman might have an independent existence, and yet resign none of the grace and delicacy of her sex. She learned, too, that men thoroughly respect women who, with a simple, honest purpose, attend to their own affairs, even if in so doing they seem to stray out of the beaten path of life. Marcia was more content and happy than she had ever been. The storm disappeared from her black brows, and a grace of womanhood, born of peace and independence, was throned in her crown of shining hair.

"Those are surely your cousins," said Mr. Thornton, one evening, as he and Edith came out from a lecture.

"Yes," she replied, carelessly; eagerly adding, "There are Mr. and Mrs. Eames."

Mr. Thornton bowed with indifference to the fashionable couple who passed them, and turned to discuss the lecture with the sisters. Edith afterward declared herself ready to die with mortification at meeting them in that way, but Mr. Thornton seemed quite delighted with Marcia's bright remarks, and offered the sisters tickets for the next evening.

"I should be delighted to accompany you if Edith would like to go, but unfortunately I am always engaged on Wednesday evenings," he said, in parting.

"Just as if you were a couple of men!" said Edith.

"He did not," replied Marcia. "You don't deserve such a lover;" and she went up stairs with a red face.

"I thought him very polite," said Susie; "and I shall be so glad to go."

The lecture hall was some distance from the girls' residence, and when they came out the cars were much crowded. Susie demurred about getting on, but the conductor urged that there was plenty of room, and when she had succeeded in gaining the upper step the car started without Marcia. As they were on a down grade, they did not succeed in stopping again until they had gone nearly two blocks. Susie had no choice but to alight and look for Marcia, which she did with some trepidation. It seemed strange to be walking alone in the night, but in an instant the absurdity of the position flashed across her. She had considered herself a protection for Marcia, being older, and on no account would have thought of going alone herself; yet here they both were looking for each other, and perhaps going further away, for Marcia might have taken the next car down. Still, as the case stood, Susie pursued her search, though her opinions had taken a leap that might have startled the boldest reformer. But she did not find Marcia, and, after much consideration and walking, went home, to discover, to her horror, that the missing one had not appeared there either. The ladies of the family had retired, the gentlemen were still out; so Susie sat down upon the lowest stair alone in the dimly lighted hall to consider what had best be done. She was startled by the roll of a carriage, followed by a sharp ring of the bell, and on opening the door Mr. Thornton entered with Marcia. In answer to Susie's blank look of amazement, Marcia cried,

"Mr. Thornton insisted, Susie, though I told him it was entirely unnecessary."

"She really was not fit to come alone," he replied, looking earnestly at Marcia, while she turned away with an embarrassed manner.

"But where have you been?" inquired the astonished Susie, beginning to feel confused with the light which was dawning upon her on more than one subject.

"Why, when I went to get on the car I suddenly became dizzy, and had to sit down on the curb-stone, and then I have very indistinct recollections until—"

Marcia paused, and Mr. Thornton said, with rather more excitement than usual in his tone,

"As I was passing a druggist's I went in to get a light, and there was your sister just recovering herself. She seemed much better in a moment, but I thought she ought to come home in a carriage."

Curiously enough, Mr. Thornton looked at Marcia instead of Susie during these remarks, and at the close, after offering assistance, hastily made his adieux. Susie was too busy with conflicting thoughts, and Marcia too much shaken by the events of the evening, to admit of much conversation; so the girls went to bed very quietly.

The next morning, when the adventures of the night were related at the breakfast-table, Mr. Dey and George exclaimed:

"I always told you something would happen! Now there's an end to this folly."

"But there is not an end," said Susie, quietly. And so the sequel proved.

It already seemed convenient to George to be able to make what engagements he pleased without the fear of being called upon to go somewhere he did not wish to, and Susie now cast prejudice to the winds, and darned seditious thoughts into the toes of stockings, and laid great plans in elbow patches, which, if known, might have scratched and pricked more seriously than ever a forgotten pin had done. Marcia's life was full of content, and she was so playful with George and so social with Mr. Thornton that Edith languidly began to think Marcia really liked men.

A few weeks after Marcia's misadventure, as she and Susie were going to a lecture, they met Mr. Thornton coming in. His pleasant face was clouded, and he bowed abstractedly to them as he inquired for Edith. Marcia's mind wandered a little from the subject of the lecture, and she would hardly have appreciated the elaborate explanations of the speaker if she had known what was going on in the parlor at home.

Edith had greeted her lover in her graceful manner, and then, dropping into an easy-chair, had prepared herself for the usual admiration. But Mr. Thornton seemed to be thinking about something else, and talked in an abstracted, disjointed style, and finally abruptly broke into the subject on his mind. A great blow had come in his business; he had been in trouble for some time, and now all was over: he was ruined. It would take all his private fortune to pay his debts; he must begin over again. Of course it would be some years before they could marry, and then he might be a poor man. He ran through the matter hastily, evidently too much disturbed to dwell upon it, and anxious to let her know the extent of the disaster. Edith had lost her pliant grace as the tale went on, and before it was finished seemed to be busy with some plan. Mr. Thornton leaned over and took the beautiful hand which wore his costly gift, and as he completed his recital looked in her face for some token of love. She calmly lifted her white lids and said,

"Why pay your debts? Keep your money, and be comfortable. That's the way many men do."

He started, and dropped her hand; but catching both, leaned toward her and said,

"You are not in earnest?"

"Yes—for my sake. Of course I can't marry a poor man."

"You know I never could think of such a thing!" he replied, springing up and pacing the room. "But, Edith, a few years would not be long to wait, and I would have such a prize to work for!" And he bent tenderly over her, dropping a kiss into her golden hair.

"It would be a great while to wait—and what of me meantime?" And the tears of vexation sprang into Edith's eyes, but were dried, for crying made her face red. "I'm twenty-two now. You must save your money."

"Don't talk so!" cried Mr. Thornton, moving restlessly about; "it makes me feel as if you did not love me."

"I don't know that I do," replied Edith's soft voice, while she slipped the diamond ring up and down upon her finger.

He stopped as if stunned, and stood like a statue until Marcia's clear tone said,

"I wonder if Mr. Thornton has gone. I hope he's in no trouble!" and steps were heard on the stair.

"I can not see them," he said. "Good-night," catching Edith in his arms. "You don't know what you've said. I'll see you to-morrow evening," and passed the ladies in the doorway, bowing hastily as he went out.

The next evening the engagement was broken, and Mr. Thornton was no longer a frequent visitor. The family were astonished at the event, and Marcia indignant when she discovered the cause; but Edith had not a nature to be moved by surprise or indignation in others, and pursued her way, certain that she had acted for the best. Robert Thornton, however, had not forgotten Marcia's helpful tone, and when he met her one Sunday at church, and she urged his calling, adding, "Susie and I are quite alone now; mother and Edith are away," he came.

He was slowly working upward in the face of much discouragement, and Marcia's cordial sympathy and quick womanly intuition were a real help and comfort to him. He soon was in the habit of dropping in to ask her advice, or, if things went wrong, to hear her hearty "I'm sorry!" and to feel the grasp of her strong hand. He even became inclined to hold the latter a little longer than was necessary, and to linger on the balcony in the summer twilight, talking of other things than business, while Susie read by the low lamp in the library. She was becoming as much absorbed in her occupation as the couple in the moonlight, though bones and muscles, belladonna and scarlet fever, are rather different topics from those chosen by Marcia and her companion. But tastes differ, and while one temperament requires strong doses of physic to bring healthy action, another only needs a little petting, and all is right; and so with the sisters. There came an evening when Marcia, returning from a walk, slipped her arm about Susie's neck, and laid a burning cheek on her forehead.

"Why, girlie!"—and Susie finished an osseous sentence before she looked up. "Something has happened," she asserted, when Marcia's sparkling eyes and quivering lips were fully revealed.

"Oh, Susie, he's splendid, and we're so happy!" was the rapturous response.

After an hour's interval, when the book was forgotten, and Marcia on the floor and Susie bending over her, each trying to outtalk the other, Marcia exclaimed:

"But, Susie, what will you do? We've been so much together, and I'm your escort."

"Why, I'll go alone; and, besides, I've a secret to tell you. I'm going to study medicine next winter, and doctors can surely take care of themselves."

Susie's face was not less bright than Marcia's, and her enthusiastic outpourings concerning her love interwove with Marcia's plans for the future. In due time the weddings took place. Marcia became Mrs. Thornton, and Susie M.D. And when the nation celebrates its Centennial, Susie will lecture in her quiet, homely way before the interested students, Marcia will train her baby boy, bubbling over with joy when he stammers papa, and Edith sit in her luxurious parlor, thankful that she had the courage to refuse Robert Thornton, or she never could have been Mrs. Blaine, with a private carriage, and two colored men at table.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

"A few Units."—Miss Rose Hill.—A Beard Show.

THE Duke of Edinburgh will doubtless get the £10,000 a year to be voted to him by Parliament upon his approaching marriage, in addition to the £15,000 a year which he already possesses; but by no means will he get it "unopposed save by a few units," which is the account given by the Times of the course matters are likely to take. That great organ of "constitutionalism" even goes so far as to state that it is a comfort to the people to think that Clarence House (of the very existence and locality of which "the people," including your humble servant, are utterly ignorant) is already provided for the young people. This is the same newspaper which, as I once told you, remarked that the expression of sympathy sent by telegraph by the Queen on Charles Dickens's death was "the greatest earthly comfort" his family could experience. Lord Granville in the House of Lords requests the peers to "humbly express their thanks to her Majesty for her gracious condescension" in having communicated to Parliament the intended marriage of her second son; and Lord Salisbury, on the part of the opposition, is convinced "that whatever gives pleasure to the Queen must needs give pleasure to all classes of the people by whom she is revered." Nay, when Mr. Hunt (in the absence of his chief, Disraeli), seconding Mr. Gladstone's motion upon the matter—for in such cases, as is fitting, the chief of the opposition seconds the proposal of the minister—observed that if, like Oliver Twist (only he did not mention it as a quotation), her Majesty had asked for more, her faithful Commons would have granted it, there were cries of "Hear, hear!" In short, if you should take for granted the literal truth of these authoritative utterances, you might picture John Bull upon all fours with a money-bag in his mouth, only waiting, like a dutiful retriever, for the Queen to take it from him. As it happens, however, this is by no means the case; and the principal objection he has to forking out the money is the humiliating attitude in which he is thus represented. The phrases of adulation employed by these courtly personages sicken his honest stomach. To you who are not accustomed to progress on your hands and knees they will be, I suppose, unintelligible. I wish they were so in England.

The objections to the grant itself—though it is certainly large enough—are as nothing compared with the general distaste to the thankless way in which it is demanded, and the slavish sycophancy with which it is acquiesced in; and, moreover, there is another consideration. The Duke of Edinburgh is known to be such an excellent manager—so entirely without that vice of heedless generosity commonly ascribed to princes—that he would have made a smaller sum go quite far enough. In the mean time "the few units" are exercising their right of protest: the ratepayers at Birmingham have passed a resolution disapproving of the grant; a demonstration against it has been held at Nottingham; and in Hyde Park a meeting is advertised to be held to-day for the same purpose.

Apropos of royal marriages: on Friday, August 1, died, at Kensington Palace, Cecilia, Duchess of Inverness, by private marriage—but contrary to our Royal Marriage act—consort to the Duke of Sussex. Sixty years ago or so (for she was eighty-four) that union made a noise in the world of fashion, of which a faint echo is now once more heard.

Supposing it were possible, Mr. Editor, that the breath of scandal should so far affect your honest name as to cause you to be tried for perjury in a criminal court, would you not be much astonished if your own advocate were to remark that your statements "were not in general characterized by mathematical accuracy;" that "your usual behavior was marked, he would not say by delirium, but by ridiculous absurdity;" and finally, that he would only say of you that you were "a liar and an idiot?" Would it not strike you that this conduct was rather rough upon you, as proceeding from your hired counsel, and would it not cause you to entertain the reflection, "If these be the eulogies of my defender, where will my prosecutor find his phrases of reprehension?" Yet the very terms I have just quoted were used to-day by Mr. Kenealy with reference to his client, the claimant. "You are not," he said, addressing the jury, "to take notice of his blunders and nonsensical mistakes about dates and localities, for it is impossible to account for what this man said or did; you must try him on broad principles." This is funny; but a still more humorous incident arose out of yesterday's trial. In the course of Mr. Kenealy's prolonged efforts to prove that the real young Roger Tichborne was an abandoned debauchee (in order to make his character assimilate with that of his present client), he laid great stress upon finding a young woman's name, Rose Hill, in Roger's memorandum-book; you may imagine how he suggested that she had fallen a victim to the young man's passions, how she had once been pure and beautiful as the lily, till this heartless scoundrel crossed her path, and she became his sullied victim, etc.—when all of a sudden it turned out that Rose Hill was not the name of a young woman at all, but that of the family residence of a Mr. Smith, near Birmingham! "That being so," says Mr. Kenealy, grudgingly, "I'll give her up."

The fact is, like a jockey who has his "instructions" to make a waiting race of it, the learned counsel is talking (on behalf of the Tichborne bond-holders) against time, in hopes that a judge or a juryman (two of the latter of whom have already been indisposed, and caused adjournments) may die, and so make the proceedings null and void.

I dare say you have often read in the speeches of our conservative statesmen that this country is unhappily becoming Americanized, that the small end of the wedge has been inserted, with many other metaphors appropriate by their antiquity to the views of the orators in question. I have known a good old Tory country gentleman object to his wife's wearing American goloshes, because she would thereby put her foot in it by adopting one of your "institutions," and take the first step to revolutionize this country, "Sir." (We don't say "Sir" as often as you do, but we always use it when we are on the topic of the Constitution.) These forebodings are not, it seems, unfounded. We have long ago imported baby and bar-maid shows into this hemisphere, and last week (at a much-advertised tea-garden) we had a beard and mustache show. One competitor was unable to appear in person, but sent a letter inclosing a specimen of his beard, forty inches long! The prizes were bestowed in accordance with a show of hands made by the ladies present, and in both instances fell, you will be flattered to hear, to citizens of the United States. "I am not so bald," as Longfellow writes, in his Spanish Student, "that you can see my brains;" but when the time comes for rewards for bald gentlemen to be advertised, I hope to be qualified to compete. In ancient days, when brides were more openly put up for sale than at present (notwithstanding what the authoress of Girls of the Period may say to the contrary), it was the custom to give the money paid for the beauties as dowries to the plain girls, who would else go without husbands; and surely that seems more just than this giving prizes to those in no want of a recompense. It is not the man with "a fine head of hair" that should get the money, but the bald man, that he may buy himself a wig. To see the unsuccessful competitors stroke their beards, as though to console them for their defeat and for the misplaced admiration of their judges, was, it is said, quite a pathetic spectacle: also to see their mustaches droop.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

THE LITERATURE OF SMOKING.

NOTHING has been more belauded, nothing more abused, than smoking. At one time it has been all the fashion, at another it has been altogether tabooed; ignored as completely as it is ignored in the pages of Shakspeare; idolized as completely as it was idolized by Dr. Parr; cast off as ruthlessly as Blackstone cast off the Muses he had wooed. Poets, divines, orators, and historians have waxed eloquent in its praises, and not less eloquent have been the furious invectives hurled against it. It has been one of those things—there are not many—on which every one has had definite opinions. Those who have written or spoken for or against it have been equally unmeasured in the phraseology they employ. King James the First thundered the first volley in his famous Counterblast to Tobacco, and this was followed by a Volley from Parnassus, by an anonymous writer, whose wrath seems to have outstripped his power of expression. An under-tone of grumbling, in the shape of epigrams, occasional pamphlets, sarcastic notes, etc., is sometimes discernible to the curious in such things all through our literature; but these grumblers are mostly of the subterranean order, mere croakers in the nethermost mud. One renegade, however, we must notice, a man who ought to have known better—Charles Lamb. His Farewell to Tobacco is the expression of the only piece of ingratitude that gentle nature was guilty of, if ingratitude it was. Catullus, we know, always discovered when Lesbia was fondest of him by the heartless way in which she abused him. Perhaps the same paradoxical sentiment was guiding the infatuated Lamb when he penned the line, "Filth o' the mouth, and fog o' the mind"—a plagiarism, by-the-way, from a great smoker, who calls silence "Frost o' the mouth, and thaw o' the mind."

One of the greatest of modern poets, tolerant of every thing besides, has the bad taste to be intolerant on this one subject, and hates a pipe or cigar as he would be ashamed to hate any thing or any body else in the world. But smokers can afford to smile at these black swans as they glance over the goodly list of those who have been guilty of the same weakness as themselves. The great Dr. Isaac Barrow called his pipe his Panpharmacon, or cure for every thing. Bishop Hall and Dr. Hooker were by no means proof against a quiet clay. We can see Ben Jonson and Drummond with the white vapor wreathing itself around them, and are by no means certain that my Lord Bacon did not know from experience the truth of his own words, "Tobacco comforteth the spirits and dischargeth weariness, which it worketh partly by opening, but chiefly by the opiate virtue which condenseth the spirits." Fletcher had many a quiet pipe with Beaumont, and Sir Thomas Overbury often soothed himself in a pause of his troubled life with "that delectable pastime." Scholars and students of every kind have been faithful votaries of the weed. Boxhore, the great Dutch scholar, was such a slave to it that he wore a very broad-brimmed hat, pierced a hole through it, and so supported his pipe, while his hands were free, and smoked unimpeded day and night. Bentley could never sufficiently thank Cumberland for initiating him into the delightful mystery of enjoying a pipe, and only regretted he had not begun earlier to learn it: he was over seventy when he had his first lesson. Porson used to dogmatically assert that when smoking went out of fashion learning did so too, and old Dr. Parr insisted on taking his pipe with him wherever he went. "No pipe, no Parr," was his snappish and ungallant speech to a lady who objected to the fumigation of her drawing-room. The only rest poor old Hobbes got in that stormy, contentious existence of his was when he could light his pipe in comfort, and forget all about Dr. Eachard or Wallis. Who can not see in imagination John Milton smoking his regular evening pipe, and talking between whiffs to gentle Elwood? or step over to the "Rose" and survey the author of Hudibras, silent, absent, and reserved, with a history in every line of that hard, coarse face, now lit up with the flare of the live coal he has put into the bowl of his pipe. Fielding was a great smoker, and many a scene of those harum-scarum comedies of his was dashed off on his tobacco paper. Tillotson was not a little attached to his evening pipe; and Jeremy Taylor meditated not a few of his golden pages through the "wreaths of a curling mist which was born not of the meadows."

Old Burton, the author of the immortal Anatomy of Melancholy, has a curious passage on the divine plant. He knows not what to conclude of it. "Tobacco, divine, rare, superexcellent tobacco! which goes far beyond all their panaceas, potable gold, and philosopher's stones; a sovereign remedy to all diseases; but as it is commonly abused by most men, which take it as tinkers do ale, 'tis a plague, a mischief, a violent purger of goods, lands, health." One may read in this the experience of many "merrie, facete, and juvenile" hours with old John Rouse, of the Bodleian, in the back quad of Christ-church—for he, like Burton, was a hero of the weed. Mathematicians have generally been great smokers, though we hope, for the honor of the name, they did not, like Sir Isaac Newton, use the fingers of their lady-loves for stoppers. All the wits of Queen Anne's time were nothing without their pipes. Steele wrote with a pipe in his mouth; and it was when wreathed in smoke that Addison shone most. Dryden, after his snuff-box, loved a whiff; and the great Mr. Congreve scorned not a "church-warden." Ambrose Philips was eloquent in its praises, and his namesake, John, has written a delightful alcaic ode in its praise. Who can forget honest Dr. Brown's "Little pipe of mighty power," and think of Daniel Defoe without his pipe? The Spectator always devoted an hour in the evening to absorbing a clay; and if ever his equanimity was disturbed it was when the dancing Frenchmen broke his pipes. In later times tobacco has not been so popular with literary men. Shelley could not endure a pipe, nor could Edgar Poe, nor Moore. Neither Macaulay nor De Quincey was a smoker. If report speaks truly, owever, a good many distinguished writers of our own day keep up the traditions of olden times.

ART IN THE HIGHER ALPS.

MANY years since Mr. Ruskin expressed a hope that some first-rate artists would attempt to paint snow, not in its winter aspect and somewhat vulgar expression of dull and cruel opposition to life, but as it is seen under warm light. "Its curves are of inconceivable perfection and changefulness; its surface and transparency alike exquisite; its light and shade of inexhaustible variety and inimitable finish; the shadows sharp, pale, and of heavenly color; the reflected lights intense and multitudinous, and mingled with the sweet occurrences of transmitted light. No mortal hand can approach the majesty or loveliness of it, yet it is possible, by care and skill, at least to suggest the preciousness of its forms and intimate the nature of its light and shade: but this has never been attempted; it could not be done except by artists of a rank exceedingly high, and there is something about the feeling of snow in ordinary scenery which such men do not like. But when the same qualities are exhibited on a magnificent Alpine scale, and in a position where they interfere with no feeling of life, I see not why they should be neglected as they have hitherto been, unless that the difficulty of reconciling the brilliancy of snow with a picturesque light and shade is so great that most good artists disguise or avoid the greater part of upper Alpine scenery, and hint at the glacier so slightly that they do not feel the necessity of careful study of its forms." The critic might have added that few artists have constitutional strength for the necessary studies at great heights, and still fewer have the courage to face unpopularity and pursue beauty that holds forth empty hands to her votaries. We all know how artists are kept to styles and subjects in which they have made a notorious "hit," and so they turn round and round in their "professional fairy-land," a land of impossible effects, tricks of color, "ficelles," and general unreality that could hardly have existence were it not for the complacent know-nothingness of our moneyed cognoscenti. Yet, for a' that and a' that, there is an increasing class to which the ice world of the Alps, the summer pleasaunce of Europe, is an ever-flowing fountain of awe and delight, and the first true painter of its beauty can not surely fail of that greeting without which possibly art has little right to exist. As yet unhackneyed and undebased by ignoble association, the wilderness lifted midway to heaven between the three great countries, France, Germany, and Italy, surely merits the touch of art. The value of the Alps, and especially of their wilder recesses, as a place of spiritual retreat from the bustle and discord of the European plain, is yearly more felt. Different powers both of soul and body are brought into play in these desert places, and if the conceit be admissible, it may be said that the Edelweiss is but typical of the white thoughts that blossom for those who climb the heights and rejoice in them:

> "Since to look on noble forms
> Makes noble, through the sensuous organism,
> That which is higher."

But it is allowable to sympathize with the first despair of the artist when he confronts the multiplicity in unity which meets him at every turn of these vast prospects. The serried pines that hang like a mantle on the mountain spurs, even the crowding blossoms eagerly pressing up the slopes, confuse by their multitude, that is always, however, subservient to the upper height and its impression on the imagination. The clear atmosphere forbids the aid of smudge and scumble, and requires sleight of drawing not easily or hastily acquired. Truth can not be sacrificed to expediency without such miscarriage of art as has befallen even Calame, the chief master of the Swiss school. To attain popularity he attempted too much, for great modesty and self-forgetfulness are necessary in any attempt to express the sentiment excited by mountain prospects of the higher sort.

FAST IN FOXTON MIRE.

THE English autumn manœuvres are prolific in incidents, sometimes semi-tragical, but generally very amusing. On page 588 we give an illustration of an unpleasant incident, which ended tragically for one of the parties concerned. A trooper straying over the moor got into "a stable," or deep morass, at Foxton Mire. He dismounted, and managed to obtain foothold upon some rushes, but was unable to assist his horse. He finally got clear off the morass, and went for help, but in the mean time some moor men found the animal, and rescued it from its critical position. It died, however, the same evening.

MADAME NILSSON-ROUZAUD AND SIGNOR CAMPANINI.

THE American public which greeted Christine Nilsson so warmly two years ago will be glad to welcome her back again this fall in the train of Max Strakosch, who, in scouring Europe for operatic stars, has done well to secure this favorite of our countrymen. Since her last visit she has married M. Rouzaud, at Westminster Abbey, in the presence of the chief nobility of England, and therefore comes to us under a new name, though on the stage, we believe, she is known as Mademoiselle Nilsson. It is said that her vocalization is improved, and that her voice is richer and stronger than ever before. She comes accompanied by M. Capoul, who is already well known in America, and a new tenor, Signor Italo Campanini, whose portrait we give in the character of Lohengrin, in which he will appear during the ensuing season. Much curiosity is felt concerning this masterpiece of Wagner's, which, with Verdi's new opera, Aida, is promised by M. Strakosch.

Signor Italo Campanini, as his name denotes, is of Italian origin, being a native of Parma. For one so young he has had a singularly checkered career. When a boy of fourteen he volunteered under Garibaldi against the King of Naples, was rapidly promoted, and at the taking of Capua received desperate wounds, of which he still bears the scars. A subsequent dangerous illness forced him to quit the army. A musical professor who accidentally heard him sing was struck with the power and beauty of his voice, and advised him to study for the stage. He followed the advice, and at the age of eighteen entered the Conservatory of Music at Parma, where he soon won distinction as the most promising pupil therein. Two years after he accepted an engagement to sing in Russia, that training school of young opera singers. He remained there for three years, studying assiduously all the while, when he returned to Milan, to prosecute his studies under Pamarti, the first professor of singing in Italy. Here the fame of the rising tenor attracted the attention of the English impresario Mapleson, who secured him for her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, where he appeared for the first time last winter in Lucrezia Borgia, and was received with enthusiastic applause. His subsequent rôles confirmed this favorable impression, and won him a high place in the favor of the English public, who regard him as one of the best tenors that they have heard. He is young, handsome, a finished artist, and possessed of a singularly pure and melodious voice. His favorite character is Lohengrin, and he is said to be the only Italian who can successfully sing Wagner's music.

The other members of M. Strakosch's troupe are, the soprani, Signorine Torriani and Maresi; the favorite contralto, Miss Annie Louise Cary, who accompanied Miss Nilsson on her last visit to the United States; the tenor, Signor Bonfratelli, from La Scala, Milan; the baritones, Signori Maurel and Del Puente; and the basso, Signor Navelli. Signor Muzio, the friend and pupil of Verdi, is the musical director of the new troupe, which takes the field under the most favorable auspices.

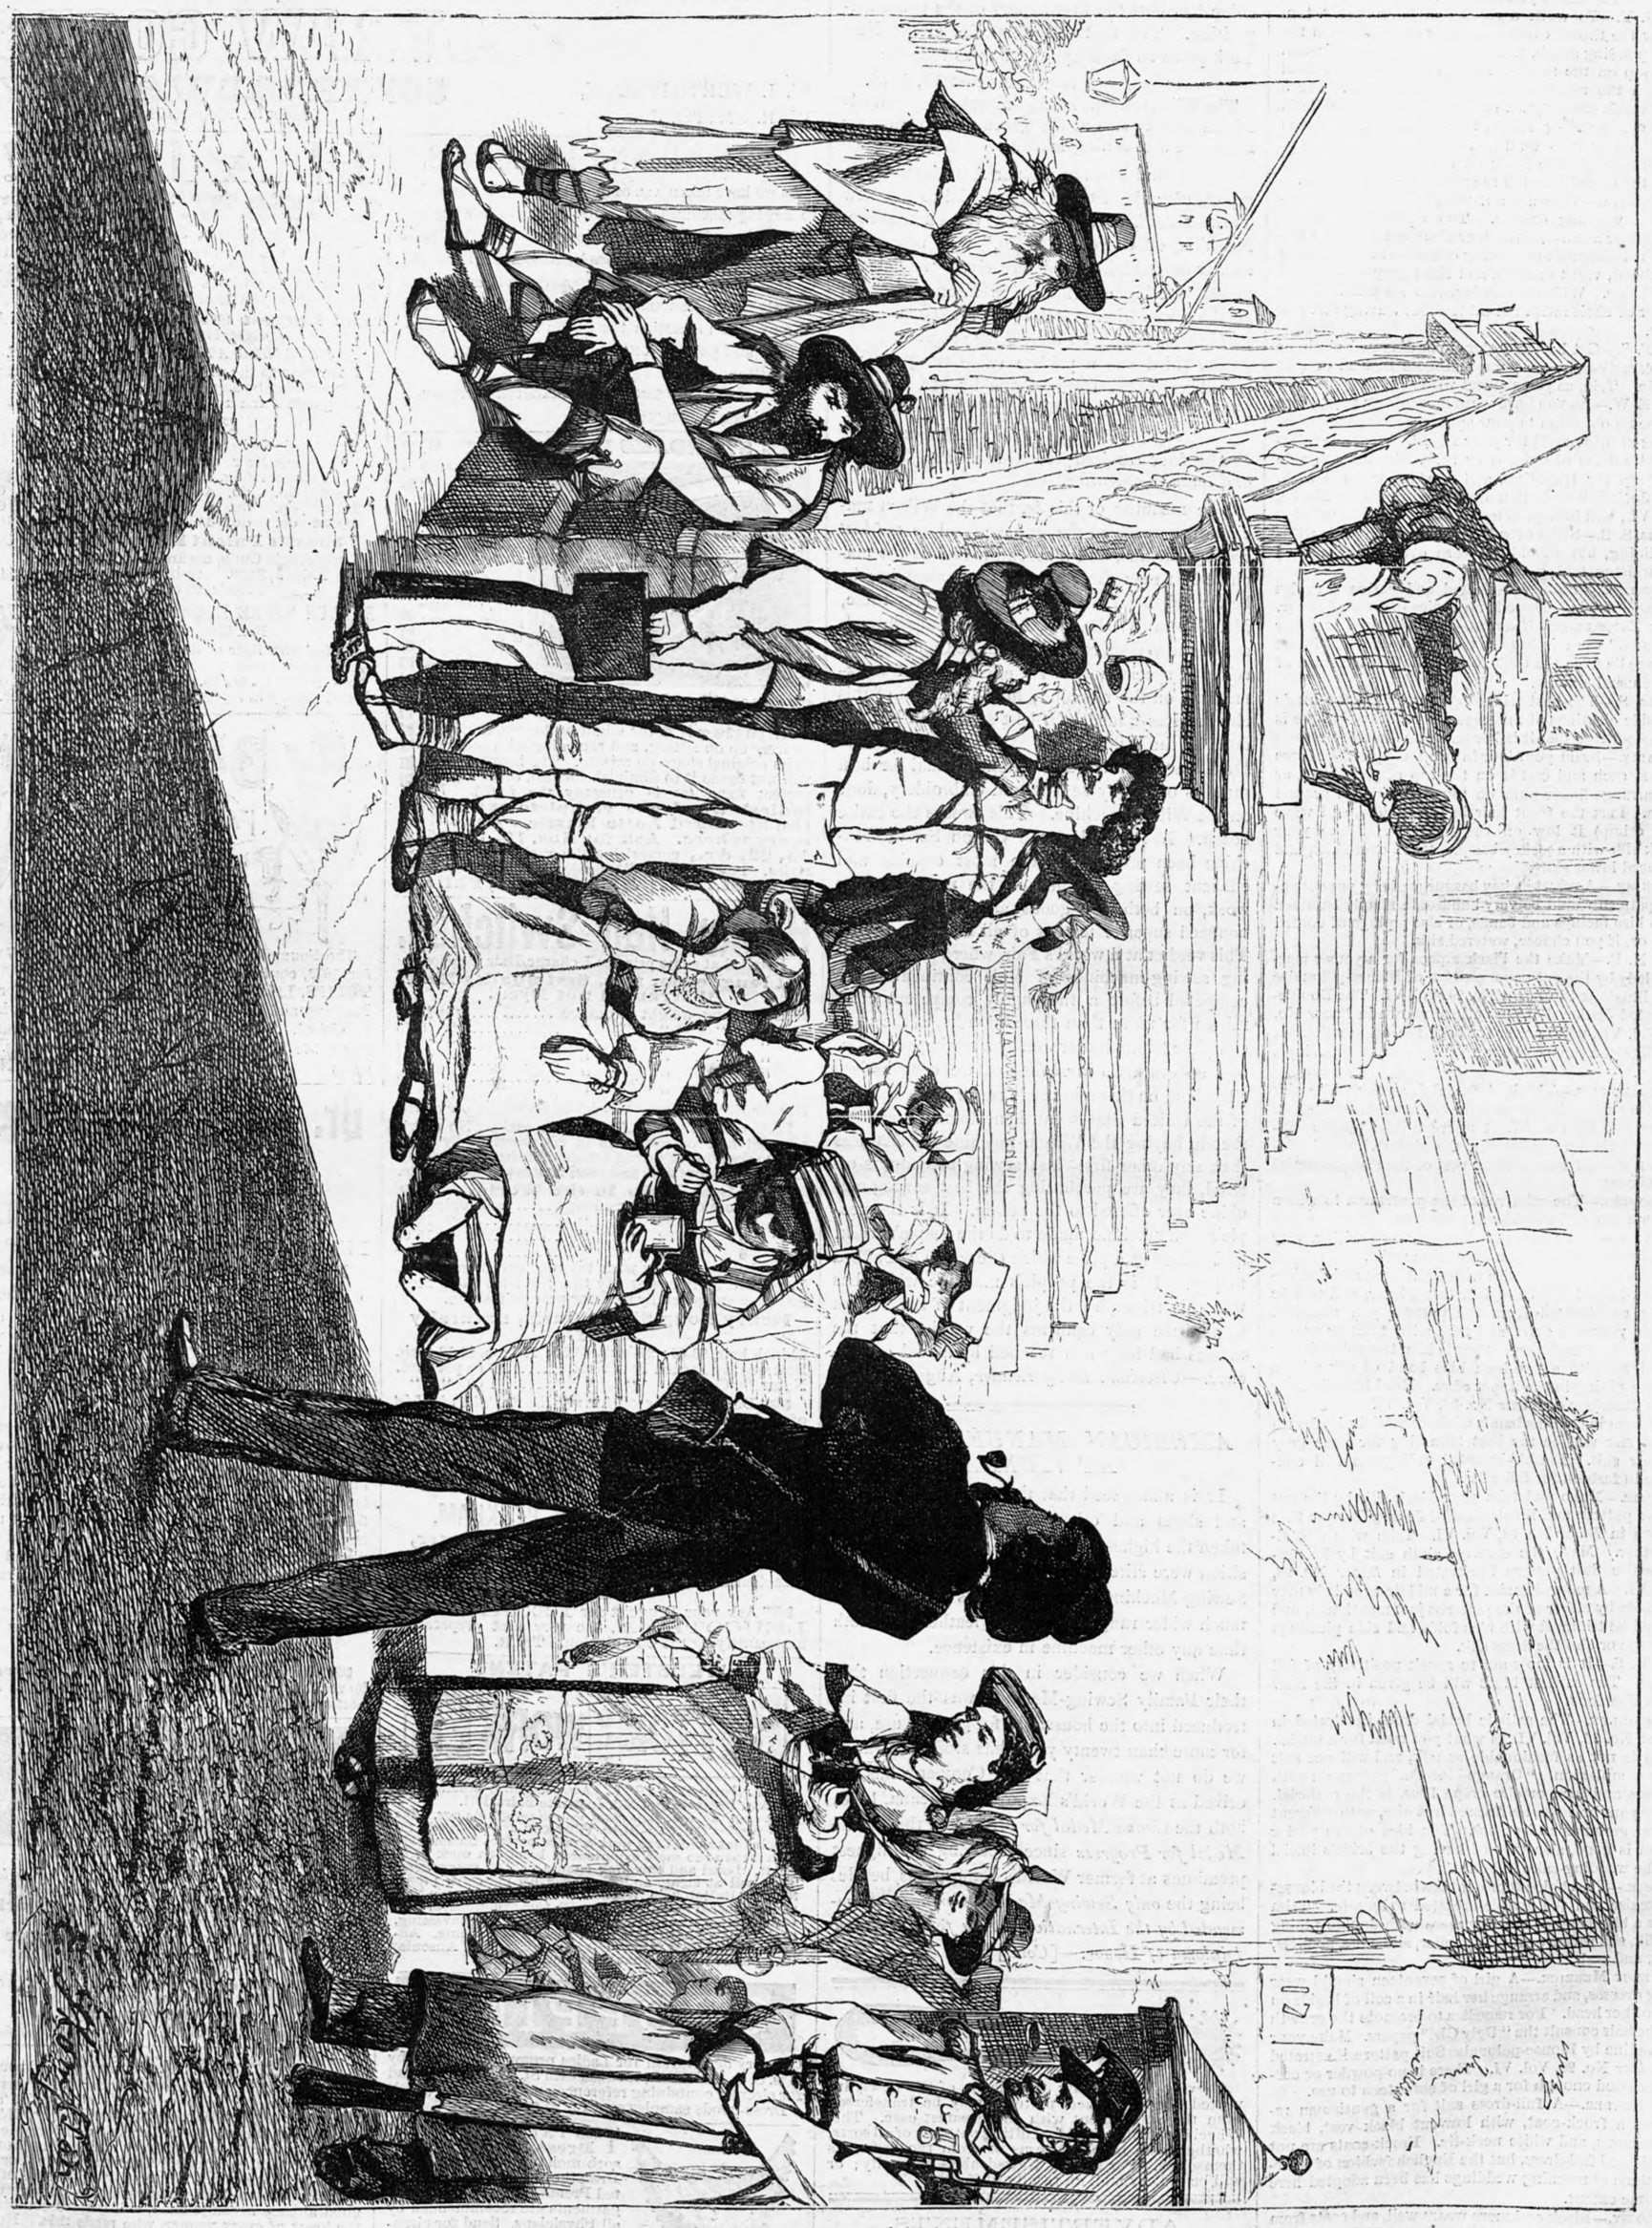
CHOOSING MODELS.

HERE we have one of the most characteristic features of Old Rome—the hire of models on the steps of the Trinità de' Monti, well known for its conspicuous position above the Piazza di Spagna, as also from the fine staircase leading to the church doors. In Rome all business appears to be transacted on steps. On some beggars solicit alms, on others relics are sold, on others again dogs are washed and shaven, while those in our engraving serve as one of the principal standing-points for the Roman models—picturesque and dirty rascals, and for the most part possessing, as some one has recently remarked, "all the ignorance without the innocence of childhood." Their dress mainly consists of a few mouldy rags, the men with the inevitable mummy swathings round their legs, the women with their dusky white head-dresses, black bodices, and bright-colored skirts, picturesque in their very dirt—for despite the charming picture they make on canvas, the models are proverbial for their want of common cleanliness. But their very raggedness and squalor are their chief stock in trade. The sketch represents two artists choosing a model from among a group of so-called peasants, who make a living by their dolce far niente. These models sit about on the steps of the Trinità de' Monti waiting for hire. "This choosing a model," writes the artist, "is rather an invidious proceeding. Often, after turning one of them about and inspecting him, the artist, finding he will not suit, goes on to another, and so on until the right cast of countenance is found, and arrangements are then made for the sittings. Sometimes, as in the sketch, the artist has a brother of the brush with him for consultation, and then a good deal of critical surveying goes on in a very amusing manner."



SKETCHES IN ROME—ARTISTS CHOOSING A MODEL ON THE STEPS OF THE TRINITÀ DE' MONTI.

EMOTIONS AMONG MONKEYS.

MR. GEORGE GULLIVER, in Nature, calls attention to a statement by Forbes, in his Oriental Memoirs, in reference to the possession by monkeys of sentiments that we have not been in the habit of ascribing to them. This author remarks that on one occasion a female monkey was killed by a member of a shooting party, and carried to his tent, which was soon surrounded by forty or fifty of the tribe, making a great noise, and seeming disposed to attack the aggressor. They retreated when he presented his fowling-piece, the dreadful effect of which they had witnessed and appeared perfectly to understand. The head of the troop, however, stood his ground, chattering furiously. The sportsman, feeling some degree of compunction for having killed one of the family, did not like to fire at the creature, though nothing else seemed likely to drive him off. At length the monkey came to the door of the tent, and finding that threats were of no avail, he began a lamentable moaning, and by most expressive gestures seemed to beg for the dead body. This was given him; and taking it sorrowfully in his arms, he bore it away to his expecting companions.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. S. B.—We can not discuss in this column the merits of the article you mention.

E. J. Y.—To work a short double crochet, t. t. o. (throw the thread over) once, insert the needle in the corresponding stitch, t. t. o., draw the thread through one loop on the needle, t. t. o., and draw the thread through the remaining loops on the needle. For a short treble crochet, t. t. o. twice, insert the needle in the corresponding stitch, t. t. o., draw the thread through one loop on the needle, t. t. o., draw the thread through two loops on the needle, t. t. o., and draw the thread through the remaining three loops.

FLORETTA.—Veils are not usually worn with pearl-colored wedding dresses. The bridegroom should wear either a full-dress suit, or else the semi-dress English morning suit consisting of a blue or black cloth frock-coat, vest to match, and light gray or lavender pantaloons. White or else lavender neck-tie. It is a matter of choice with the bride about leaving farewell cards.

L. F. S.—Get brown cashmere or diagonal cloth, or else camel's-hair, for your redingote instead of stiff poplin. Trim as you suggest with silk.

N. E. W.—As you have worn mourning a year, there can be no objection to your appearing at the opera or acting as bride-maid for your friend. Wear an entirely white dress of tarlatan or tulle, with smooth side pleatings for trimming, and a white watered sash. The Jockey Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., will be a good model for your tamise cloth.

MRS. S. B.—Swiss over dresses should be made without lining, but should be worn over a high-necked silk waist matching the skirt.

LOTTIE C.—Both side-pleated and gathered ruffles are fashionable. There is no choice in favor of either.

AN EXPERIENCED KNITTER.—In knitting 2 together "crossed" the stitches are twisted; to do this insert the needle from the back toward the front instead of in the usual manner.

MRS. S.—The best trimmings for alpaca are bands and side pleatings of the same. The jockey basque is so close-fitting that it is becoming to stout figures.

MARIE.—Braid your hair in two long plaits of three tresses each and coil it on the top of your head, or else arrange finger puffs on top with a braid around them. Part the front hair in the middle, and wave (not crimp) it low on the forehead. Make your black silk with a jockey basque, apron over-skirt, and flounced lower skirt.

JENNIE.—A velvet jockey basque made by our cut paper pattern would be very handsome simply trimmed with bias facings and bands, or else pipings of corded silk, or, if you choose, watered silk.

R. N. P.—Make the black alpaca for a young married lady by the cut paper pattern of Blouse-polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI. The Double-breasted Jockey Basque pattern shown in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., will answer for both the other suits. If you like you can make one a jockey basque with single breast.

POCAHONTAS.—The best model for your white silk wedding dress is the artistic costume illustrated in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI. Use crêpe lisse pleating instead of the lace shown in the picture. The bridegroom should wear a black vest of the same material as his coat.

TOODLES.—The relatives of the gentleman to whom you are engaged should call upon you.

MARIE.—Any plain round waist worn with a very wide belt is now called a Josephine waist.

BROWNIE.—A polonaise with tight back and double-breasted front will be stylish this winter, and will be easily constructed from the pattern you mention. Retain your silk skirt, and trim with flounces or else bias bands of cashmere. Simply hem the polonaise, or else trim with a two-inch bias band of silk with a double piping in the upper edge. Read hints in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI.

SUBSCRIBER.—Bias bands of the material piped with black silk will be the best trimming for your gray mohair suit. Double-breasted redingotes will continue in fashion for fall suits.

LUCIE.—Make and trim your black silk by the cut paper pattern and illustration of Jockey Basque Suit shown in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Trim with silk altogether. Make the empress cloth suit by Blouse-polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI. A mourning silk for a middle-aged lady may be made by either of the patterns just mentioned, and should be trimmed with bias folds and side pleatings of crape or else the dress silk.

J. R. S.—It is too soon to speak positively of fall styles. The earliest hints will be given in the New York Fashions.

BROOKLYN.—The artistic bridal dress illustrated in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI., is what you want for a model. Satin is not as fashionable as silk, and will not suit your complexion. "Orange-blossom" gros grain with flowers and lace, or else crêpe lisse, is the material. Have your bride-maids dressed in white, with different flower garlands and sashes. The idea of the parlor organ is good, also that of having the bride's initial on the wedding-cake in boxes.

JOSIE.—The choice at present lies between the blouse-polonaise and the double-breasted redingote. Trim with a bias band of the cashmere with double piping of silk, silk revers or English collar, silk cuffs, pockets, belt, and sash.

MERCY MERRICK.—A girl of seventeen should wear long dresses, and arrange her hair in a coil of braids on top of her head. For remedies to promote the growth of the hair consult the "Ugly Girl" papers. Make your grenadine by Blouse-polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI. There is no powder or cosmetic good enough for a girl of seventeen to use.

A READER.—A full-dress suit for a gentleman requires a frock-coat, with low-cut black vest, black pantaloons, and white neck-tie. Frock-coats are not considered full-dress, but the English fashion of wearing them at morning weddings has been adopted here to some extent.

FLOSSY.—Black cashmere wears well, and costs from 85 cents to $2 a yard. Polonaises will be stylishly worn this winter. Velvet trimming will be much used. For a model for your winter suit see illustration on page 569 of Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI. Sacques and mantles will be the stylish wraps. Silk dress skirts have lengthwise bands or puffs down the three front breadths, with two deep ruffles behind.

PUSS.—Consult illustrations just cited to "Flossy." Black velvet pipings would trim your gray dress prettily for autumn. A sacque or mantle of black camel's-hair is the wrap you want.

A GRAND MEDAL FOR CLEVELAND.

THE WILSON SEWING-MACHINE TAKES THE GRAND PRIZE AT VIENNA.

THREE separate dispatches from Vienna combine to dispel all doubt as to what sewing-machine has won the first honors of the great Exposition. The first was a special to the New York press on Monday, and was as follows:

VIENNA, August 15, 1873.

The Wilson shuttle sewing-machine was awarded the grand prize at the Vienna Exposition for being the best sewing-machine.

The second was the regular Associated Press report, compiled from a long special to the New York Herald, in which the "Wilson Sewing-Machine, of Cleveland, Ohio," was named as among the exhibitors which received "medals for merit," the highest class of premiums awarded at the Exposition. All other sewing-machines will receive simply an award for progress.

The third was a private cable telegram received yesterday from Vienna by Mr. WILSON himself, which was as follows:

VIENNA, August 19.

You have received five medals—two for merit and three co-operative.

The meaning of this is, that the Wilson machine has received the grand medal as the best sewing-machine, and a second medal as the machine best manufactured—that is, embodying the best mechanical workmanship. Besides these, Mr. GEORGE W. BAKER, Assistant Superintendent of the Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, receives a special medal for excellence of workmanship on the machine; Mr. WILLIAMS of this city receives a medal for best sewing on leather, done by the Wilson; and Miss BROCK and Miss DE LUSSEY receive still another medal for best samples of family sewing and embroidery, done on the Wilson machine. This sweeps the entire board. Not only has the Wilson Sewing-Machine been pronounced the most capable and efficient sewing-machine in the world, but its work, on both dry goods and leather, is pronounced superior to that of all other machines. This verdict at a world's Fair, where all the leading sewing-machines of both continents have competed before a thoroughly competent committee for more than three months, is the most complete triumph ever won by a sewing-machine. We congratulate Mr. WILSON, we congratulate Cleveland on this admirable result. The people of the United States can henceforth be assured that in buying the Wilson machine for $20 less than any other first-class sewing-machine is offered, they are purchasing the best sewing-machine ever offered to the public. It is the people's own machine, made to do the people's work, and offered at a price which every one can afford to pay. It is the people's machine which has won this triumph; the judgment of the Vienna Committee only confirms the verdict that the masses had long ago reached by actual experience.—Cleveland Daily Leader, August 20.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES AT VIENNA.

IT is announced that the specimens of boots and shoes and other leather work that have taken the highest premium at the Vienna Exposition were stitched on Wheeler & Wilson's New Sewing-Machine No. 6, which is adapted to a much wider range of work in leather and cloth than any other machine in existence.

When we consider in this connection that their Family Sewing-Machine was the first introduced into the household for general use, and for more than twenty years has stood unrivaled, we do not wonder that this Company has received at the World's Exposition, Vienna, 1873, both the Grand Medal for Merit and the Grand Medal for Progress since receiving the highest premiums at former World's Expositions, besides being the only Sewing-Machine Company recommended by the International Jury for the Grand Diploma of Honor.—[Com.]

BOGUS VIENNA PREMIUMS.

As we have taken ALL of the GRAND MEDALS awarded to sewing-machines and work done on sewing-machines at the Vienna Exposition, which fact has been announced in the newspapers by Associated Press telegrams (over which we have had no control), and consequently is unquestionable evidence, we deem it due to to ourselves to caution the public against the BOGUS CLAIMS and paid advertisements of our vanquished competitors.

Uniform with "The Bazar Book of Decorum."
One Vol., 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

"The Bazar Book of Health" is a companion volume to the "Bazar Book of Decorum," which met with so flattering a reception by the reading public. In paper, typographical features, and binding, it is the exact counterpart of its predecessor, and, without doubt, is destined to an equal share of popular favor. The subjects treated in this useful and practical little work are of vital interest to every household; and the book is full of sensible, practical, and practicable directions in regard to light, ventilation, drainage, eating and drinking, the preparation and choice of food, the care of the sick, the best means of preserving bodily and mental health, what to do in case of various accidents when the surgeon is not at hand, etc. In short, the work is a complete compendium of the rules of health, and the household in which it is read and followed may set sickness at defiance and bid good-bye to doctors.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS.

The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

We can not but congratulate ourselves on having fallen in with Mr. Tyerman's "Oxford Methodists." Recent writings on the Wesleys by the same hand were received, if we are not mistaken, with very general interest, and the present volume may fairly take its stand with these. It supplies portrait-lives of five of the less known participators in that enthusiastic movement that has run Tractarianism such a neck-and-neck race. The book will be acceptable to all except those who can afford to dismiss such movements as mere instances of zeal without discretion.—Examiner, London.

FACETIÆ.

DURING the late war Dr. ——, entering the hospital surgery, met Paddy Doyle, the orderly, and asked him which he considered the most dangerous of the many cases then in hospital. "That, Sir," said Paddy, as, with an indicative jerk of the thumb, he pointed to where, on the table, lay a case of surgical instruments.

Men marry because they are weary of liberty; women because they desire it.

"I say, John, where did you get that rogue's hat?"

"Please, yer honor," said John, "it's an old one of yours that missis gave me yesterday."

If a woman agrees to do what you ask her, depend upon it you are only asking her to do that on which she had already set her mind.

What is that which no one wishes to have, and no one wishes to lose?—A bald head.

A boy defines salt as "the stuff that makes potatoes taste bad when you don't put on any."

An irate man who was disappointed in his boots, threatened to eat up the shoe-maker, but compromised by drinking a cobbler.

Contradiction is the best sauce to argument.

"You shouldn't be glutinous, Isaac," said Mrs. Partington, as, with an anxious expression, she marked the strong convulsive effort that young gentleman was making to bolt the last quarter of a mince-pie—"you shouldn't be so glutinous, dear. You must be very careful, or you will get something in your elementary canal or sarcophagus one of these days that will kill you, Isaac."

What mountain most resembles the sound of a sneeze?—Catarrh-din.

A French author, who is engaged in getting up a book on Americans, has been boring Jones to death for information. The other day he asked him, "Vat vaz ze differance between ze Yankee wimmen and ze Southern wimmen?"

"I'll tell you," snorted Jones, "if you won't bother me again. A Yankee woman loves her husband, children, and minister about the same, and lives on codfish and pumpkin-pie. A Southern woman has feet too small to walk on, and wears shoes too small for her feet."

AN ENDLESS WIT.

"Really, Mr. Johnston, there's nae end to your wit," said a lady in the west of Scotland to a noted humorist.

"Gude forbid, madam," he replied, "that I should ever be at my wit's-end."

PARTING WORDS FROM GERMANY TO FRANCE.—Our "occupation's gone."

The tall man reaches high, but the little man who can climb on to his shoulders reaches higher, and picks more fruit.

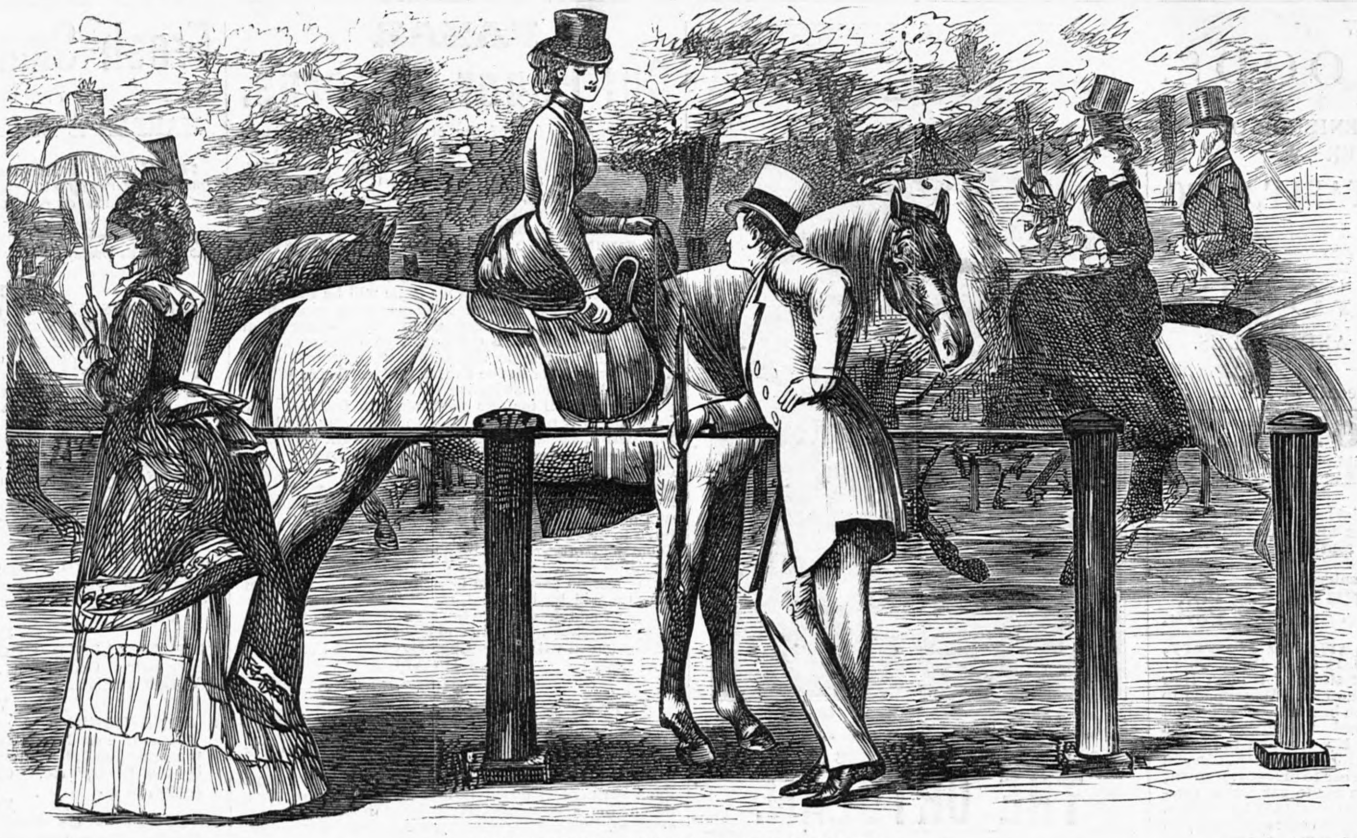
THE MINNOW-MUM—First capture with a worm and crooked pin.

FARMER. "Wull, Maarster Jarvis, and how be ye, Sir?"

MASTER JARVIS (who is of goodly proportions). "Oh, only just middling! There be a main soight too much o' me to be all well at one time!"

ON HAND—The fingers.

Theodore Hook once said to a man at whose table a publisher got very tipsy, "You appear to have emptied your wine-cellar into your book-seller!"



WHAT CITY CRUSHES ARE COMING TO.

"By-the-bye, Mrs. Crowder, have you met the Partingtons lately?"
"Not for an Age! They were at my Ball last Night, but I didn't see them. By-the-way, did you happen to be there, Captain Symthe?"
"Oh yes! Enjoyed myself immensely!"
"So glad!"

A traveler, on his arrival in the city, stopped for a moment to examine a coat hanging in front of a clothing store, when the proprietor rushed out and asked, "Wouldn't you try on some coats?"

"I dunno but I would," responded the traveler, consulting his time-killer; and he went in and began to work. No matter how often he found his fit he called for more coats, and after he had tried on thirty he looked at his watch, again resumed his own garment, and walked off, saying: "I won't charge a cent for what I've done. Hang a man who won't oblige another when he can do it! If I'm ever around this way again, and you've got any more coats to try on, I'll do all I can to help you!"

A NEW NAME FOR TIGHT BOOTS—A corn crib.

A contemporary speaks of a fashionable tailor as being "one of the old war-horses of the trade." A heavy charger, we suppose.

PERPENDICULAR DRINKING—Whisky straight.

HOW TO MAKE A TALL MAN SHORT.—Ask him to lend you five dollars.

A NOTORIOUS EAVESDROPPER—Rain.

When some one told Dr. Barton that Mr. Vowel was dead, he quietly remarked, "Let us be thankful that it was neither U nor I."

TO CURB A FAST YOUNG MAN—Bridal him.

ENGLISHMAN. "I fail to see, Dennis, why you should be so imbittered against the sister isle!"

DENNIS (home ruler). "Listen here, Sir; she won't fraternize wid us!"

A WATER-SPOUT—A teetotal oration.

Truth crushed to earth will rise again, but it isn't so with eggs.

A man being awakened by the captain of a passage boat with the announcement that he must not occupy his berth with his boots on, very considerately replied, "Oh, it won't hurt 'em; they're an old pair."

At a hotel, a short time since, a girl inquired of a gentleman at the table if his cup was out.

"No," said he, "but my coffee is."

The poor girl went away considerably confused, but determined to pay him in his own coin. While at dinner the stage drove up, and several coming in, the gentleman asked, "Does the stage dine here?"

"No, Sir," replied the girl, in a sarcastic tone, "but the passengers do."

THE BEST COLOR FOR FACES—Water-color.

A store-keeper advertises for sale, "Quart bowls of all sorts and sizes, ninepence apiece and various prices."

A FRUITFUL INSTRUMENT—A drum of figs.

RECTOR (going his rounds). "Ah, uncommonly fine pig, Mr. Dibbles, I declare."

CONTEMPLATIVE VILLAGER. "Ah, yes, Sir; if we was only all of us as fit to die as him, Sir!"

A WORD TO THE WISE—Keep so.

"Needs must when the devil drives;" but first you must be fool enough to give him the reins.

What did Adam first plant in the garden of Eden?—His foot.

"What do you ask for that article?" inquired an old gentleman of a pretty shop-girl.

"Five shillings."

"Ain't you a little dear?"

"Why," she replied, blushing, "all the young men tell me so."

The other day an Irishman with a very heavy trunk got into an omnibus, and sat himself down, and held the box on his knees. The conductor wanted to take it from him; "But," says Paddy, "sure the poor creatures of horses have enough to do to drag along without that, and I'll carry it meself."

A bore—the man who persists in talking about himself when you wish to talk about yourself.

A woman without temper is like bread sauce with no onion in it.

A very unpleasant fix was that of the gent who struggled manfully but hopelessly to incase himself within a pair of tight boots while a dog-fight was going on around the corner. He finally got out there in his stocking feet, but to his disgust the fight was over.

An Irishman having been told that the price of bread had been lowered, exclaimed, "This is the first time I ever rejoiced at the fall of my best friend."

"I want a Young Men's Companion," said a spruce customer to a bookseller.

"Very well," said the bookseller, picking up a volume; "here's My Only Daughter."

When is a lady like a show-window?—When she takes great pains with her sash.

It may do to read sermons, but a young lady was lately taken aback when her swain got upon his knees before her and read a declaration of love which he had nicely written off.

LONG DIVISION.—A divorce.

Rasper, being told he looked seedy, and asked what business he was in, replied, "The hardware business; look at my wardrobe."

When Jones's board bill was presented, he said that he did not have enough money to pay it, opening his wallet at the same time. His landlady, seeing quite a number of bank-notes, rather doubted his word, and inquired what denomination those bills were.

"Denomination?" said Jones. "Well, I don't know; but I guess they must be of the Unitarian denomination, for they are all ones."

"This engine won't work," said a fireman to the chief of the Fire Department.

"No wonder," was the reply; "it was made to play."

"What makes a little dog wag his tail?" asked one darky of another.

"Cause de dog is stronger dan de tail. If de tail was de strongest, it would wag de dog, wouldn't it—say?"

A Pennsylvania newspaper announces that a Melanerpes erythocephalus has been observed in the park. This portentous name frightens away all the women and children. The monster in question is the red-headed woodpecker.

Grace Greenwood relates as an instance of the extravagance of New England humor that when a young farmer's wife made her first boy's pants precisely as ample before as behind, the farmer exclaimed, "Goodness! he won't know whether he's going to school or coming home."

PROBLEM FOR FINANCIERS.—To convert a floating debt into a sinking fund.

Trying to do business without advertising is like winking at a pretty girl through a pair of green goggles. You may know what you're doing, but nobody else does.

Somebody asks why it is that theatres are seldom if ever struck by lightning. The solution of which conundrum is that every orchestra has a conductor.

A Parisian musical dictionary defines a shout to be "an unpleasant noise produced by overstraining the throat, for which great singers will be paid, and small children well punished."

HIGHLY CULTIVATED.

YOUNG LADY. "I didn't like Tomatoes at first, but I find they Grow on me."
YOUNG GENTLEMAN. "Grow on You? To be sure they do. There, I see them on your Lips."

MILLIONAIRESSES.

MRS. A. "Well, good-by, dear. You must come and see my new Dresses from Paris—one charming Morning Dress among others, quite simple, and only cost Four Hundred Dollars! You'll come, won't you? and tell me what you Think of it!"
MRS. B. "Oh, my dear, I'm no Judge of Cheap Clothing, you know!"

Roll the collar and fronts along this line. Face the fronts on the wrong side from the under edge to an inch and a quarter beyond the dotted line with gros grain, fold them on the outside along this line, and fasten the revers thus formed with a button on each side. Run the material and lining together on the free outer edge of the basque, and furnish the latter with a button and button-hole for closing. Having sewed up the sleeves from 26 to 27 and from 28 to 29, set on the cuffs according to the corresponding figures, face the sleeves with a strip of the material two inches and a half wide, and set them into the corded armholes, bringing 29 on 29 of the fronts.

Fig. 5.—GROS GRAIN WALKING SUIT. This suit is made of black gros grain, and is trimmed with ruffles and puffs of the material. Black Neapolitan hat, trimmed with blue gros grain ribbon and a bunch of flowers. Gray silk parasol, lined with white lustring.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE POOR.

THE essential truth of the text that the destruction of the poor is their poverty is exemplified in a thousand details of everyday life. It has probably occurred to almost every body of narrow means how easily a fortune might be accumulated if one had only reached a starting-point; but as that is the very thing lacking, nothing else signifies —the first step in the ladder being absent, there seems no known method of bridging it. To be sure, the first dollar deposited in a savings-bank is a magnet that will attract other dollars; but to the great army of the poor the first superfluous dollar that is not required by every day's necessities is something "as unattainable as a star in heaven." If any thing is to be saved, it must be done at the expense of present comfort. One must go shabby, and perhaps hungry, to-day, in order that old age and rainy weather may not find one bankrupt. And this the poor are slow to learn, and still slower to act upon. There may not be any rainy season, nor any old age. Why sacrifice to-day for the future? Moreover, it requires no inconsiderable effort of the will to deny one's —lf or one's children those things that seem needful, in order to reap a harvest in a future that may not arrive, especially since this sort of self-denial sometimes results in more loss than profit, for hunger and cold do not conduce to the highest physical or mental development. The chilled blood takes revenge, and the weakened stomach reacts on the brain, so that there would seem to be no ground for the poor to stand upon, except that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.

How can even the comparatively poor take advantage of bargains offered in the market at certain seasons? How much might be saved from next year's expenses if the purse were a little plumper at the time when retailers surrender last season's goods at a discount; and what an aggravation is added when we reflect that our fifty-dollar suits might have been bought for twenty-five dollars last autumn; that we might have secured our lace shawls at a discount of ten per cent. in January, if we had not been obliged to wait till certain payments fell due, and prices waxed higher, having no surplus funds beyond the needs of the hour with which to ward off destruction! The cheap dress materials we felt constrained to purchase have not proved able to bear the season's wear and tear, and yet preserve any semblance of respectability; whereas, if our purse had allowed of a more generous quality, we should have saved the time and expense of dress-making, which is no small item, where the mere cost of making up a cheap material often exceeds the price of the material itself. Moreover, one is often obliged to wear one's best when a second best would be most appropriate, and so entail additional outlay upon the privy purse. One is extravagant from no tendency to prodigality, but because she has no power of economizing — economy being a profession that demands more or less capital. Thus the constant daily effort to make both ends meet works to the destruction of the poor, since it concentrates the mind upon minor things, magnifies mole-hills into mountains, gives the mind certain habits of thought not conducive to its growth, necessitates a continual consideration of the subject of dress, of ways and means, of bread and meat, till the horizon narrows to these limits, and one has eyes, but sees not the fairer prospect beyond, and ears that hear not the divine invitation, "Come up higher."

What earthly time has the poor mother left for intellectual thought, after administering to the needs of her family in the matter of clothes, of upholstery, of general housekeeping, after nicely balancing the month's income with the month's necessities? Let us hope, at least, that there is a heavenly eternity for her, in which she may forget the current prices in wider contemplations. Nobody denies that she is fulfilling her duty; but it is part of the destructive force of poverty that her duty leaves her no unhampered moment which she may employ intellectually, that her thoughts and aspirations and schemes are almost necessarily of the earth.

Though it may be urged that poverty is the making of the man—that it is the motive power through which indolent genius achieves success—that but for its stimulating effects we should miss much that the world could ill afford to miss, yet such instances would seem exceptions. If poverty is the background against which the greatness of a LINNÆUS, of a BUNYAN, or a SHAKSPEARE stands out in glorious relief, it is certain that there are many among us to whom it is an overshadowing cloud, a clog about the feet, a limitation engendering distrust of ourselves. A penniless man respects himself no more than others respect him. Consideration is accorded to wealth not altogether on account of its material benefits, perhaps, but because it represents capacity wisely employed, with no energy run to waste; while the chief solace of poverty lies in the truth that it is not an unalterable fact of nature, like blindness or idiocy, but is susceptible of amelioration. It may be objected that nothing but discontent is to be gained by emphasizing the disagreeable aspects of poverty; but is not discontent the first movement of the mind toward amendment?

SILK.

WHILE half the world are reviling American women for their extravagance in the silks and velvets and laces of the yearly importation, let us pause a moment, not to throw back a word of retort about any extravagance of the other half of the world in broadcloth and cigars and wines, but to look at one of these fabrics, which are so precious that, after all, they are thought worth being reviled about. Listen to the sentimental Frenchman dreaming over it: "Amber," he says, "and yellowing pearls and old lace are the only neighbors that silk loves to have. Noble adornment, never gaudy, but lending a softening charm to too abounding youth, and giving to faded beauty its most touching reflex! Not brilliant, but luminous, with a soft electric light, it naturally harmonizes with the electricity of woman—living tissue, it embraces willingly the living person." How is it possible, then, for women to do any thing else than want a stuff that is pronounced after such a fashion to be the only wear? "It is the gold-color of the Verona silks that in GIORGIONE, at the superb beginning of Venetian art, or in the great TITIAN, the master of masters, adorns with a gilding splendor those rosy blondes of the red-gold hair, the first beauties of the world. Elsewhere, in an age of decline, when Spain and Flanders had paled, that melancholy painter who preferred among all women those pained by experience, the tarnished flower, the fruit ripened too early by the sting, VANDYCK, clothed his inclining and languishing beauties with white silk like a soothing ray of the moon—their hearts still troubled with vain dreams and vain regrets under the soft folds of their moonshiny satins." It is not only by artistic right, though, that this fabric has a peculiar fitness for its feminine wearer; for, unless history is at fault, it owes its very existence to a woman, and its manufacture has in all ages since received a stimulus through feminine agencies, its invention being accredited to the Chinese Empress SILINGSHI, more than four thousand years ago. But long after the Chinese lady rustled and reveled in its electric lustres it remained the exclusive possession of her country—her country which in fact was known to ancient geographers by the name of silk-land, being called Seres and Serica from the word Se, signifying silk; and as it was a death penalty to let the eggs or worms go beyond the borders, they still remained at home; but the raw material was exported to Persia, and some of it dyed in the purple of Tyre, and some of it woven into flowered stuffs at Damascus, and all of it sold for immense sums.

After many years another woman, a Greek, PAMPHILA by name, a native of that beautiful island of the Ægean Sea which produced APELLES and HIPPOCRATES, took her heavy and undyed silken robe, that had been brought from the East, and, raveling its threads with care, rewove them in the rude loom over whose like Penelope and Medea had bent with their women, and by crossing the threads of the warp so as to separate them from those of the woof in quite another manner from the close weaving of the original texture, produced a fine and filmy gauze, whose transparent brilliancy beside the opaque Oriental stuff was the butterfly beside the worm. She doubled, of course, the number of yards in her material by this means, and instituted the manufacture of Coan gauzes, which became a profitable industry in the islands. Perhaps it was in such a tissue that Helen went out to name over the Greek heroes to old Priam on the walls of Troy, "shadowing her beauty with white veils."

Afterward gauzes were brought from Gaza, in Palestine, whence the modern article receives its name. But long before that time PAMPHILA'S occupation had been taken up by the Roman ladies, who wore the rewoven gauzes in that hot weather in which they used to carry balls of amber in their hands for coolness, or let certain harmless snakes creep over their shoulder and breast for the same reason. But even so late as the reign of TIBERIUS the Oriental silks were worn only by women of the greatest patrician houses; they were forbidden to men under any circumstances, though a mixed fabric of silk and wool by-and-by came into promiscuous use; and it was accounted as one of the wanton and effeminate prodigalities of HELIOGABALUS that he had an entire garment of silk. AURELIAN refused his empress a silk gown for the reason that it could only be bought for its weight in gold; yet gold must have been at a very different price then from now, as a pound of silk—the produce of twenty-eight hundred worms—will make sixteen yards of gros de Naples, and is, of course, equal in weight to a pound of gold, which is worth a good deal less than three hundred dollars—not at all an exorbitant price to-day for a handsome dress pattern, as the thousands of purchasers must be agreed, while half our servant-women flaunt in what was too costly a garment for PORTIA, or LIVIA, or FULVIA, or OCTAVIA, since when they bought it they had to pay for it in pearls. Probably CLEOPATRA marked herself for fresh opprobrium in the eyes of all these virtuous wives when her voluptuousness was of such a sort that silken was the very tackle by which were handled those sails of "cloth of gold, of tissue."

But of course the Roman ladies were far from contented with this state of things, and doubtless they made such a pother that MARCUS AURELIUS was glad to send a special embassy to the Chinese to treat upon the subject of silk, and no other; but the embassy failed in its purpose, and silk was still brought overland in small quantities on the slow marches of the caravans.

But in the sixth century, during the reign of JUSTINIAN, a couple of Persian monks, who, while missionaries behind the Chinese Wall, had thoroughly informed themselves concerning the breeding of the silk-worm and the manufacture of its thread, came home, bringing with them a number of the eggs concealed in a hollow cane; and from their efforts at Constantinople sprang the great European production of silk. It is a strange point in history, that of these two ascetics in their coarse gowns and cowls, the rope around their waists, the cross upon their breasts, toiling across the Asian wastes, and leaning on the canes that held the small beginnings of such a loose and lavish luxury as they would have thought exceeded the possibilities even of a DELILAH or a JEZEBEL.

Having at last acquired the great secret, the Romans were for some time its sole possessors in Europe. But afterward the Greeks obtained the manufacture, and kept it for six hundred years, when ROGER, King of Sicily, having sacked the Greek cities, carried off many of the inhabitants to Palermo, where, having recourse for a livelihood to their native industry, they made silken fabrics an article of Sicilian production, and for the first time charmingly variegated them, it is said, with many colors. Soon thereafter the manufacture spread through all the Italian cities, and in Venice the business was so highly esteemed that it was thought to be an honorable employment for a Doge, and one of the great Counts DANDOLO wrote treatises concerning it, and instituted improvements in it. It was of silk that Desdemona's fatal handkerchief was made. "The worms were hallowed that did breed the silk!" cried Othello. And probably so of all other worms thought that army of weavers who presently throughout Europe kept body and soul together by the making of crapes and lustrings, and taffetas and satins, by passing a warp of silk over a weft of hair in the stiff grograms loved of ancient dames, and by changing the old brocades of gold and silver into gorgeous things of silk alone.

Lyons, however, soon became the principal centre of silk manufacture, and there the caprice of DIANA DE POICTIERS in refusing to wear any thing else than either black or white silk largely stimulated the production. Here, in Lyons, during the time of NAPOLEON, JACQUARD brought to perfection a loom for weaving figures of diverse hues on the web. The weavers, of course, regarded the machine with the same distrust as that in which work-people have always held new machinery: they broke it to pieces in the public square, and forbade its future use. "The iron sold for iron, the wood for wood, and its inventor was delivered over to universal ignominy," said poor JACQUARD. But skill got the better of brutality then as always. Other countries adopted the machine, and the Lyonese had reason to rue their folly. Now it is every where used, and the successors of the stupid oafs who broke it up have executed by its means a wonderful piece of work, representing JACQUARD, surrounded by his tools, studying out the construction of the loom. They called this piece of work an "Hommage," and a thousand threads of warp and of woof went to the weaving of each square inch of it.

In the mean time, through fear that the coarse goods of the country should fall into disuse, laws were early passed in England that forbade any but people of quality from wearing silk, though at the time of the marriage of the Princess MARGARET with King ALEXANDER III. of Scotland one thousand knights were clad in silk, and the next day their vestments were changed for others more splendid yet. Such laws, however, being finally repealed, and the manufacture gradually gaining ground, other laws of a protecting nature were passed, so that resort was had to smuggling to the extent of half a million pounds a year. The home produce was still very imperfect and inferior, and models of the improved Italian machinery were obtained by a man at the hazard of his life, he escaping pursuit and gaining a ship that safely landed him on the English shores, where he eventually founded a noble family, and where, as soon as the protecting duties were removed, the English had found it necessary to improve the quality of their production, and did it so vigorously that in less than twenty years they were exporting silken goods to France to the value of two hundred thousand pounds.

Thus we see that the beauty of this delightful fabric has been so fully recognized that it has been held not only precious enough for one to endure reviling on account of its purchase, but to have it at the price of fortunes and the risk of life and limb. It is recognized as approaching the perfection of woven material, since it is the only thing, as a great Southern manufacturer said, that in the spinning rivals a human hair, a woman's hair, long, fine, strong, vibrant, the ideal that silk spinners pursue. Of course, in our own admiration of the article, we speak only from an æsthetic point of view, as we might admire the clouds of heaven and speak of them, could they be woven into tissues. Because it is beautiful we do not imagine that that is any reason why every one should have it, or even long to have it, unless they can have it in fit and corresponding surroundings. We by no means agree with MICHELET, quoted above, when he says: "In crossing our rudest regions, the valleys of the Ardèche, where all is rock, where the mulberry and the chestnut seem to dispense with earth, and live upon air and flint, where low huts of dry stone sadden the eye with their grayish tint, every where I saw at the door, under a sort of arch, two or three charming girls with brown skin, with white teeth, who smiled at the passer-by and spun gold. The passer, whirled away by the coach, exclaimed under his breath, 'What a pity, innocent fairies, that this gold should not be for you! Instead of being disguised by a useless color and disfigured by art, what would it not gain by remaining in its own tint and upon its beautiful spinners! How much better than the grand ladies of the court would this royal tissue become yourselves!'" On the contrary, totally differing from the poetical traveler's view, we think nothing could be more wholly unsuitable to the pretty brown-skinned girls in their narrow huts than any such "royal tissue," even though those huts, for the sake of the silk-worm's existence, be necessarily models of cleanliness; for much of beauty is correlative, so that where painful emotions are excited by its presence they overcome its perception. And if this fine stuff is unsuitable to its neat spinners, how much more out of place must we pronounce it when seen where dust and grease and rude wear and tear corrupt the splendid lustres that are made to be looked at down the length of great saloons, and in the company of objects of stately beauty!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL REDINGOTES.

THE warm redingote of "diagonal," camel's-hair, cashmere, or else tufted camel's-hair, is the first garment that will be donned when cool autumn days require heavier clothing. This comfortable over dress, that so conveniently completes a suit when added to the black or other dark silk skirts of the present season, is very largely imported, and shows but slight changes from those now worn. The new fall redingote is a long close garment that makes the figure look very slender. The long clinging front hangs smoothly without a wrinkle, has two darts, or else is slightly loose and belted, is double-breasted, with two rows of buttons its entire length, has a round revers collar instead of the square and pointed revers now worn, and in many cases this collar is only set on for ornament, while the close high neck of the garment is finished by a still higher ruff of the material of the dress or its trimming. The back of the waist is tight-fitting, having but one seam down the middle, or else three back seams placed wide apart in English fashion, while the drapery of the skirt is most abundant, consisting of many deeply folded loopings in the three back seams; but these draped folds hang so softly that they do not give that bouffant tournure which is now so objectionable. Plain close coat sleeves are universal, but cuffs are more fanciful than the present square cuffs. Pockets also are not merely square bags, but have ornamental flaps, and are set on obliquely, or cut in points, or rounded. Belts of the material or of the trimming fastened behind by large silver clasps are on all redingotes, and few sashes are seen on the early importations. Above every thing else the standing trimming about the neck makes itself conspicuous, as not ruffs alone are worn erect, but also the English collar with standing back and turned-over points in front; and oddest of all is the fancy for turning up the back of wide revers collars, just as gentlemen's overcoat collars are sometimes turned up in the back by accident or carelessness, though certainly never by design.

Soft thick woolen fabrics are used for redingotes, and the garment is made sufficiently warm by lining the waist with flannel or else farmer's satin. The heavy diagonals and armures resembling the cloth used for gentlemen's semi-dress coats are the novelties of the season, and are in especial demand in indigo blue and dark green shades. A dark blue redingote will, it is prophesied, be the popular garment of the autumn; next in favor after blue is slate-color—which is a dark bluish-gray—then olive shades, myrtle green, and bronze. These deep colors will, it is said, be more used than black, though black will by no means be abandoned. Camel's-hair serge with its broad diagonal lines, cashmere roughened by camel's-hair fleece, and the tufted camel's-hair have already been described, and these will be the accepted materials for over dresses, with silk or velvet skirts of the same color. Few suits entirely of silk will be imported; woolen fabrics associated with velvet or silk of corresponding shades are preferred to silk costumes. The trimmings are flat bias bands of velvet or silk, pipings, and cords, put on in the way worn hitherto, with the more fanciful additions on collars, cuffs, and pockets already designated. There is a fancy for carrying the trimming up the back and side seams of the skirt to the waist. Quantities of embroidery are used, especially lines down the front of the garment between the rows of buttons. Swinging cords are seen in abundance. The novelty for trimming camel's-hair and cloth is yak braid, broad, substantial, and similar in appearance to the Hercules braid formerly used. Buttons of metal or pearl are colored to match the fabric they trim. For instance, there are blue steel buttons dark as sapphires, bronzed steel buttons precisely like the cloth with which they are used, and smoked pearl buttons that show all the olive green and olive brown shades. Handsome Japanese buttons, black, with gilt or silver figures, are also shown, and there are quantities of dark oxidized silver buttons, with clasps, buckles, and brooches carved to match.

Among the French redingotes imported for models is one of heavy blue diagonal made tight-fitting, with rounded revers collar turned up behind, black yak braid for trimming, and oxidized silver buttons. A second, of myrtle green cloth, made with tight back and belted front, has a velvet band three inches wide laid on smoothly for trimming, also large swinging ornaments of yak cord for fastening the front. Another of slate-colored camel's-hair has very long double-breasted fronts with two darts; there are three seams behind, making wide side bodies, pockets with square flaps, a thick silk cord, not a mere piping fold, on the edge, and blue steel buttons in two rows down the front, and designating the waist behind. A fourth redingote of olive green armure, also double-breasted, has a high pleated ruff of armure showing a lighter silk lining. A cord of light silk surrounds the garment, and two rows of smoked pearl buttons trim the front. Polonaises of imitation camel's-hair, trimmed with yak braiding and machine stitching in embroidery patterns, are imported in boxes, unmade. Those of dark blue are nearly all disposed of, but the garment can be had in slate, bronze, myrtle, and olive green. Fine real camel's-hair redingotes are ornamented with the rough yak soutache done in medallions, with silk embroidery inside the medallion. Children's redingotes are imported ready-made in precisely the same designs and colors described for ladies. A square sailor collar with a ruff above it is a favorite ornament for wraps and over dresses for young ladies and girls.

NEW MANTILLAS.

When greater warmth is required than the redingote gives, one of the new wraps will be added. Of these the mantilla will probably be the first choice, and will be used to complete suits. It is made of colored camel's-hair, has a round cape back, long straight scarf fronts, with a fanciful pocket in one end, and a high ruff around the neck. Yak braid, yak lace beaded, and a new fringe made of fine silk tape, curled instead of goffered or crimped, are the trimmings.

DOLMANS.

Dolmans of cloth and camel's-hair are largely imported. They show various improvements in shape, and preserve always the long side piece peculiar to them. Some of these have mantilla fronts, and the backs are jacket shape, and far better fitting than when the garment was first worn; others have coat fronts joined to the shortest possible back, and fastened under the long flowing sleeve. Colored cloths and camel's-hair in all the stylish dark tints are more frequently seen in these garments than the once prevalent black cashmere. These dark cloths are almost covered with yak braiding, wool embroidery, silk embroidery, chenille, and jet, until they become so heavy that it is a burden to lift them. The inevitable ruff finishes these wraps, and is made of black repped silk, edged with Tom Thumb fringe. The scarf Dolman, the jacket Dolman, and those with mantilla fronts are found occasionally in fine black cashmere, trimmed expensively with bands of ostrich feathers, voluminous swinging cords, yak lace in guipure designs sprinkled with fine jet beads, while others have the material almost concealed by an abundance of yak braiding or else silk embroidery.

ENGLISH WALKING JACKET.

The English walking jacket again appears, made of warm, rough cloth, nearly half an inch thick, yet as soft as camel's-hair, and known as camel's-hair cloth. It retains its jaunty shape, fitting like a gentleman's coat, with high shoulder seams, double-breasted front, coat collar, and three back seams far apart at the waist, with lappets below the waist, but no postilion pleats. Coat sleeves and pockets with flaps complete this trim, tidy, and withal masculine-looking jacket. It is made of olive, slate, blue, and myrtle green cloths, trimmed with velvet or silk revers, pipings, and cords, and buttons of steel or pearl colored to match the cloth exactly, or else with buttons of oxidized silver beautifully carved. The rough but stylish yak braid is used for trimming also; sometimes there is a row of inch-wide braid, with two narrower ones above, and in other cases the jacket is almost covered with an intricate design done in fine yak soutache. Dark blue, black, and iron gray cloth jackets are shown closer fitting than the ordinary English sacque, and much longer: some are longer in front than behind, and have an extra basque pleated on the back, like a riding-habit waist. Blue gros grain bands with a lighter blue cording on the upper edge trim blue cloth jackets prettily; the buttons are then blue steel or else oxidized silver. When single-breasted jackets are shown, they are usually finished with a sailor collar and a silk ruff. Children's and misses' jackets are shown in precisely the same shapes and colors just noted. Soft beaver cloth jackets are bordered with beaver or seal-skin fur, and have a fur boa sewed around the neck, with tails hanging in front; others have the collar and cuffs of seal-skin or beaver fur. Small muffs of cloth are trimmed with fur to match these jackets.

NEW LINGERIE.

Fall importations of lingerie are now displayed. The new sets of chemisettes and under-sleeves have box-pleated ruffs of white linen edged with real Valenciennes, while outside is a flaring band of doubled linen standing like a collar around the ruff. The linen cuff also flares, and has a pleating inside. To wear with high-throated dresses the chemisette is cut high, and the set costs $6 50; for low-throated, heart-shaped necks they cost $8. The chemisette is merely intended to protect the dress lining, but is neat enough to show when worn with double-breasted dresses. Other sets have more elaborate double box-pleatings with hem-stitched hem, and perpendicular rows of hem-stitching between the pleats. These form a high ruff behind, and have the fronts turned over in revers. Price $6 50. New embroidered sets have a standing collar that flares outward, and is edged with a scroll-work of tiny embroidered bands rolled on the edge, leaving an open space large enough to pass a crayon pencil through. The cuffs slope open in the duchesse shape, and have the same intricate, novel, and indescribable trimming of scroll embroidery. Price $8. These new standing flaring collars, it is said, will supersede the plain English bands, though the latter are shown formed entirely of lengthwise rows of hem-stitching. With wide-cuffed under-sleeves, they cost $6 50. Other linen sets are edged with narrow Valenciennes that is put on slightly full, and is pinched into a tiny pleat between scallops, instead of being fluted. Puffs of sheer lawn are arranged in front, like a jabot, and also on the cuffs.

In colored sets those of dark blue are most striking, and, though a relief of snowy white about the neck and wrists is commendable, it must be admitted that colored lingerie is very fashionable, and that dark blue sells best among the novelties. These have flaring collars of doubled blue percale, high behind, with turned-over fronts, ornamented with a narrow band of white linen stitched near the edge. They are made with a chemisette that is faced with blue, lapped like a double-breasted vest, and fastened by large linen buttons. With wide flaring cuffs to the under-sleeves, the set costs $4. Other percale sets are daintily made with a pleated ruff inside a flaring collar. The tiny ruff is of hair-striped percale, with pointed needle-worked ends, and the collar is of a solid color, also needle-worked. The cuff is similarly shaped. These are brought out in stripes of white with pink, pale blue, gray, and black, and cost from $8 to $12. Some pale gray sheer batiste sets are edged with Valenciennes.

PERSONAL.

MR. S. WELLS WILLIAMS, Secretary of the United States legation in China, has completed his dictionary of the Chinese language. To that work he has contributed the labor of forty years. It contains explanations of 12,500 Chinese characters. Mr. WILLIAMS is now the oldest inhabitant among the foreigners in China.

—Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY, a frequent contributor to the HARPER publications, sends to the Cincinnati Commercial, of which he is the regular correspondent, the following incident at the Rev. Mr. SPURGEON'S church, in London. The two distinguished men first alluded to are said to be Bostonians. "Just before the services two distinguished Americans—one a former official, and intimate friend of the late DANIEL WEBSTER—had been shown into a pew. Presently the pew-opener came and requested that they would take a seat just behind, as 'a distinguished gentleman and lady' had to be placed in the pew they occupied. The two Americans at once complied, and beheld the gentleman and lady escorted to the vacated seats—both black as the ace of spades."

—The Rev. Dr. FOWLER, president of the Northwestern University, has no notion that his daughter shall be entrapped in the net of the fowler. In a recent sermon, on the occasion of laying the corner-stone of the South Evanston M. E. Church, he commended the idea of having a basement and parlors in the church for social purposes. In answer to the objection that boys and girls would do their sparking at the church, the doctor said: "I say, Amen. I have a daughter whom I cherish dearer than the apple of my eye. When she is of suitable age, I had rather my daughter would be courted in the house of God than in a theatre."

—Mr. ANTHONY MUSGRAVE, the newly appointed Governor of South Australia, was sworn into office at Adelaide on the 9th of June. He is represented as being a man of great executive ability, and his American wife, a daughter of DAVID DUDLEY FIELD, is alluded to in eulogistic terms by the provincial press.

—The estate of JOHN STUART MILL, which is considerable, goes entirely to his step-daughter, Miss HELEN TAYLOR, who will have the house at Avignon, a large income for a single lady, and the absolute disposal of all interest in her benefactor's copyrights and posthumous publications.

—Mrs. MARY CLEMMER AMES'S new book will be called Ten Years in Washington: Life and Scenes in the National Capital as a Woman sees them. A woman so bright and clever as Mrs. AMES, so posted in fact and fertile in fancy, ought to make, and doubtless will make, the best book about Washington, its men and things, that has been done on that city.

—The Rev. Miss FANNIE W. ROBERTS, who has been licensed to preach, and has a church in Kittery, has been given authority by the Governor and Council to solemnize marriages in Maine. And she is the first woman who has ever been charged with that woful responsibility in the State of Maine.

—Mrs. HENRY R. CHRISTIAN performed at Augusta, Georgia, a few days since, an act so cool and courageous as to place it among the pluckiest things of the kind we have read as having been done by a woman. At the boarding-house of Mrs. BERNARD a burglar, supposed to be one of the colored waiters, secreted himself in the rooms of Mrs. CHRISTIAN, who heard during the night noises in her daughter's room, and woke up her daughter several times to ask her if she was restless. At length, toward morning, Mrs. CHRISTIAN dozed lightly for a short while, and awoke at the sound of a rustling noise to see the obscure but yet perceptible figure of a man, some five or six feet from the foot of the bed, and at the left, on his knees, fumbling in a dress that lay at the foot of a lounge by the window, just opposite the door of the room entering into the hall. Startled but not terrified, the courageous lady realized the situation at once, and shouting to her daughter to awaken her, and telling her to cry out for help, she herself screaming "thieves!" flew out of her bed, and boldly rushed at the daring burglar. He stood still for a moment, when she seized him by the arm. He, not uttering a word, hurled her from him with all his force, and broke for the window, and began working to unlatch the closed blind. Nothing daunted, and saved from falling by her trunk at the foot of the bed, the brave-spirited lady again rushed to catch hold of the burglar. She could not distinguish his features, but she had a clear idea of his size, and could discern the flash of his eyes. This time she caught him by the suspender. He had succeeded in getting one of the blinds open by this time, and desperately sprang through the window, and just outside was a tree, into which he landed. His suspender broke in her hand, and as he lit in the branches of the tree he steadied himself by catching the window-sill with one hand. By this time some of the people in the house and in the neighborhood were aroused. Hopeful of holding him until assistance could come, the lady seized the hand momentarily clinging to the window-sill, but was unable to hold it. The burglar dropped to the ground, scrambled over the fence, flew into a gully back of the house, and managed to escape, being soon after followed by two policemen, who made the arrest of the waiter SCOTT, whose foot just fitted the tracks made by the burglar, who carried of the pocket-book of Mrs. CHRISTIAN, containing fifty dollars, which has not yet been recovered.

—The Shah of Persia was the recipient of one present from the city of Paris which would gladden the heart of any connoisseur in books, viz., M. ALPHAND'S Promenades de Paris, a magnificent work, published by M. ROTHSCHILD, upon the production of which 700,000 francs were expended. It is a large folio, bound in exquisite style by LENÈGRE.

—Contrasting the public character and private being of most authors, the London Saturday Review says: "The lively novelist is a taciturn, morose kind of person, ever ready to start topics of a grave and depressing nature. The poet whose songs are full of that delicious melancholy that makes them so divinely sad is a rubicund, rosy-gilled gentleman, brisk, middle-aged, comfortable, particular as to his wines, and prone to personal gossip and feeble humor. The lady novelist who sails very near the wind, and on whom the critics are severe by principle, is as quiet as a Quakeress in her conversation, and demure as a nun in her bearing. The sour feminine essayist who finds every thing wrong and nothing in its place has a face like the full moon, and looks as if she fed on cream and butter." It is conjectured that the lady who sat for the last etching was Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE.

—Should Queen VICTORIA attend the marriage of her son, the Duke of Edinburgh, in St. Petersburg, in January next, it will be the first instance in which a royal personage has visited a foreign country to witness and honor such a ceremonial.

—Mr. BAIRD, a great man among the iron-masters of Scotland, has paid over to certain trustees, to be called "The Baird Trust," two millions and a half of dollars to be applied to religious purposes in connection with the Church of Scotland. Instead of tarrying for a further growth of Baird, he preferred to administer on his own estate, and see that the matter was put on a proper basis during his lifetime.

—Mr. DONALDSON, who still adheres to his purpose of going on the transatlantic balloon excursion, made a trial trip in his little paper boat from New York to Long Branch. It required five hours to make the voyage, and it was an entire success. He didn't ship a spoonful of water until the surf at Long Branch gave him a fine old damper. The steamer Plymouth Rock passed him on the trip, and the band struck up that anthem known as Paddle your own Canoe.

—The most agreeable communication Mr. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN has made to the South since he became a British subject was made a few days since to Mrs. CAMPBELL and Mrs. CHAMBERS, of Augusta, Georgia, that they were heirs to twelve millions of dollars, inherited from the estate of Rennaleau. The ladies were informed that there would be no obstacle in the way of obtaining possession of the property, and they have for that purpose started on their cheerful pilgrimage to France.

—An old soldier is Sir JOHN FORSTER FITZGERALD, colonel of the Eighteenth Royal Irish regiment—the oldest in the British army, if not the oldest soldier in the world. He is now the senior general, and has seen eighty years of service, his commission as ensign bearing date October 29, 1793.

—The son of ALFRED TENNYSON is to be made a baronet. The old gentleman seemed to think that to be called "Sir TENNYSON" would not add much to his personal comfort, his fame, or his bank account. "Sir ALFRED," though, has a more musical sound than "Sir Galahad," or "Sir Bedivere," or any of the poetical "Sirs" to whom the Laureate has given so delightful life.

—Mr. Secretary BELKNAP, abandoning during the torrid season arsenals and artillery, has gone into antiquarianism, and obtained a huge number of manuscript letters and orders of General WASHINGTON—among them his general order book, in which all orders are written in his own hand. One of these orders gives details for the fortification of West Point, including the names of the men employed on the work; and another in reference to profanity in the army, expressing his disapprobation of it in strong language. The secretary will have these papers and orders prepared for proper publication.

—Dr. HANS VON BULOW proposes to shine upon this country during the season of 1874–75. He is about fifty years of age, and has long been recognized as one of the foremost piano-forte players, while as a conductor and composer he deservedly takes high rank. Indeed, his only rival is RUBINSTEIN, who, while far surpassing VON BULOW in composition, is little, if at all, his superior as an executant. Of the two, VON BULOW is probably the more generally popular, as he does not confine his selections exclusively to the works of the classical masters.

Designs for Collar and Cravat in White and Point Lace Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS embroidery may be worked on Swiss muslin or nansook. After drawing the design on linen, baste the material first, and then the point lace braid for the outer edge of the collar, on the foundation, and between both edges of the braid work the lace stitches in the form of a cross seam with thread, but without passing the needle through the material. Run the fine outlines of the open-work arabesques with embroidery cotton, work in the lace stitches, and either overcast or button-hole stitch the outlines. Work the parts that appear all white in the design in straight satin stitch. After finishing the embroidery work picots into the outer edge of the collar, as shown by the illustration, letting a small twisted thread loop stand for each picot. Cut away the material underneath the lace stitches. The cravat is worked in a similar manner.

WOMANLY DIGNITY.

THERE are various kinds of dignity, and if some are more exasperating than others, some are very lovely, and among the greatest charms of womanhood. There is, in particular, that soft dignity which belongs to women who are affectionate by nature and timid by temperament, but who have a reserve of self-respect that defends them against themselves as well as against others. These have a quiet dignity, tempered by much sweetness of speech and manner, that is the loveliest kind of all, and the most subtle as well as the most beautiful. They are like the lady in Comus, and seem to cast the spell of respect on all with whom they are associated. No man, save of the coarsest fibre, and such as only physical strength can control, could be rude to them in word or brutal in deed; for there is something about them, very indefinite but very strong withal, which seems to give them special protection from insolence; and a loving woman of soft manners, whose mind is pure and who respects herself, is armed with a power which none but the vilest can despise. This is the woman who gets a precise obedience from her servants without exacting it, and whose children do not dream of disputing her wishes; who, though so gentle and affable, stops short of that kind of familiarity which breeds contempt, and with whom no one takes a liberty. For this one can scarcely give a reason. She would not ramp or rave if she was displeased, she would not scold, she could not strike; but there is a certain quality in her which we may not be able to formularize, yet which would make us ashamed to pass beyond the boundaries of the strictest respect, and which restrains others less consciously critical than ourselves as certainly as fear. It is the respect we pay to those who respect themselves, the consideration and honor which all real purity of nature demands and obtains. This is womanly dignity in its loveliest aspect, and the kind we all desire to see in women, whom it would not harden nor render less than loving.

There is another kind of dignity—the grim kind, repellent and iron-bound—whereby you feel yourself pushed back before you have made an advance—where, indeed, the whole rule of life seems to be to repel on all sides. Women afflicted with this species of dignity are always on the look-out for assaults, and consequently are always thrusting their shield of defense in your face. You do not want to trouble them in their dignity; you are not thinking of invading that or this sacred province; yet you are suddenly met by an assumption of offended majesty which makes you feel as if you had received a blow. Some playful word, some laughing and ridiculous accusation or quite innocent allusion, and you are treated as a misdemeanant who has grievously offended against good manners and womanly dignity. There are some women constitutionally incapable of understanding any thing like playfulness, and who can make no distinction between fun and impertinence, a laughing humor and taking liberties. They wrap themselves up in a robe of majesty, and resent as rudeness any homely touch which ignores their stately drapery. They are women about whose affairs you know absolutely nothing, though you may be their friend of a lifetime. You never hear them tell the most harmless anecdote frankly, but always with a severe air of mystery and something hidden; you never hear them discuss the least important subject freely. You would not dare to ask them, friends as you are, things which you would ask a comparative stranger without hesitation, and they never volunteer information. They would consider it a liberty if you wanted particulars as to the treatment they had pursued, say, in such or such a case of illness; and they are far too dignified to help the inexperienced or their youngers by their own acquired store. One often wonders what these women are as mothers with young daughters to instruct, and whether their dignity can unbend so far as to give lessons to girls who have every thing to learn. They are so grim, so far removed from any of the kindly familiarities, the maternal tendernesses, of ordinary women that we find it hard to believe there can ever be moments in which, or persons to whom, they can condescend to be natural. Akin to these, but not identical, are the coldly dignified women—those who keep themselves apart from their world for want of warmth to coalesce. They are not so aggressive as the grim ones, and not so apt to take offense, or so keen to see an insult where none was meant; but they are as impenetrable and as impervious to humor. The difference between the two kinds lies in the temper—the dignity of the grim being dignity soured by ill humor, that of the cold being dignity hardened by indifference. Neither is admirable, and both are common; and woe to the luckless man, most probably of a jovial, weak-backed nature, who has fallen into the power of either. He has to expiate by a life of self-suppression for the one part, and of perpetual stumbling into offense for the other, the terrible mistake he made in early youth, when a girl's cold self-possession was called by a finer word, and no account taken of the time when a just-endurable characteristic would have become exaggerated.

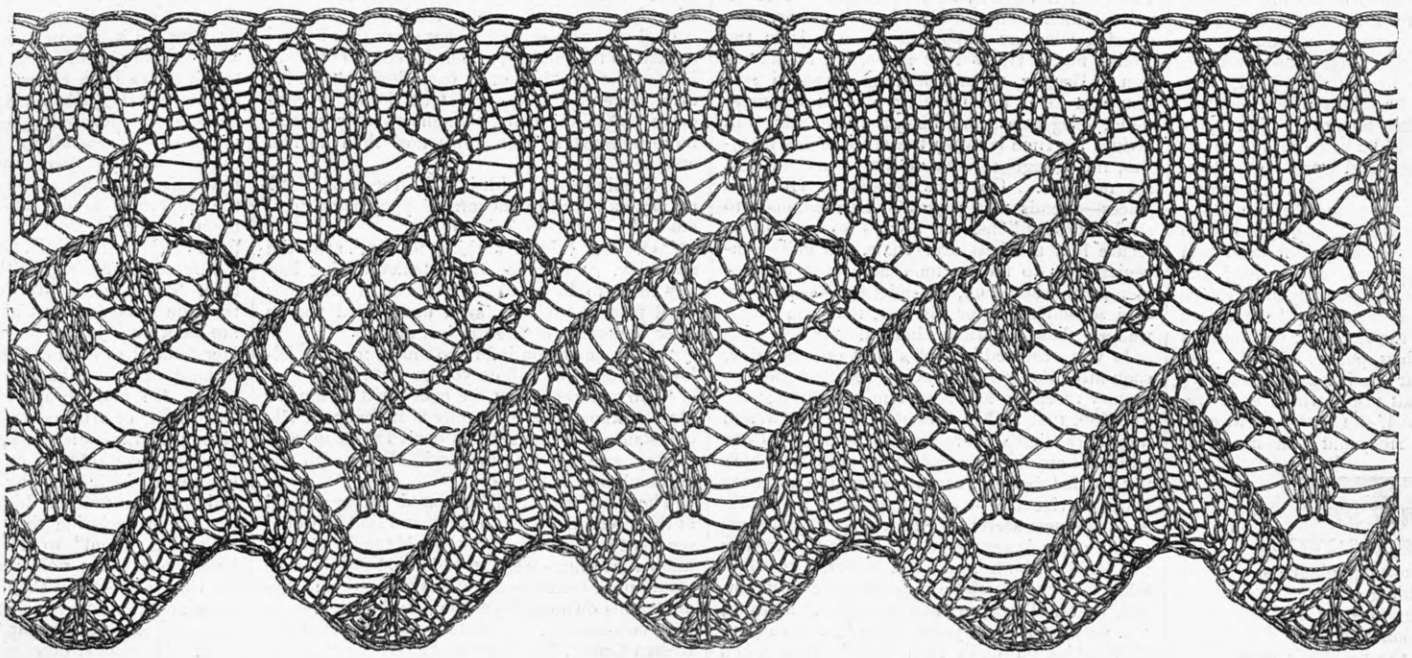
The fact is, useful as womanly dignity is as a womanly possession, it can be carried to excess, and from a virtue become a vice. So long as it is an honest defense-work against the rough assaults of superior strength it is both good and fair; but when it assumes to be more than this it becomes an exaggeration, and, as such, ridiculous. There is no law by which women can be exempt from a share in the troubles and sorrows of human life, and even their dignity can not always protect them from things that override all but nature. Still, it is a valuable possession, and women had better have too much of it than too little; for, though too much renders them absurd, too little makes them contemptible, and between the two there is no doubt as to which is worse.



KNITTED EDGING FOR SCARFS, SHAWLS, ETC.

FICHU IN THE SHAPE OF A THREE-CORNERED SHAWL.

Knitted Edging.

THIS edging is suitable for trimming scarfs, shawls, veils, etc. It is worked with black or colored sewing silk, or split zephyr worsted, and coarse steel knitting-needles, lengthwise, in rounds going back and forth. Begin the edging with a foundation of the requisite length, which should be divisible by 12, as the pattern figure, which is constantly repeated, requires 12 st. (stitch); but for the close sides of the edging cast on several st. more and work as follows: 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—∗ T. t. o. (thread thrown over), 11 p. (purled), t. t. o., 1 p.; repeat from ∗. In the course of the work this repetition from ∗ will not be further referred to. Care should be taken that always the first st. after ∗ should come on the last st. of the pattern figure of the preceding round, and that the t. t. o. are always counted as st. 3d round.—∗ 1 k. (knit plain), t. t. o., 5 k., k. 3 together (knit 3 st. together; to do this slip the first and second st. as if going to knit them together, k. the third st., and draw the second and first st. over the third), 5 k., t. t. o. 4th round.—All purled. 5th round.—∗ 6 k., k. 3 together, 5 k. 6th round.—All purled. 7th round.—∗ 5 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 5 k. 8th round.—∗ 3 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 4 p. 9th round.—∗ 3 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., 1 st. n. (narrowed; to do this always slip the next st., k. the following st., and draw the slipped st. over), 2 k. 10th round.—∗ 3 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 4 p. 11th round.—∗ 4 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together, 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 k. 12th round.—∗ 4 p., t. t. o., p. 3 together (to do this insert the needle from the back in the second and first st. and slip them together, then p. the third st., and draw the second and first st. over the third), t. t. o., 5 p. 13th round.—∗ 3 k., k. 2 together, 3 k., t. t. o., 1 st. n., 2 k. 14th round.—∗ 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 5 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 2 p. 15th round.—∗ 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together, 1 k., t. t. o., 1 st. n. 16th round.—∗ P. 3 together (the first time work, instead of this, only 1 p.), t. t. o., 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o.; at the end of the round p. 2 together. 17th round.—∗ 10 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o.; finally, 1 k. 18th round.—∗ 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together; finally, 1 p. 19th round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., k. 3 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k.; at the end of the round, however, k. 2 together instead of 1 k. 20th round.—∗ 2 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 8 p. 21st round.—∗ 1 k., t. t. o., 1 st. n., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o. 22d round.—∗ 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o., p. 3 together, t. t. o., 2 p. 23d round.—∗ 5 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 5 k. 24th round.—∗ P. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p. 25th round.—∗ K. 3 together (the first time only k. 2 together), t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o.; finally, 1 k. 26th round.—∗ 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 5 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 2 p.; finally, 1 p. 27th round.—∗ 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 7 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together; finally, 1 k. 28th round.—∗ P. 3 together, t. t. o., 9 p., t. t. o., finally, 1 p. 29th round.—∗ 1 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together, 5 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 2 k. 30th round.—∗ 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o., 7 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together; at the end of the round p. 3 together instead of 2. 31st round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 7 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together, 1 k. 32d round.—∗ P. 3 together (the first time only p. 2 together), t. t. o., 9 p., t. t. o.; finally, 1 p., instead of t. t. o. 33d round.—∗ 10 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o. 34th round.—All purled. 35th round.—All knit plain. 36th round.—All purled. 37th round.—∗ T. t. o., k. 2 together. 38th round.—All purled. 39th round.—Always k. 2 together; in order to form very long stitches in doing this, wind the thread three times around the needle. This round completes the edging. Cast off, always drawing the preceding st. over the next st.; the last loop is sewed fast in order to prevent the chain from ripping. Stretch the edging on an ironing-board, or any other hard foundation, with the wrong side uppermost. Then moisten the edging with a wet sponge several times, and separate it from the foundation when it is completely dry.

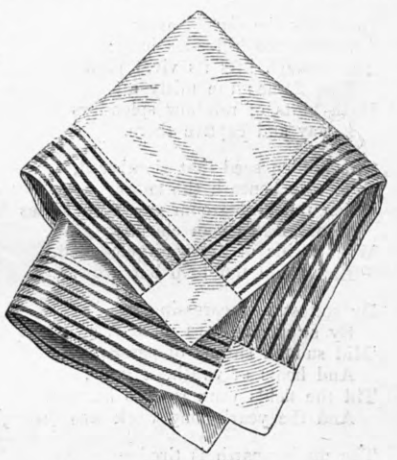
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 48-55.

Fichu in the Shape of a Three-cornered Shawl.

THIS fichu is made of light sea green crêpe de Chine, lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide, and lace an inch and a quarter wide. It is eighteen inches long through the middle, measuring from the upper (bias) edge to the under corner, and including the lace, and each of the other (straight) sides is twenty-five inches and three-quarters long, including the lace. The outer edge of the fichu is trimmed with lace insertion, which is joined with a strip of crêpe de Chine of the same width edged with lace. On the upper edge this trimming is turned over on the outside in the manner of a small collar, which should be considered in sewing on the lace and insertion.

Batiste Handkerchief with Colored Border.

THIS handkerchief is of fine batiste, bound on the edge with brown and white striped batiste. The corners of the border are made of double white batiste. These handkerchiefs with colored borders are very fashionable at present, especially for morning dress.



BATISTE HANDKERCHIEF WITH COLORED BORDER.

Gros Grain Mantelet.

THIS black gros grain mantelet is trimmed with folds of the material, guipure lace and insertion, and loops and ends of black gros grain ribbon. Cut away the material underneath the insertion. On the wrong side of the mantelet, in the back at the bottom of the waist, fasten a belt, which is closed in front with hooks and eyes. The loose coat sleeve has a wide square cuff, trimmed with a band of guipure insertion, and edged with guipure lace. Two loops of black gros grain ribbon, with ends of unequal length, are set on the back of the mantelet.

GROS GRAIN MANTELET.

THE BEE.

THE luxury of all summer's sweet sensation is to be found when one lies at length in the warm, fragrant grass, soaked with sunshine, aware of regions of blossoming clover and of a high heaven filled with the hum of innumerable bees. It is that happy hum—which seems to the closed eyes as if the silent sunbeams themselves had found a voice, and were brimming the bending blue with music as they went about their busy chemistry—that gives the chief charm to the moment; for it tunes the mind to its own key, the murmuring expression of all pleasant things, the chord of sunshine and perfume and flowers. And it is, indeed, the sound of a process scarcely less subtle than the sunbeam's own, of that alchemy by which the limpid drop of sweet insipidity at the root of any petal is transformed to the pungent flavor and viscid drip of honey. Beyond doubt there is no such eminent sound of gladness in all the world as the buzzing of a bee. It sings of work as a joy and privilege; of a home of plenty and contentment. And although this burly rover is not our little bee of the hive, but his saucy country cousin, the song of the one is scarcely sweeter than that of the other, while they blend into rarest unison. And well may both be sweet: it is such a pleasant thing to live. There is the hive to furnish; there is the dear nest underground. They forget yesterday's rain, they fear not to-morrow's frost; the sun is so warm to-day on their little brown backs, and here is such store of honey. It is true the humblebee is much the most dazzling—he has the prestige of size, moreover; but the other may find some favor in his new bronze and gold armor, and his coarse velvet mantle. There are few creatures that can afford to labor in half such array as that, but when the work is so nice, one's dress must correspond. It would never do to rumple round rose leaves black as a beetle, and expect not only to be heaped with delicacies, but to be intrusted with love-tokens. One can not be so splended as the moths and sphinxes, who have nothing to do all summer but to lay eggs among the petals that their offspring may devour them; no, there is work to be done. But though one toils, one has a dignity to maintain; one remembers it readily when he has been made the insignia of royalty; when kings have worn his effigy one can not forget that he has himself been called the Winged Monarch of the Flowers. See him now, as he hovers over the small white clover on which he alights, whose sweets are within reach of his little proboscis; or, lost in that great bluebell, swings it with his motion and his melody; or burrows deep in the heart of a rose, never rolling there, as it has erroneously been said, but, collecting the pollen with his pincers, swims over the flower while brushing it into the baskets of his hinder legs, and then lights again for a fresh fare, till, laden and regaled, he loudly issues forth, dusty with treasure; the Merovingian kings, who powdered their heads and their beards with gold, were no finer fellows than he. But a few months' wear and tear will suffice to tarnish him. By-and-by the little body will be battered and rusty, the wings will be ragged and worn. One day, as he goes home heavily burdened, if no sailing blue-winged swallow have skimmed him up long ago, the flagging flight will fail, a breeze will be too much for him, a rain-drop will dash him down; he will fall, and some garden-toad, the focal length of whose vision is exactly the distance to which he can dart his tongue, will see a tired bee blundering across the sky, and will make a morsel of him, honey-bag, pollen, and all. Yet that is in the future, far outside the focal length of any bee's vision—that vision which finds creation so fair, and himself the centre of it, each rose made for him to rifle, and welcome every where.

HARVEST.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

SPRING hath the morning gladness,
The hope of budding leaves;
And Summer in her queenly lap
The wealth of noon receives;
But Autumn hath the twilight's crown,
The joy of garnered sheaves.

Where late in stately phalanx
The ribboned corn was seen,
Where the golden wheat was waving,
And the oats in silver sheen,
And where the buckwheat snow was white,
Hath the reaper's sickle been.

In clouds the purple aster
Infolds the hill-sides bare;
The sumach lifts its vivid plumes
Like flame; the misty air
Hath hints of rainbow splendors
Estray and captive there.

The hidden seed that slumbered,
So safe beneath the snow,
When the bridegroom sun with kisses
Made earth's wan cheek to glow,
With thrills of life was quickened,
And could not help but grow.

By softest love-caressing,
By sweetest drops of dew,
'Mid sudden storms of passion
And heats of wrath, it grew,
Till the fields were ripe to harvest,
And the year's long work was through.

The mother-earth is tired—
No child on mother-breast
Lies soft till after birth throes;
Toil giveth right to rest;
And all the joy of harvest
With the peace of God is blessed.

A FEUDAL LORD.

GULL'S NEST is a little town in a New England State, on the borders of a bright, flashing New England river, and under the shadow of a famous New England mountain—a town distinguished as a model of New England cleanliness and beauty, and famous as a home of New England thrift and industry. The white rows of cottages, the blooming door gardens, the cozy front porches, the shaded walks, the whirring factories, the busy people, all the attributes of the conventional New England village, have in Gull's Nest been brought to a higher than ordinary degree. Overlooking this happy village, as the baronial castles used to overlook the feudal homesteads in the mediæval ages, is one great family mansion, with broad manor grounds. In this mansion lives Honorable Simeon Gull, after whose father and grandfather the town was named. Mr. Gull is Congressman from this district, and carries the borough in his pocket. The great factory on the northern end of the town, which is clattering day and night, is his, and the four hundred men who work in it are his. The smaller concern at the lower bend of the river, where three hundred men and women work, is owned also by Mr. Gull, men and all. The neat hotel that fronts the public square is called Gull's Hotel, in honor of its proprietor. The handsome National Bank opposite is in great part the property of the Hon. Mr. Gull; and the railroad which has just been finished counts Mr. Gull at the head of its list of directors. Gull is, indeed, the main element of Gull's Nest. He owns it, he votes it, he goes to Congress on it; and although Gull has never distinguished himself on the floor or in committee-rooms, and has never voted against dishonest measures or advocated honest ones, he brings home to Gull's Nest, whenever the session is over, a record which Gull's Nest accepts with pride, and on which she elects him again. The Hon. Mr. Gull himself is one of the "most remarkable" men in the world. You would never suspect him for a shrewd business man, tight, sharp, grinding, if you had enjoyed, even ordinarily, his acquaintance and conversation. On the contrary, you would conclude that he is a rather jovial, generous fellow, if you found him among his cronies at the town-hall—very free and very sociable, considering the right he has to be proud and unbending, if he chooses, in the presence of common men. He is a portly man, with a great breadth of chest and watch-chain, that is sure to attract your attention the first thing. Then he wears a high shirt collar, which you are likely to notice next; and lastly, his head, bald in front, and sloping somewhat disagreeably to the top, is something to look at. Then, for a wonder, he has a mellow sort of voice, which seldom asserts its full power, considering what an important voice it is in the affairs, not of Gull's Nest alone, but of the nation. Usually, when Congress is not in session and he is not traveling with a Congressional delegation somewhere, the Hon. Mr. Gull divides his time between the office of his factories, the lounging-room of the town-hall, and his mansion. He finds friends at all these places—friends who assent so harmoniously to all his propositions, are always so anxious to secure him the best arm-chair, the most convenience as to the spittoon, and, even if other men have to stand up, to tender him the services of a second chair for his feet, that one might well say these are friends indeed.

It was observed in Gull's Nest one morning, soon after Congress had adjourned, and the customary reception had been tendered Gull at the mansion, that he had brought home a new and unusually eligible secretary. The previous one had been appointed consul somewhere, Gull having decided that he was really of no use, not even being serviceable in campaign times as a talker. The new secretary was a bright, handsome young man of twenty-six, and was introduced to the Gullites, both lords and ladies, with high-whispered commendations by the great Gull himself. "Mr. Tracy, my new secretary," he said; "a very promising young man, I assure you, if Washington don't ruin him." And when Mr. Gull spoke of Washington ruining any one he boldly projected himself, with his chest and watch-chain, into the listener's notice, as proof of the evident proposition that Washington had not ruined him. Mr. Tracy, being handsome, agreeable, young, and patronized by such a powerful friend, became a great favorite with lords and ladies alike, and indeed it would be hard to say which sex seemed most desirous to do him honor. Matters progressed very comfortably for the new secretary during the long Congressional recess, and he felt what a pleasant lot was his to be among such good people, and under the wing of so good a master.

One bright summer day, as Tracy sat superscribing a few private documents in the office at Mr. Gull's mansion, a rough, honest-looking yeoman touched cap to him at the window.

"You are Mr. Tracy?" he asked.

"Yes."

"I'm baggageman at the dépôt. You've seen me there, I guess!"

"I believe I have. Glad to see you again. What can I do for you?"

"Well, Sir, I'll tell you. Mr. Gull's gone and discharged me, and I'd like to be put back again."

"Mr. Gull discharged you! I don't think he attends to such matters, my good man."

"Oh yes, he does. He owns the biggest interest in the road, and he had it done, anyway."

"What had you done to deserve discharging?"

"I've done just one thing, Sir—no other that I can think of. I talked against his re-election, and joined the Anti-Mogul Club that's opposed to him."

"Oh, nonsense!" ejaculated Tracy. "Mr. Gull would not have discharged you for that."

"Wouldn't he? Now tell me how long he'd let a workman stay in any of his factories that voted against him. Very long, eh?"

"He might consider that a rather ungrateful proceeding," replied Tracy; "but as baggageman at the dépôt, it is utterly unlikely that he would inquire or care what your politics were."

"But he almost owns the railroad too. I'm just as much in his employ there as if I was in his factory. I tell you, Mr. Tracy, it's Mr. Gull's doings that I'm discharged, and I'd like you to try and have me put back."

"I'll speak to Mr. Gull about it."

He did speak to Mr. Gull about it, and naturally Mr. Gull knew nothing whatever of the circumstance, had nothing whatever to do with the discharge, and really had so much to do just now that he could not go into the matter. Sorry, but every discharge was attributed to him, justly or unjustly, and he doubted not the discharge in this case was for some good reason. When the ex-baggageman asked what success of Tracy the next day, and received a summary of Gull's reply, he said:

"He's commenced on me, and he's going to hound me away from here. You see!" And he departed, desperate. Tracy saw him a few days afterward lingering about the dépôt, and spoke to him, but he muttered something very ungraciously, and slunk away. He was heard some time after that denouncing Gull in terms that chilled the souls of the friends of that good man, calling him a thief, and loudly charging him with certain rascalities in office, to whispers of which Gull's Nest had long studiously closed its ears. This ex-baggageman had a family, among them a very bright and pretty daughter, and this fact alone prevented the outraged friends of Gull from thrashing him for such outspoken denunciations. Gull of course heard of these loud charges against him, but being the heaviest pew-holder in the chief village church, he turned up his eyes emotionally over the wretched abuse, and was commended for his Christian forbearance by the lowly minister in his next sermon. But nobody helped the ex-baggageman or his family, and he was fast going to the dogs, because no one would employ him. "And I won't emigrate!" he had said repeatedly. "Gull can't make me emigrate. I won't leave here for him." So naturally he became poorer and worse, and became in less than six months the desperate character of the town, one whom all avoided, and at whose name children were frightened.

"I think I've made an example of him!" said Gull, one morning, to his secretary, when the subject of the ex-baggageman came up.

"An example of him!" said Tracy, in surprise. "Surely you have had nothing to do with the unhappy downfall of this poor fellow?"

Gull was nettled, and rather sorry that he had spoken so thoughtlessly; but he could not, with his position and influence, back down before his own secretary. No, no, Gull never backed down before any body, though probably he was more tempted to back down now than he had ever been.

"Nothing to do with it!" he repeated. "I am not expected to encourage opposition voters, am I?"

"Of that I have nothing to say," said the secretary. "But you once denied having had any thing to do with the discharge of this poor devil from the dépôt, and I understood you to infer something differently just now!"

"Pray don't you infer too much, my fine fellow. Inferences will do you no good."

"Do you know that the poor devil is ruined? Do you know that his family is in indigent circumstances, his daughter is denied work in your factory, and his wife lies seriously ill with the accumulation of distress?"

The good man Gull appeared sorely grieved at this dreadful state of affairs, and said he would see what he could do about it. He really did not know that things were so bad; and although he would not encourage a factious opposition to him among his own employés, he hoped he was not a hard task-master. He sent fifty dollars to the distressed family, but the wretched ex-baggageman returned it with an insulting message. Upon the strength of this Mr. Gull became very wrathy at his secretary, and soon took occasion to inform him that his services were no longer required. Tracy took his departure very graciously, and removed his baggage to a humble widow's home that very day. Strangely enough, he would not leave the village. He had education and resources that would insure him success any where; but it was apparent ere long that some unusual attraction attached Mr. Tracy to Gull's Nest, and he at once sought for new employment among its business men. He knew that Mr. Gull had frequently spoken with high commendation of his clerkly abilities to his friends, and to these he applied. At the bank, of which Mr. Gull was president, they informed him very coldly that there was nothing for him to do. At the hotel, of which Mr. Gull was chief proprietor, Mr. Gull's previous recommendations were of no weight. It seemed, indeed, that dismissal from Mr. Gull's service had shut every door against him. "Evidently," thought Tracy, "Gull has supplemented his first recommendations." The ex-secretary was a lawyer, and had, early in his residence at Gull's Nest, procured a license at the bar of that district. He concluded to practice upon it; but lo! his first petty case was decided against him, and against the evidence, by the chief Gull's Nest judge. Tracy's second case was similarly decided. Could Gull have secured even the judiciary? Was such a thing possible in free America, in learned and liberty-loving New England? Tracy dared to believe so, and it was in that belief that he saw the object of a new reform before him. "Here is work for a new reformer," said he; and he prepared to do the work of reform himself. He commenced writing for the little country sheet that represented the opposition. He commenced guardedly, and won favor with the editor, and even created some little talk among the town-hall loungers by his general views; but he soon discovered that every thing he said about Gull by name, or about Gull ironically, as "our honorable member," or about Gull in any capacity, unless it was highly complimentary, was stricken out.

"What objection can you, as the opposition organ, have to saying this?" asked Tracy, in amazement, of the editor.

"Well, you see, Gull is too strong. He'd libel us, and the judge would stick it on like wax, too, or he'd demand a retraction, and we'd have to give it, or he'd make the trustees stop our advertising—altogether he'd make it dreadful hot for us."

There was no room for the reform here. Then Tracy commenced writing letters to a great metropolitan newspaper, explaining the despotism of Gull, describing in quaint language the imperial supremacy which Gull exercised over his own little borough. A few of these letters reached Gull's Nest, and caused some dismay among the town-hall people, and made Gull swear rather profanely; and after that the newspapers containing them ceased coming. The postmaster, who owed his appointment to Gull, said the "infernal sheet hadn't oughter be allowed through the mails," and evidently it wasn't after that, for none of them were delivered to subscribers at that post-office. Even the little news-stand, where Tracy usually obtained his copy twenty-four hours late, failed to obtain them any more, and the news-dealer said it was too much trouble to send for only one copy. There was still a chance, however, that a ray of this bright light might penetrate benighted Gull's Nest, and Tracy followed it up. Some of the blows were so ponderous that the New York, Boston, and Washington papers discussed them editorially. Then Gull sent for Tracy, and intimated to him that he was kicking against the pricks, and had better "come round."

"You'll get the worst of it if you don't," said he.

"How do you mean 'come round?'" asked Tracy.

"Come over to my side," replied Gull. "Follow my fortunes, and make a man of yourself."

"I will follow my own for the present," said Tracy.

He would hardly confess to himself how great was the temptation to accept again the friendship of the great man. He saw in a renewed friendship the certain attainment of the one great object for which he had remained in Gull's Nest. Not the working out of the reform—oh no—the winning of a young girl's fair hand. For, like all great measures that have bettered the world, or damaged it, a woman was in it. The particular woman just now was the handsome daughter of Gull's bank cashier. Tracy had met her at the first reception to Mr. Gull, had improved his opportunities by frequent calls, and had progressed so far, seeming at that time to be under the special supervising care of the great man, that soft words had succeeded to soft looks, and the pressure of hands had been already improved upon by the pressure of lips. The discharge from the Honorable Mr. Gull's employ had made a difference, however, in the course of their true love. The cashier's lovely daughter had declared that she loved him just as much, but she could not see what objection he could have to Mr. Gull. Her father had been cashier of his bank for ever so long, and there had been no trouble between them. He had always been Congressman, or Legislator, or trustee, or something from that village, and she did not see what objection to it Mr. Tracy could have; and when Tracy had exhausted his logic in trying to show her where the evil lay, she crushed his argumentative spirit entirely by declaring that she could not see it. "Coming round" would have made all easy here, would have rendered green and pleasant his village life—why should he hold back on a mere abstract principle of right and reform? It was such a sore test that Tracy almost gave in to it. He almost determined to cease his combat against the Gull system, re-enter the Gull service, and, at the bidding of this fair traitress, devote to the maintenance of the Gull doctrines the newly awakened talents which he had called into use for their overthrow. Was ever such a traitor to reform—and made so by a woman?

About this time, too, while love and ease were tempting him against right and conscience, a trying message came from the family of the ex-baggageman. It was brought by the daughter of that individual, the bright young woman on whose account the friends of Gull refrained from tearing the denouncer of Gull to pieces. She had been a bright and cherry-cheeked lass when Tracy first remembered her. Now she was rather rude-looking; there was an air of recklessness about her manner; an appearance of something akin to shamelessness was beginning to peep forth from the delicate lines of her face—a face that had a few short months ago been the village model of modest beauty. The degradation of the ex-baggageman had been very deep and wide-spread indeed in its effects to have so soon left its impress even upon the modest beauty of his daughter.

"Mr. Tracy," said she, in a husky tone—it seemed that even her voice had felt the effect of Mr. Gull's displeasure—"are you going back to Mr. Gull's?"

"I don't know," responded Tracy.

"Well, if you do," said she, hurriedly, as if her old pride might intervene to prevent her saying it—"if you do, try and get him to put father back. He's going to the dogs. We've all been nearly ruined. We don't want to fight any longer. Tell him father 'll vote as he wants him to."

"Poor child!" said Tracy, "do you, too, suppose his politics was the cause of your father's dismissal?"

"Suppose it?" said she. "I know it. The men all told father so, as soon as Mr. Gull got to own nearly all the railroad. They said he was foolish to fight against such an enemy as Mr. Gull. They all knew better than to vote against him."

"I don't know that I will return to Mr. Gull's employ," said Tracy, "but I'll speak to him about this case."

"If you just let him know it," said the girl, brightly, "he'll put father back. Don't you think so?"

With that she departed, and with such a merry step that Tracy wondered if she would get back with her father's place the girlish innocence of her face and the pleasant modesty of her manner. Were even these within the hand and under the will of Gull?

As he promised, he explained the change of the ex-baggageman's political sentiments to Mr. Gull, and that honorable gentleman hemmed and hawed and intimated that he really had nothing to do with the case, and did not know what he could do for the unfortunate family; but he was glad to see they had come down from their high horse, and he supposed it would be all right. With that Tracy was content, and waited to see the effect. Within two days the ex-baggageman was a baggageman again, the bright young girl—bright again—was at work once more in the spinning factory, and the whole family reared their heads as withered flowers under the balmy dew.

"Quite a commendable change," said the Gull's Nest people. "Great deal of merit in those people, if they only avoid being factious."

"Very Christian-like in Mr. Gull," said the pew-holders.

"A commendable change indeed," said Tracy. "The privilege of principles is such a vague abstraction, after all, to pit against the living of a family."

And now had not Gull indeed controlled by his own mandate the peace of families, the conscience of Christian constituents, even the bloom or blight of maiden beauty? Was he a man to contend against?

These thoughts hotly beset the friendless ex-secretary, and had not new developments ensued regarding the career of Gull, he might have yielded to temptation, and returned to the task-master's yoke. But startling rumors of dishonest legislation reached the quiet precincts of Gull's Nest. A batch of Congressmen were reported to have been discovered in a combination to secure certain railroad privileges by bonding the credit of the republic in a manner that was highly deleterious to the financial integrity of the Treasury and the legislative morality of the Congressmen. And Gull was named among them—named as the very first among them, and set down as the arch-rascal of the party. Here was a new handle for the reformer, a new crevice in the rotten armor of Gull. Should he give up the fight just when this new incentive to continue it offered—at the moment when he not only found a new weapon to fight with, but when new odium was reflected upon the place he was invited to return to? No; he would continue the war, and trust to love and conscience to win his lady's hand.

He appealed at once to the opposition editor. Gull had been ahead of him with a card denying every thing.

"You see," was the opposition editor's comforting reply, "he denies it. We can't go back of that—his word—you know."

He appeared triumphantly before the lady of his love with the damning facts against Gull. "Do you not see now, dearest, why I war against him?"

"Oh," complained the lady, "they all have these things charged against them. Why do you make it your business to fight them? Besides, Mr. Gull denies it."

He met the baggageman, and, as a twin victim of the despotism of Gull, he descanted to him on this new rascality. The baggageman turned pale and red by turns, and coughed a little, and choked somewhat, but managed to ejaculate, "I guess Mr. Gull ain't any worse 'n the rest of 'em." And then he walked hurriedly away.

"Is your soul your own?" cried Tracy, after him. But the man was too far away to hear him—and no answer was needed.

To the cashier of the Gull's Nest bank he mentioned the circumstance, in the cool interchange of routine compliments, when they met on the street. The bank cashier drew himself up as if personally offended. "There are many slanders against Mr. Gull, Sir, which I do not choose to listen to, and this is one of them. Good-day, Sir!"

Tracy would not yet give up. He felt that his self-respect was involved. He must expose and overcome Gull, or let foul imputations of ingratitude rest upon his own fair fame. He had one desperate resort. The new Congressional election was near at hand. Gull had already been nominated by his district convention with unusual unanimity, one of the resolutions setting forth, in effect, that Mr. Gull's return was necessary as a reply to the "tongue of slander which had threatened to beslime the hard-earned reputation of this our most esteemed citizen and most upright statesman." Tracy conceived the desperate remedy of running on an opposition ticket, and at once put his project into effect. He gathered about him a few of the humbler voters of Gull's Nest—men who had no interest in common with Gull, who had work over which he had no command, and many of whom felt a laudable desire to show Gull what powerful enemies they might be, and thus suggest to him what great necessity might exist for securing their friendship. These humbler voters were few, indeed, and impecunious, but Tracy gathered them together from the corners, and the bar-rooms, and abodes of vagabondism, and mustered them into the ranks of reform as readily as if he had all his life been a professional politician. He held club meetings with them, formed conventions, passed stirring Union-saving resolutions, nominated himself for Congressman, promulgated an anti-monopoly, anti-Gull, and anti-Mogul platform, and thus commenced his final and decisive fight for reform. The Gull men were not much scared by the new movement, but they took prompt and effective measures to choke it at once. Tracy's name and a few others were added to the black list of unpardonables, and forever noted down as outside the mercy of Gull. Upon Tracy himself, as the campaign proceeded, batteries were opened which that ardent young man never imagined were in existence. A cry of "monstrous ingratitude" went up against the ex-secretary from the throats of all the Gulls. "A spy in the household of a good man" was an imputation cast upon him with dire effect, and "deserter and traitor" were routine invectives which threatened to crush him. For two months Tracy existed under this campaign abuse. He made a gallant fight. He had hardly at the first hoped to win against Gull; he never rose to such hope as that; but he felt that he might so batter the enemy's works that the feudal despotism within might become visible to the eyes of all the world, and some younger reformer, following his lead, might be able in the early future to overthrow it. This hope gave him courage, and he battled faithfully to the last. But the fight went all one way.

He wrote a card denying that he owed any gratitude to Mr. Gull, and firmly declaring that his personal knowledge of the infamy of the Gull political system alone drove him to the present fight. It was printed in an obscure corner of the anti-Mogul sheet, in small type, without an editorial comment. He contributed sharp political squibs, and suggested uncomfortable questions for the Gull party to the anti-Mogul sheet; but the editor blunted the points of the one, and deemed it inadvisable to publish the other. The campaign was personal against him, and he insisted that the anti-Mogul sheet should make it personal against Gull; but the cautious editor thought that would ruin his paper, and not help the cause. In truth, for all the aid that paper gave to Tracy, it might have been an ally of the Gull party.

The organs, fully accredited, which supported Gull meantime had no such scruples, and exhibited no such tenderness for their opponents. Abuse ran riot on young Tracy's head, so that his village acquaintances avoided him as one openly disreputable; and so constant became the vituperation, and so shocking were the meannesses attributed to him, he himself felt ashamed, and became conscious at last of a desire to sneak through life, and thus avoid the execration of the community. His adherents, who were little credit to him, deserted him on the most meagre offer of recognition or promotion in the Gull party, and the respectable villagers, with whom he had been in high favor as Gull's secretary, now cut him dead. He made speeches, and nobody attended but a few boys who were evidently enlisted in the other interest, and he was frequently compelled to cut his speeches short and leave abruptly for want of auditors. Every new issue of the opposition press frightened him. He trembled like a leaf at the sight of opposition campaign documents. He dreaded to think what new charges had been promulgated against him. He felt that reform could not repay him for such mental torture.

The election was fast approaching, however, and he hoped to find some pleasure in existence when it was ended. In the mean time what had become of that dear girl for whose sake he had remained in this unfriendly atmosphere, for a sight of whose fair face he had braved even the terrors of Gull? How had this continuous newspaper abuse affected her? He imagined he could see her indignant remonstrance against the ungenerous treatment he had received. Dear girl! he must write to her to strengthen her faith in him. He wrote accordingly. He had felt it incumbent on him to avoid her father's house since this fierce campaign had opened, and consequently had not seen her for nearly two months. He had written before to explain why he had not come, and had received the dearest reply, devoted mainly to expostulations for his course in combating Mr. Gull, and urging him to desist from it, but never a word impugning his motives. Oh no! the dear girl believed in him. She held not her love to be swayed by every passing wind. Not she! But this newspaper abuse had been excessive, and he thought it only fair and manly to send her a word denying it, and thus sustaining, in any contest she might have, her noble faith in him.

The letter came back unopened, tied to one in her own handwriting, addressed to him. It read:

"I can no longer receive communications from one who has shown himself so forgetful of those who befriended him so ungrateful to the hand that raised him, and so treacherous to the great party in whose principles he was bred."

Tracy did not gnash his teeth. His complacency under the circumstances astonished him. He felt that his love affair had had the most natural ending possible, and if it could not survive a political campaign, it were well to have it ended. "There is a girl somewhere for me!" he cried, with a cheery heart—"a girl whom corporations can not persuade away, nor campaign abuse disenchant."

The election came and passed. The returns gave Gull a larger majority than ever before. The Mogul papers, with crowing spread-heads, announced that anti-Mogulism was forever buried, and the pestiferous anti-Gull sheet took refuge in its defeat by casting contumely upon Tracy. The heart of that valiant reformer sank under such an accumulation of disaster, and he departed as modestly as possible from the scene—escaped from this feudal barony of the East, and betook himself, as he fondly hoped, to a freer West, where corporations had not planted their iron fangs, and where principles, unbiased and unbought, contended for supremacy, like brawny wrestlers bare to the buff.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ABOUT ten miles from Portsmouth, off the coast of New Hampshire, lie clustered together eight small islands, comprising only six hundred acres, and bearing the name of the Isles of Shoals. More than two hundred years ago these islands were famous for their fisheries, and had a resident population of several hundred persons, who sent quantities of well-cured fish to Spain and the West Indies. The town of Gosport, on Star Island, had five hundred inhabitants a hundred years ago, and was represented in the Legislature of New Hampshire. Now, by the progress of the age, the township is nearly depopulated, and a large hotel has been erected for the accommodation of summer visitors. On Appledore, formerly known as Hog Island, there is also a hotel capable of lodging five hundred guests. These Isles of Shoals seem to be but masses of jagged granite thrown up from the depths of the sea. No trees are seen, and scarcely a shrub appears, but tufts of grass spring up between projecting rocks, and once in a while a little grassy dell is found, overgrown with wild flowers. A small harbor is inclosed by these rocky crags, which affords a refuge for small vessels in storms. Recently the Isles of Shoals have become quite a famous summer resort. To be sure, there are no beaches for sea bathing, driving is an unattainable pleasure, and for walks one must expect to clamber over rough granite rocks. But there is boating and fishing, and, above all things, the simple enjoyment of the delightfully soft, warm, and equable climate, so free from chilly winds. These barren isles are full of romantic historic interest; and visitors generally find it most restful to lie lazily upon the sunny rocks, above the surging waves, watching the changeful sea, and reading, or dreaming of scenes long gone by—of early navigators, of shipwrecks, of Indian massacres, and wild romances of pots of gold and silver found hidden in the craggy ledges.

What dreadful disasters are in store for us! At the recent meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which was held at Portland, Maine, the statement was made that "it is supposed that the resistance of the ethereal medium, shown to exist by the undulatory theory of light, will gradually cause the satellites to fall into the planets, the planets into suns, and suns into a common centre, after which darkness, silence, and death will reign." The possibility of such a catastrophe makes one tremble. Fortunately it was also suggested "that the concentration might be so gradual that catastrophic effects, either from tidal influences or from the final collisions, might be avoided, the former by the synchronism of rotation which resistances to tidal motions will gradually effect, and the latter by the assumption of the forms of equilibrium under the long-continued action of the forces upon the earth." We advise our readers to employ these means faithfully to avoid the "catastrophic effects."

According to the present prospect, the Wise balloon will soon start on its transatlantic trip. Perhaps even before this paragraph meets the eyes of our readers the perilous voyage will have commenced. We understand that something like a thousand applications for passage in the balloon have been made, of course in vain. A certain number of letters will be carried for the novelty of the thing.

Every summer a gloomy shadow falls upon many watering-places in consequence of sudden deaths in the treacherous surf. It was remarked in connection with the recent drowning of two journalists that good swimmers were always in the greatest danger of drowning. And it is certainly true that of those who meet death in the water a large proportion are known as expert swimmers. The truth is that one who can not swim is timid, and does not venture into unsafe places, while the skillful swimmer is proud of his ability, and often rashly imperils his own life. Moreover, every one is liable to be seized with cramp or other illness in the water.

Two weeks at Saratoga with only one trunk! Impossible! Yet it is reported that a Pennsylvania lady recently departed from the Grand Central Hotel, Saratoga, after two weeks' stay, with but one trunk. No wonder all the fashionables were horror-stricken!

An exchange gives us some racy scenes illustrative of car ethics of the future. We extract a couple for the benefit of our readers:

A gentleman on the front platform begins to smoke.

CONDUCTOR. "Beg pardon, Sir, but smoking is against the rules."

LADY PASSENGERS (all together). "Pray allow the gentleman to smoke. We assure you it does not incommode us."

ELEGANT-LOOKING LADY (to her fragile friend). "How pale you look, my love! Let me open the window."

FRAGILE FRIEND. "Not for the world, dear. It might possibly give cold to the other passengers. Tobacco always makes me deadly sick; but the gentleman does seem to enjoy it so."

A passenger gets out, and one seat is left vacant. A colored lady and an Irish lady simultaneously enter. Both remain standing.

IRISH LADY (to colored lady). "Be plazed to take the sate, mum. Shure I can't bear to see yez shtanding."

COLORED LADY. "Laws a mussy! If dat don't take de rag off de bush! No indeed, mum! I couldn't think of settin' afore you, mum."

PASSENGERS (all crowding up). "By a little squeezing we can make room for both."

SOUTHERN LADY WITH CHILDREN. "No, no; don't crowd yourselves. My children will be only too glad to stand."

CHILDREN (too glad). "Oh, certainly, mamma! Why didn't you speak before?"

FASHIONABLE LADY (to whom a gentleman, still standing, has given his seat in the early part of the route). "Now, Sir, I must insist upon your resuming your seat and allowing me to stand. I am sure you must be tired."

GENTLEMAN (who looks ready to drop). "Tired, madam? I only gave you a place to rest. You gave me a pleasure to remember."

FASHIONABLE LADY. "Pleasure, Sir?"

GENTLEMAN. "The pleasure of being thanked."

It is rumored that the parties who have inclosed the premises known as Prospect Park, Niagara, have not a perfect title to the property, and that their present action will be tested by law. It is understood that the original owners designed to have two public roads constructed through the land now fenced in, but that the period for which the grant was to hold good is expired. At present but little work is being done on the park.

The Postal Record of Chicago publishes an elaborate obituary of the historic Post-office cat of that city, which departed this life July 20, 1873. Vigilant, faithful, and fire-proof, Tabitha deserved the fame she had acquired. After the great conflagration of 1871 she was found, safe and sound, in a bucket in the basement of the Post-office. Many of her numerous progeny have become domiciled in families moving in the best society of Chicago and other cities. One of the family has gone to the Post-office in each of the following cities: Washington, New York, Boston, St. Louis, and San Francisco; quite a number are "missing," while "young Master Thomas Cat" has never yet left his native home, but remains a faithful sentinel to defend it against the depredations of rats and mice. Such is the veritable tale of a cat.

"Old Man of the Mountain" is the name given to the summit of Mount Mansfield, from the peculiar outline which it represents—that of a human being in a reclining position, the face turned upward. The north peak, which represents the "chin," is the highest peak of the mountain, being four hundred feet higher than the "nose." Mount Mansfield is the highest in Vermont, and affords a grand outlook over the whole State.

An exciting scene was witnessed on the Boulevard Pereire, Paris, not long ago. A distinguished velocipede rider, who was accustomed to appear every day and astonish the people by his remarkable feats, had just mounted his bicycle when cries of "Out of the way!" "Kill him! kill him!" resounded through the street. Foot-passengers darted into the houses, and the velocipedist was left alone on the road with an enormous dog with inflamed eyes and jaws bathed in foam. The mad mastiff perceived the bicycle and its unlucky rider, and bounded after it. A fearful race ensued, the rider turning his machine round and round with wondrous swiftness, but the brute following closely. Suddenly the velocipede broke down, and the unfortunate man was thrown senseless on the ground, while the dog sprung toward him. By good fortune just at this moment the police brained the infuriated animal, and the man was saved from a dreadful death.

Builth is a Welsh watering-place. The visitors thereto have "struck" for lower prices. Finding that the trades-people of the town were asking exorbitant prices for the necessaries and the luxuries of life, gentlemen with large families, maiden ladies, and bachelors joined together and called an indignant meeting of protest. The visitors all assembled on the public recreation ground of Builth, and related their grievances. It was finally unanimously resolved that unless shop-keepers lowered the price of butter nearly fifty per cent., and brought ham down to a reasonable rate, they would totally refrain from their use.

"You are the painter of this picture, I imagine," said a critic to a stranger, at the Royal Academy in London, who was standing near a charming landscape, and anxiously scanning the faces of the crowd, evidently with a view to ascertain the impression made upon them by the picture: "allow me to congratulate you." "No, Sir; indeed I am not." "Really?" questioned the critic. "I am the framer, Sir," was the reply, "and I am watching the effect of my frame upon the public."

In the wreck of a steamboat on the Ohio River recently there was a lady passenger who was separated in the confusion from her infant child, and was herself safely conveyed on shore with some other passengers who were saved; but it was supposed that the baby was drowned. The following day, when men went out to the half-sunken vessel to recover the bodies of the drowned, they discovered in the cabin, which was filled with water nearly to the ceiling, a floating mattress, upon which lay a little boy, sleeping as peacefully as if nothing had happened. His bed was not very dry, but it still sustained its living freight. In due time the child was sent to Shawneetown, where the other passengers had been landed the evening before, and its arrival made an excitement among them, for several had lost children by the disaster. The scene when the mother recognized the child she had mourned as lost for nearly twenty-four hours was a very touching one.

USEFUL RECIPES.

BREAKFAST DISH.—Chop very fine either cold beef, mutton, or veal. To one tea-cupful allow the same quantity of grated bread, and if the latter is stale, soak it a few hours in warm milk, and chop with the meat; to this quantity add one egg, yolk and white well beaten together, salt, pepper, and, if liked, a very small onion chopped fine; mix well together, and, flouring the hands, make into balls and fry in hot lard.

ALMOND CUSTARD.—Place over the stove one pint of milk, in which put one large handful of bitter almonds that have been blanched and broken up. Let it boil until highly flavored with the almonds; then strain and set it aside to cool. Boil one quart of rich milk without any thing in it, and when cold add the flavored milk, half a pint of sand sugar, and eight eggs, the yolks and whites beaten separately, stirring all well together. Bake in cups, and when cold place a macaroon on top of each cup.

GREEN CURRANTS, BOTTLED.—Currants are quite an improvement to gooseberries in pies, and alone form a very nice fruit pie. Strip from the stems, and allow one pound of sugar to three of the fruit. In placing in the kettle, alternate the sugar and fruit, and do not fill the vessel more than two-thirds full. Put on the back of the stove until the sugar melts and the juice starts, then set in a hotter place, and after boiling a few minutes, fill the jars and seal immediately; do not remove the kettle from the stove, but fill one jar at a time, and seal while boiling hot.

PUMPKIN PIE.—Cut the pumpkin into thin slices, and boil until tender in as little water as possible; watch carefully that it does not scorch; drain off all the water, putting the stew-pan on a warm part of the stove, that it may dry off the moisture, for ten or fifteen minutes. Mash, and rub through a sieve, adding, while warm, a small piece of butter. To every quart of the pumpkin, after mashing, add one quart of new milk and four eggs, the yolks and whites beaten separately. White sugar to taste, and cinnamon and nutmeg as desired; a very little brandy is a great improvement. The oven they are baked in must be hot, or they will not brown. It is as well to heat the batter scalding hot before pouring into the pie-dishes.

SUET PUDDING.—Seed and chop fine one large tea-cupful of raisins; chop one cupful of suet, having removed all the skin; add a cupful of sour milk, one tea-spoonful of soda, a very little salt, three eggs beaten together, and enough flour to make a stiff batter. Steam two hours, and eat with fairy butter or wine sauce.

THE GRAND NATIONAL ARCHERY MEETING AT THE SHRUBLANDS, LEAMINGTON, ENGLAND.

ARCHERY MEETING AT LEAMINGTON, ENGLAND.

"WHITHER, oh, whither, love, shall we go?" said the "sweet little wife" of Mr. Tennyson's singer on the day after her marriage, which showed that the young people had not properly discussed their honey-moon before the wedding. The poet makes a vague answer about some impossible island, which shows conclusively he had never heard about Leamington. A fairer and pleasanter place for a honey-moon, a holiday, or a permanent residence it would not be easy to find. It is a town in a garden, a town embowered in roses and magnificent trees, which make shady its broad streets, and afford a series of the most charming views. The place is so clean that you could eat an al fresco lunch off the pavement without the intervention of plates, while in the heart of the town stretch far and wide the beautiful Jephson Gardens, with fair lawns and terraces, shrubberies and avenues, beside which flows idly the placid Leam. Leamington is famous for its spa water, which has curative effects in a number of diseases, and to which patients have flocked in numbers to drink since the days of Camden. There were some idle rumors a short time ago that the water supply of the town was bad; but that is an entire mistake, as medical investigation and analysis have shown. As a health resort the place is unrivaled, while for people who go in search of amusements there are also attractions. During the summer there is plenty of archery and croquet; there are balls and flower-shows, while in the hunting season it is largely patronized, being within easy reach of three packs of hounds. The neighborhood affords opportunities for the most charming excursions. There is Warwick, with its glorious old castle, and picturesque Guy's Cliff near it; there is Kenilworth, which at once recalls a thousand memories; and Stratford-on-Avon, the name of which speaks more eloquently than any possible description of the object of a pilgrimage there. Coventry, too, and Oxford are within easy distances; and to some people there are attractions in the giant factories of Birmingham. Leamington may fairly be called the queen of inland spas, even as Scarborough boasts a similar title as a sea-side resort. Our illustration was taken at the Grand National Archery Meeting held at Leamington, in the beautiful grounds of Shrubland Hall, the seat of Mr. Matthew Wise. The gathering was a most successful one, and the shooting unusually good; and we may note that Mrs. Horniblow was the lady champion, while Mr. Fisher headed the scores of the gentlemen. We have depicted the "Queen of the Rose-bud Garden of Girls" taking aim at the target; and our readers will easily imagine that whatever execution she did with her arrows, she must have done far more with her eyes.

MRS. TOMPKINS'S EXPERIMENT.

"GENTEEL summer boarding at a retired mountain farm-house." How delightfully that sounded in the ears of Mrs. David Tompkins and her daughters, of Bedford Row, as they read it aloud on a warm day in the beginning of July, when the sultriest of summer weather was upon them, and their friends had nearly all left town in search of cooler breezes and gayer scenes! The heat was dreadful, as they all knew; for Bedford Row was a narrow place, with high walls on either side, and there was little chance for pure air in such a densely populated quarter. But whenever going to the country was mentioned in the family council, the money question stopped the way; for how could David Tompkins, who was only a clerk with a bare $1500 a year, send wife and two daughters to any sort of a summer resort where boarders were taken at the customary rates? It was simply impossible, he said from time to time, when the subject came up as a kind of irrepressible conflict between pleasure and the pocket, and they must be content with living as others had done before them—their grandmothers, for instance, good, sensible women, with neither country-seats nor traveling dresses, and yet were long-lived, and healthy to the last.

But that line of argument did not entirely satisfy ladies of the present advanced gentility, who only desire to do as others do, nor care to have every one made acquainted with the disagreeable minutiæ of their financial affairs. This state of things had continued long enough, they thought; and this year, their father having been ventures, these two handsome daughters had wrung some sort of a promise from him that they should go for a few weeks' recreation to some moderately priced place of resort, where they would, of course, find entertainment and happiness in the lovely landscapes, pure air, and country fare. Having gained thus largely upon the parental heart, the chief anxiety at present was to find the location itself; and as there was no lack of places advertised as highly desirable and replete with comforts, so there was a daily discussion as they looked down the column of "summer boarding." The season was half gone, and the

The main point was to secure a place where they would have good society, a liberal if not luxurious table, and comfortable airy rooms, yet at a very moderate price, for the sum placed at their disposal for this long-promised summer trip was, after all, a very limited one. But not to weary the reader with accounts of their experiences in the long search, the many provoking and fruitless journeys, to find all the rooms taken by earlier applicants, I will merely state the fact that after all the delay they met with this promising advertisement, and concluding from the description that it was just the place for them—"a retired mountain farm-house" conveying to their vivid imaginations a picture of sublime scenery, combined with every other attraction—they decided to secure the place at once, without waiting to visit it, only afraid lest they should be too late.

No sooner had the letter gone than preparations were begun, and by the time the prompt answer arrived they were in a state of most promising forwardness. So the time being fixed for the start, and all important preliminaries arranged, these three ladies set out on their journey in high spirits, with trunks enough for Saratoga itself, crowded with all their summer finery, which of course would be needed in such a beautiful retreat.

It was well that Mr. Bergh was not there to pity the poor skeletons of animals, or their journey might never have been completed; but after much whipping and scolding and dragging up hill, the party at length arrived at the reputed mountain farm-house, a low story-and-a-half building standing by the road-side, with a potato patch on either side, but no trees for shade or embellishment. It was after sunset when they reached this lovely spot, and so the want of shade was hardly perceived that night; all they thought of was to rest and refresh their weary bodies with cool water and those other creature comforts pertaining to the supper-table. The good-humored landlady stood in the doorway, holding a child in her arms, and evidently dressed for the occasion, with a furbelowed cap and huge neck-tie of rainbow ribbons, which set off her red face, and gave a decided "style" to her appearance.

"Walk in, ladies, walk in, and just make yourselves to hum," she said, with all the welcome in her power, at the same time showing them into the one broad room which constituted the lower portion of the house.

Of course the visitors obeyed, at the same time wondering where their apartments could be located.

"We should like to go to our rooms," said Mrs. Tompkins at last. "We are dusty, and want to wash off a little before supper."

"Ah, yes! of course ye do," she answered; but the idea was evidently one that had not before occurred to her ladyship, and she heard only the latter half of the address, as she beckoned them out the back-door to where a pump was standing under a shed, and seizing the handle with one hand, still holding the fat baby in the other, she began pumping away vigorously, expecting the guests to wash under the stream. Of course this could not be done without serious damage to clothing, but at the mention of a basin the woman only looked more astonished, and did not at all comprehend what was wanted. So with mingled emotions of amusement, disgust, and pity, yet with considerable bravery, they plunged into the torrent with both hands, and washed their faces, feeling instantly refreshed by the cool bath of well-water. Then looking around, they inquired for a towel, but here again the mistress was as much amazed as if the article demanded had been no part of the equipment of a boarding-house. Handkerchiefs, however, answered the purpose as a present substitute, and, fortunately for their future, they were provided with towels in their trunks. There was something so ludicrous in this incident, and so much after the descriptions of border life experiences, that our friends concluded to laugh over it, notwithstanding their disappointments, and they took seats outside the door to await the summons to supper.

It was shady, and growing somewhat cooler after the sultry day, but swarms of mosquitoes and flies filled the air and buzzed about their heads. They looked up and down in search of the mountains named in the description, but, alas! they were only to be seen in the far distance like a blue belt around the horizon. Certainly they were twenty miles away, and the land around them was as flat as any they had ever seen. No doubt the writer of the advertisement had drawn somewhat upon his fancy. But the supper bell ended their comments, and ushered these hungry travelers into the large apartment which served by turns as parlor, dining-room, and kitchen.

The table arrangements were as primitive as might be expected; but every thing was clean and neat, so far as appeared to the naked eye, the crockery being of various kinds and colors, of the cheapest sort, with iron forks and leaden spoons. The tea was by no means fine, and the bread both heavy and dark, while the butter, being without ice to harden it, was almost liquid. A dish of eggs, hard-boiled, and another of bonny-clabber completed the bill of fare.

They were hungry enough to do full justice to any thing that was really eatable, but hard-boiled eggs were too indigestible to be ventured on. So after the trial of one or two, the dish was left untasted, and they completed their miserable meal on the brown bread and oily butter. Even the bonny-clabber and brown sugar, which the host and hostess enjoyed immensely, was unappreciated by our city friends, who had never counted upon this as one of the luxuries of the dairy. Thus far their ideas of country boarding and its appetizing delights had not been realized; but they hoped for better things on the morrow. As the shades of evening fell the mosquitoes became intolerable in their attentions, and the boarders would gladly have retreated within-doors, but there the heat of the cooking-stove made it a summer of the torrid zone, and so from sheer discomfort below stairs Mrs. Tompkins and her daughters determined to retire to the unknown regions above, where they fondly hoped to find rest for the night.

A trap-door in the low kitchen ceiling, reached by a sort of ladder steps, afforded the means of entering the airy chambers provided for them, and up they went, in mood decidedly miserable, emerging into a sort of attic, whose roof sloped on one side, leaving only a few feet of space in which a person of ordinary height could stand upright. This apartment was separated from another of the same kind by a board partition, about six feet in height, that extended up under the peak of the roof, the peak itself being several feet higher.

Had they been afraid of night robbers they would have eyed this low partition with suspicion, but as the apartment on the other side was to be occupied by the family of the proprietor, they would be spared this terror. However, as the trap-door entrance opened into our friends' chamber, any idea of privacy was simply absurd.

"Mother, what shall we do?" exclaimed the eldest of the Tompkins girls, as she seated herself despairingly on the side of the bed. "We shall bake alive before morning."

"It is certainly ten degrees hotter up here than below, and not a breath of air," said the younger one, in still sadder tones.

"What would your father say if he could see us now?" said the mother. "Wouldn't he laugh at us, and say we were having our wish?

Summer boarding indeed, with a vengeance! We never had such a summer night's dream as we'll have to-night."

"But what shall we do?" again asked the first speaker.

"Do?" returned Mrs. Tompkins—"what can we do to-night but go to bed and try to sleep? But to-morrow we leave this delightful region, and defend us from mountain farm-houses hereafter!"

Mother and younger daughter were at length stretched upon the bedstead proper, while the elder Miss Tompkins endeavored to make herself moderately comfortable upon the narrow cot, made of a plank supported at the ends by two old chairs. Of course the weight in the centre caused it to sway and vibrate in a manner quite peculiar, and slightly suggestive of seasickness. But the miserable lodgers having nerved themselves to endure the torments of this terrible night, resigned themselves as calmly as possible under the circumstances. From sheer weariness, notwithstanding the close and heated atmosphere, they at length fell asleep, regardless of the song of numberless mosquitoes or the savage attacks of night-wanderers, which had apparently abounded there in undisturbed possession during successive summers.

Early in the morning the stout old Dutchman, walking on tiptoes, came through the room on his way down the ladder, and soon after followed the mother and baby, all endeavoring to be as still as possible, lest their boarders should be disturbed. But from the first breaking of day swarms of flies had added their persecutions, as if to complete the sum of discomfort, and our friends arose, in no pleasant mood surveying the situation.

The only articles of furniture contained in the room were the two beds and one of their trunks, only one having been taken up stairs. Not a chair or even a wash-stand or looking-glass was there. What were they to do for their morning ablutions? they asked themselves in despair. Then looking out of the one dormer-window, they saw the landlady herself pumping away below and washing her face and head vigorously, then sleeking her black hair with her hands, which thus served as a hair-brush, while a corner of her apron answered as a towel.

"I suppose that is the only way for us to do," said Mrs. Tompkins to her daughters; and so, half dead with heat and swollen with wounds, they managed to array themselves with the aid of a pocket-mirror, thus preparing to descend. It would have been a far more convenient and usual plan to bathe before dressing, but necessity often regulates our movements. And down they came, behaving like martyrs, as they were, refreshing themselves greatly by the flood of water that each pumped by turns for another. What a luxury it seemed to have towels, too! And as the early morning was fresh and cool, they could not sufficiently enjoy the emancipation from their attic quarters. They even walked around the house, surveying the tall potatoes by which it was surrounded on all sides, and it was decided then and there that this idea of cheap summer boarding was simply a humbug not to be any longer countenanced by that family. So after an attempt at breakfasting on more brown bread and oily butter, and the remains of last night's eggs additionally boiled, with the assistance of some fat bacon, the boarders announced their intention to depart by the first train. And so they did. And never again will Mrs. David Tompkins, of Bedford Row, or her daughters be tempted to leave their comfortable home in that modest quarter in search of "genteel summer boarding at a retired mountain farmhouse."

AUTUMN.

THE brown fields forget their bloom,
Lost in a solemn trance;
Golden leaves go to their doom,
Torn by the winds, perchance.

No more buddings of June
Show on the naked stem;
No more birds, just in tune,
Echo the joy after them;

No more fluttering wings,
Eager to put to the test
Whether, among other things,
Home life or travel were best.

Nowhere now may we find
The white-weed's silvery star;
There's not a rose left to remind
Wherefore the sharp briers are.

Yet where we miss the clover
The windfalls lie, ripe and red;
And patient eyes may discover
That Summer is sleeping, not dead.

ANCIENT NEEDLE-WORK.

A LITTLE cluster of ladies, some of them of the royal blood, have been hunting up and sorting out and cataloguing a most valuable collection of Old Needle-work for the English South Kensington Museum, and any number of clusters of ladies, whether of blood royal or not, must have found great advantage in a near study of it.

First and foremost, for beauty and universal utility and facility combined, were the specimens of quilting, for which needles and silks and thimbles and ingenuity were at work in the seventeenth century. This has especial mention, because it could have complete and most praiseworthy imitation to-day. Take, for example, and carefully examine the exhibited quilts or counterpanes. Every young girl hopes to want counterpanes in some coming blissful day; every married woman does want counterpanes; and as their dear great-grandmothers made counterpanes, as well as nestled themselves snugly to sleep under them, let there be a lesson learned as to how they are best and most beautifully to be manufactured. Those exhibited are (chiefly) of fine white linen; not calico (where was it to come from?); not silk; not satin. They are real homespun, or possibly imported Irish. Each has been, say, a fine white linen sheet of full, large, square size; this has been spread upon a thick layer of level wadding and the lining; and then the fair seamstresses have taken white or yellow sewing silk, and have stitched the whole together, edge to edge, and all over the suface, with the best and closest backstitching, in a strong, stout trellis-work, the diamonds of which are about half an inch across. The whole is a firm, shield-like, handsome piece of housewifery at once; it looks like an heir-loom; and it certainly will last to be scrutinized by eyes two centuries to come, just as well as it was scrutinized and gloried over by eyes of two centuries ago. Now what is the difference between this "quilting" and the quilting of the present generation of wives and daughters?—leaving out of the question, of course, the work executed by the sewing-machine. The quilting of 1873 means a piece of any thing lightly run—to run being (to make it explicable to masculine ears) to pass a thread straight along by the simple means of going down and up. But this is not backstitching. Women know the important and industrious difference. To backstitch (again to make it explicable to masculine understandings) is to put the needle so far on that the thread shall make a background for another stitch, and the second movement shall take it back to make it join on perfectly to the stitch that was complete before. It can be understood how solid this is, how stiff, how satisfactory. But the ladies of sixteen hundred odd were not satisfied when they had done this much to their huge squares of linen with their white or yellow sewin silk. They took it only as a basis for further and far more elaborate operations. To understand this a reference must be made to a specimen in the South Kensington Museum, lent by the Countess Brownlow. All over the perfect and neat trelli runs a beautiful chintz-like embroidery of birds and leaves and flowers. These are worked in pink and red and brown and various greens, all silk, and they are stitched in that close, tight, buttonhole manner that will never fray away, and never run the risk of puckering and spoiling by catching and getting dragged out. Another counterpane, on precisely the same plan, belongs to the Baroness Willoughby de Eresby. The homespun of it is coarser, and necessarily so, for the flowers that cover it are magnificent floral impossibilities of five inches in diameter, as bright in their reds and pinks and greens as if they had been dyed to-day, and they want something strong to hold them; but the same skill and industry are to be noted, the same delight is given by rich color and dainty taste. A little variety to these two is gained in five others. They stand out prominently, from being worked altogether in yellow—that yellow already mentioned that is a fine amber, and that, it must be recollected, is the pure undyed color of the silk fibre just as it leaves the silk-worm. They stand out prominently also from being worked on a different design. The quilting that is the foundation of their elegance and dignity is no longer a plain trellis. It is still the closest backstitching; but it is close rows of it, so close they are only a quarter of an inch apart; and they go in and out, and pointed and round, and up and down, and zig and zag, forming leaves and twirls and curves, and other geometric vagaries and eccentricities very difficult to follow. Then the embroidery enriching this already rich stitching is not a trail chintz, spreading every where alike. It is in the form of a wide border, with stretching corner pieces and a handsome centre stud. Let one of this group of five—it is part of the furniture of a baby's bed—be particularly noted. It is the property of the Countess of Caledon, and it was worked two hundred years ago for Frances, Lady Blount. Very noteworthy also is a counterpane lent by Mr. P. W. Elsted. It is worked entirely of silk spun by silk-worms of the worker's own keeping. Is there not almost the fragrance of mulberry leaves and the radiance of blistering sunshine in the idea? Fortunately, the name of the fair lady who moved about among these, and who loved the little insects under her fostering care, has been retained and recorded. It is Anne, daughter of John Whitfield, of Ives Place, Maidenhead. Tc no dyer's did this good Anne send her silk skeins after she had delicately unwound them from her cocoons. How could she have been certain sure of the self-same silk being sent back to her, if it had once left her thrifty and sunny home? No; Anne kept all the strength and sheen of her silk by resolving to use it in its own lovely amber color; and there it is, uninjured and beautiful, to this day. And this notable and tasteful Anne took a new design for her exquisite quilting, that was neither the trellis nor the all-over intermixed tracing described after it; and she took a new stitch. Her stitch is the button-hole; her quilting pattern that called coral, branching out shortly from slender stem to stem, and on it she has put an overlaying embroidery (still all her pure amber) of wreaths and scrolls and flower baskets, holding her monogram, A. W., twined. Another counterpane, lent by Mr. G. P. Boyce, with a still better groundwork, is a delicious geometric pattern, formed of triple circles three inches across, interringing one another with nicest accuracy, and each one holding as its centre piece a diamond stud. To see a linen sheet transmogrified into such a queenly quilt as this by a young lady of the present hour might indeed be hailed enthusiastically. Quite enough contentment could be had out of the yellow silk geometric design alone, without another stitch upon it. There would be no need for the large corner and centre pieces that this specimen possesses, in colors, representing fine lop-faced, oval-eyed ladies in imitation of Chinese. There would be no occasion either for the addition of the knotting linen fringe that is hanging from this magnificent piece of needle-work; it is too primitive and irregular for any direct copying. A better example of fringe could be had in a counterpane lent by the Countess of Shrewsbury. The fringe is gold; the tassels at each corner are gold; and there is a large monogram in the centre worked with gold-thread also. The quilting of this is stitched, in another fine geometric pattern, in green. A word should be said perhaps of the size of these counterpanes. One is measured, that there should be certainty—the one with the knotting fringe. Its dimensions are six feet five inches by five feet eight inches: goodly enough, and calling up notions of a sufficiently massive four-poster.

There are some sets of curtains quilted after the manner of these coverlets. A very striking pair, worked by the Ladies Leslie, of the seventeenth century, are lent by their relative, Lady Elizabeth Leslie Cartwright. The fair embroideresses have sown their trellised linen with beautiful bouquets of colored flowers, roses, pinks, and others, from their own imagination or conventional tuition; in the centre of some of these flowers are the ladies' monograms; and they have bound their work all round with crimson silk galloon. Then there are pillow-cases; mere little dainty pincushion covers, measuring twenty inches by twelve inches, although one (the property of Countess Brownlow) extends to twenty-eight inches by twenty inches, and is nearer to the size in use now. And there are toilette covers, and some curious large pieces for shielding entrances and keeping the draughts away from doors, called portières; and, amidst other sorts of needle-work besides quilting, there are such articles, done in various materials, as valances, wall-hangings, bed-hangings, robes, hangings for a semicircular mantel-piece, table-cloths, banner screens, pocket-handkerchiefs, table napkins, sashes, aprons, scarfs, shaving cloaks, mantles, badges, shoes, pocket-books, pincushions, saddle-holsters, chair backs, chair seats, covers for divan seats, waistcoats, cushion covers, square pieces (used as covers for presents, or what not), chalice veils, altar fronts, cushions for seats in galleys, sofa backs, caps, purses, gauntlets, alms-bags, riding gloves, gants de cérémonie, tobacco-bags, pictures, portraits, orphreys, dalmatics, chasubles, and every other ecclesiastical finery priests would put on, or the fingers of pious ladies suggest. There are some pretty articles, too, loaded with gold-thread and embroidery, called wedding sachets, and others called vide-poches or semainiers. They are much the same things as for ultimate use, being both flat pockets, or envelopes, into which a handkerchief or a letter could be put. But the sachets are double, to fold up, front to front, like a book, for the pocket; and the vide-poches are to hang from a wall, like watch-pockets to a bedstead, or like card and letter racks fixed up each side of a chimney glass. These last came by their other name, semainiers, because they were usually made in sets of seven pockets, one for every day in the week; the seven being unequally divided on two strips, one containing three pockets and the other four.

Doubtless another form for the display of needle-work has been in the minds of every body—samplers. They are not going to be forgotten, especially as there are some thoroughly good specimens of them in the South Kensington collection. But will the young ladies of to-day, first of all, recollect what a sampler was? It was, literally and in effect, an example, a pattern, a model; it was, absolutely, a piece of linen—homespun—on which the Lilians and Mabels and Madges of the Stuart period learned how to make the stitches and floriations with which they were afterward to adorn their husbands' pourpoints, and to make into beauties and treasures their own stores of lavendered linen and ruffles and slashed sleeves. As a consequence, samplers of two hundred years ago, as shown in the museum, are not worked on white or gamboge canvas, with holes large enough and loose enough to be used almost by the blind. They are solid pieces of white linen, on the contrary; they have rows of mimic cut yew-trees upon them; they have incipient pinks and trails and roses; and they have pretty schemes of stitching to be afterward brought into notable and flourishing use. A certain Anna Bockett worked a sampler with her own neat silk figures upon it. July 12, she says, Anno Domini 1656, put by error on the label 1658. Another in the collection goes at a stride a whole century later. The comic worker of it says on it, in her neat silk letters and figures, Jane Hillier, Hur Sampelor, finished June 17, 1761. Naughty Jane, as can be seen, did not know how to spell. In addition, Jane was forgetful. When she picked out her Christian name on her square of homespun, she only picked out J A N. The E had to be stuffed over the A afterward, petulantly and comically, as though readers might please themselves as to where they put it. But Jan was a good soul, and was ambitious. She put texts on hur sampelor, besides the alphabet, and she put some rhyme.

"Lord, give me wisdom to direct my ways,
I beg not riches nor yet length of days.
My little children come to me
And learn the A B C," she stitched out, coming in rather short, like a stumble, at the end; and from this a gleam is gained of another possible use to put a sampler to, as well as the one of instruction how to do marking and embroidery. In those days of scant books and dear ones, and of horn criss-cross rows or A B C's, it is possible the linen sampler was a ready means for teaching the alphabet, and that its use thus was the direct forerunner of the linen books prepared for the little folks of to-day. Samplers framed were not so available, evidently. One exhibited is of regal origin. Katharine of Braganza, the queen of Charles the Second, worked it, and her pretty Continental idea was to stitch on it a loving little English posy:

"The 21st of May
Was our Marriage-daye."

Pity her sombre-faced consort did not remember this date when his eyes fell on it, and prove faithful to the vows then made! But probably Katharine kept her sampler and other youthful treasures hidden, and only looked at them when her heart was full.

Patchwork is another candidate for honorable mention. A piece, by a lady as noted as the last, but who would have been scorned and passed over by her haughtily, is at the museum for any eyes to see that like seeing, and for any clever heads to copy. Anne Fleetwood, once Anne Ireton, eldest daughter of Oliver Cromwell, was its worker. She literally patched, in the sense of patchwork of to-day. She cut diamonds, and recut them into four pyramids or cones, and then she neatly sewed them all together, her conglomerated diamond being about three inches square. The materials she applied her scissors to, though, can have no copying. They were gold and silver brocades, with amber ground and pink ground and blue ground; and whether for King's wife now, or Protector's daughter, these have scant manufacture. Other examples of patchwork differ from this of Dame Fleetwood's. They are cut pieces of chintz, cut round the flower edges, or the scrolls, whatever they may be, and then laid on to pieces or patches of white twilled cotton. To give these appliqués pieces richness a linen cord, or bobbin, was traced all round the edges, and firmly sewn there over and over; and to give the white twilled cotton they were applied to richness, this was itself in all sorts of odd shapes, and, twill meeting twill, a very effective diaper was produced. This same white twill is used as the material for some curious crewel curtains—Welsh work of the seventeenth century—lent by Lady Watkin Wynn. Crewel was a worsted of a tight twist, of bright rich dyes; and it must have been plentiful in Wales, judging by these eight curtains of Lady Wynn's. The flowers are laid on as thick as a rug; the flower-stalks are like tree trunks; and crewel is sewn upon crewel often to make stamens and other ornaments, and to satisfy, no doubt, some sturdy Welshwoman's notions of art and durability. As the very opposite to the obesity and firmness of this, comes a case full of baby-linen, the property of Countess Brownlow. It consists of eighteen pieces, all coming out of a tiny, battered, drab paper box, only a size larger than one volume of an ordinary novel, and the pieces are chiefly little thin strips of the finest linen, carefully stitched all round, the use of which must be left to the decision of the initiated. The practical Queen Elizabeth herself was the worker of this queer little inutility, it is stated (though there is no hint as to the authority). It is the last object in the collection that would have been attributed to her, in spite of one positive little garment, the diminutive of a real man's shirt, and one little white satin head-cover, the diminutive of a jockey's cap without the peak; but then the great Tudor Queen worked this Child-bed Linnin (as it is written on the box) when she was nobody, only a princess, and that may account for it. Besides, she worked it for her half-sister, Queen Mary, when the Queen was said to be going to require it.

It would be tedious to enter fully into every notable number in this collection of ancient needle-work. It is enough to say the star is here, embroidered in silver-thread on red velvet (about eight inches square), worn by Charles the First on the scaffold, and presented there by his forlorn Majesty to Captain Basil Woodd; that some pieces of tambour and appliqué work are here from the fingers of Queen Charlotte; and that probably the oldest piece in the collection is dated 1553, belonging to Monsieur Achille Juvenal. It is a strip about half a yard long and a quarter of a yard wide, consisting of four pieces of equal size, the joins showing, and embroidered with silver-thread. The material, according to the label attached, is pink satin; but close inspection, there can scarcely be any doubt, will prove it is not silk at all, but wool, of a texture exactly in anticipation of the satin-cloth of to-day. With the exception of this one specimen, which is probably French, attention has only been called here to needle-work of English hands. It is very easy to see what at once made the difference between Oriental and home embroidery. The Eastern nations—the lands of silk—took satin squares for their backgrounds, yellow satin, violet satin, faint-hued satin, instead of homespun; and there they were. Rich specimens have been treasured up that are Indian, Persian, Indo-Portuguese, Spanish, Sicilian, Venetian, Chinese, Dutch, French, Italian, German, Turkish, Algerine, Genoese; and this will be found the master-key to most of their splendor. Englishwomen were not behind their foreign contemporaries in deftness and color and beauty: it was only that the English climate grew flax plants instead of having the power to fatten silkworms, and English art had to use the material ready to its hand. No one doubts the superexcellence of the tapestries of Gobelins and Bayeux; but the gallery of (apparent paintings) the needle-work of Miss Linwood, who was a schoolmistress at Leicester, must not be suffered to fall entirely into oblivion. There have been many other Englishwomen, too, celebrated for dexterity at their needles. One was the beautiful Mrs. Knowles, the Quakeress, apt to get into theological discussions with Dr. Johnson. She sewed a portrait of George the Third, and was so well known for her sewings that Johnson's brilliant hostess, Mrs. Thrale, grew femininely jealous of her celebrity. What business had Samuel Johnson, LL.D., to invent a new adjective for Mrs. Knowles's pieces of work, and to call them sutile pictures! Mrs. Thrale would be even with the pair of them. Aided by the long lisping s's of the period and her own sharp wit, she changed the long initial ſ to f, and declared that Dr. Johnson's word was futile! Needle-work is woman's work indubitably; and so, perhaps, is a sharp sally of the sort thus effected by saucy Mrs. Thrale!

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE future of the fashions depends on the future of politics in France. This assertion will appear paradoxical only to those who are not close observers of the signs of the times. The uncertainty in the domain of fashions, to which we are forced to certify, is only the echo and result of the uncertainty that prevails in the political world. Should this cease, we might expect with confidence to see the most radical and unexpected changes in the feminine toilette. For instance, should the Restoration be declared within a few months, its appearance would provoke an instantaneous revolution in fashion. Nothing that is now worn would be spared, and we should return at one bound to the toilettes of the Restoration, with their plain dresses without trimming, high coiffures, giraffe combs, and gigot sleeves. On the other hand, should the fusion of the two branches of the Bourbons prove abortive, and France be left in the provisional state in which it is at present, I predict with certainty that no fundamental change will be made in dress, and that Fashion will continue in the same provisional state, amusing itself only by varying a few details, just as the government changes now and then a prefect for pastime.

My conclusion is, therefore, that to know the state of the fashions in France it is necessary to study not the fashions, but the politics of the times, and to examine not the ladies' dresses, but the projects of the statesmen. It is not the dress-makers and milliners that decide the cut of garments, but the Chamber of Deputies, that rules the destinies of France and decrees the government to which the style shall conform. To this, indeed, may be traced the prevailing composite style—a faithful symbol of the coalition of parties, based on the fashions of the last years of the empire, while introducing into the manneristic and beribboned fashion of that sad historical epoch certain details borrowed from the Restoration and the monarchy of 1830. I repeat that there will be no decided change in fashion while the politics of the nation remain in statu quo.

You will understand from this glance at the situation how difficult it is at present to predict with certainty what will be worn. I can say that such and such dresses are in preparation for the coming winter, but I can not affirm that these dresses will remain as they are; for if France returns to the monarchy, the fashions will be revolutionized. Just now they promise to be very much the same as last winter. I pity the lovers of novelty, but it is not my fault that there is no notable change; it is the fault of the provisional government.

Crinoline has disappeared—that is well known; but I will add that even the stiff skirts that continued crinoline under another name are no longer worn, and that nothing remains but the bustle. But each dress has its own kind of bustle, which is inseparable from that particular toilette. As to dresses, I have nothing to add at this moment to the details I gave in my last letter, except that a great many cloth polonaises are in preparation, some plain and others embroidered. These polonaises are all straight, without looping or draping, and are open in front one-third of the way from the bottom. With them will be worn triple capes, the largest of which comes but a little below the waist—that is, the carrick—a souvenir and prestige of the Restoration. One of these polonaises which I saw lately was of steel gray cloth, simply edged with silk galloon of the same color, stitched on. There was no other trimming, except the cut steel buttons—another reminiscence of the Restoration.

Another polonaise was of olive bronze cloth, trimmed on the edge with embroidery worked in three shades of olive bronze worsted, representing oak leaves, the dentated edges of which formed the edge of the polonaise. A triple cape completed this garment, which was draped behind. The draping, embroidery, and peculiar color all carry us back to the last days of the last empire.

It is said that the chignon has had its day, and that masses of hair will no longer be worn. These will no longer be permitted, even to those who are so unfortunate as to have a fine head of hair. The chignon will be transformed rather than disappear, and will be arranged in loops and bands, with the addition of a high comb and ribbon bows.

The garment most generally worn at this moment, and which is destined to increase in popularity during the coming autumn, is the sleeveless spencer, in all materials, faille, satin, velvet, and for the winter entirely of fur, grebe, or ermine for light full-dress, and mink or black fur for darker and more simple toilettes. The shape of the spencer is quite plain, like that of a close-fitting vest, long, and with large flat basques. It will also be made of velvet, edged with a narrow band of fur or feathers. Ostrich feathers, short and of the natural color, will be most frequently used for this kind of trimming. The natural color, it will be remembered, is a dirty écru.

The effects proceeding from the combination of two colors are not yet exhausted. Most of the dresses now in preparation are of this kind. When two shades of the same color are not used, the neutral or negative color is employed for the principal part of the dress, and another positive color is used for the accessories, such as bindings, folds, bows, and linings. For instance, a dress of light écru faille was trimmed with pale blue faille. The skirt, which touched the ground, was entirely covered with graduated flounces, narrowing toward the waist. These flounces were gathered full on the sides and behind, but were almost plain on the front breadth or tablier. Each flounce was surmounted by another small flounce; the latter, which was of pale blue faille, served also as a border to the écru flounce. The waist was a short casaque, edged with pale blue. Small collar and cuffs of pale blue faille. Pouf with pale blue revers, simulating a basque.

Another fall toilette had a skirt of gray faille, trimmed in front with scalloped flounces of Persian lilac faille. Three of these flounces were straight, that is, were set in a horizontal line on the bottom and side breadths of the skirt. The tablier was covered half the way up with flounces set on in curves. Casaque of mauve faille, trimmed with scalloped flounces of gray faille.

Black velvet ribbon is still much used for trimming dresses. I will give an example of this style. Skirt touching the ground of bronze woolen serge, with tablier trimmed perpendicularly with black velvet ribbon, edged on each side with narrow galloon beaded with jet. The bottom of the skirt, the tablier excepted, is trimmed with a wide serge flounce. Above this, and covering the whole of the skirt, black velvet ribbon edged with galloon is set on in curves, each row ending at the tablier under a bow, formed of two loops and a cross-piece, without ends. The waist and sleeves are striped in the same manner with velvet ribbon.

For light toilettes for the demi-season—that is, for dinners and evening receptions—white grenadine is much used, either silk or wool, according to the degree of expense that is thought desirable. White silk canvas grenadine is extremely pretty. This is covered with flounces of the same material, edged with some comparatively bright color. Even bright colors are much toned down just now to suit the decrees of fashion. These white grenadine dresses are worn over a white silk skirt. The waist is low, half-high, or even à la militaire, with revers of the same color as that used for the flounces. For graver costumes black silk canvas grenadine is much in vogue. It is worn almost invariably over a black satin under dress. Common crêpe de laine of a comparatively dark color is used like these grenadines in like circumstances, and with the same conditions, the under dress of the same color as the over dress.

SNAKE FASCINATION.

THAT certain animals are endowed with the faculty of fascinating their prey, so that they become incapable of offering any resistance, is now generally admitted as an established fact; nevertheless there hangs over the subject a soupçon of mystery which induces most naturalists to avoid it altogether, or to declare their disbelief in a phenomenon which they have never taken the trouble to investigate. The mesmeric power is possessed by serpents in a very high degree, and is supposed to have its seat principally in the eye. There are those who cut the gordian knot by saying that the excessive lustre of this organ simply bewilders the victim; but this rough-and-ready method of solving the problem is hardly borne out by what is known of the method of fascination. A snake, when about to put forth its terrible power, remains perfectly motionless, with neck inflated and head erect, while the victim gradually approaches its enemy, till at last it is received with open jaws. It is easy to understand how a squirrel—poor little beast!—might be bewildered by the continued and voracious glare of a cobra; but surely such bewilderment would induce the squirrel to run away as fast as his legs could carry him, certainly not to march complacently to execution. No, it is very evident that "to fascinate" means something more than "to bewilder," save and except in certain milliners' shops, where a customer is very apt to get bewildered by the succession of "fascinating novelties" so pertinaciously thrust before her eyes. Then, again, we can not agree with Dr. Barton, who has investigated fascination as regards serpents, and who appears to think that birds—the objects on which snakes most frequently exercise their powers—are only subject to their attacks when they build on or near the ground in marshy and snake-frequented districts, where first the young birds in attempting to fly, and afterward the parents in defending their offspring, fall an easy prey to their expectant foes. No exhibition of mesmeric power is required in such a method of capture; in fact, it differs as much from true fascination as "chalk from cheese." Dr. Bird gives an apparently well authenticated instance of fascination exercised on a human being. It appears that two boys lighted by chance on a large black-snake, and one of them determined to discover whether the creature, so celebrated for its powers, could fascinate him. He accordingly advanced to within a few yards of the snake, which raised its head with a quick motion, and, as the lad says, something appeared to flash in his eyes like the rays of light thrown from a mirror when turned in the sunshine. The brilliancy dazzled his eyes and confused his brain, so that he fancied himself in a whirlpool, every turn of which brought him nearer to the centre. His comrade seeing him gradually approaching nearer and nearer to the snake, ran and dispatched it. It can hardly seem improbable that man should be fascinated by serpents, since we have on record several instances of such animals as antelopes and goats falling victims to the mesmeric faculty. There is a certain African snake, called the boomslange (Bucephalus capensis), which possesses no poison. It frequents trees, and is furnished with large eyes, and teeth directed backward, to enable it to hold its prey with greater firmness. The presence of one of these creatures in a tree is soon discovered by the birds of the neighborhood, which fly round it, uttering loud cries, until one, more panic-stricken than the rest, actually touches its jaws and is immediately snapped up. During these proceedings the snake has its body coiled round a bough, with its head raised ten or twelve inches, the mouth open, and the neck inflated. Apparently it is well aware of the terror excited by its own appearance, and tries to look as ferocious as possible, knowing that the more savage it appears the more food it will obtain.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XVIII.

A SOUTHERN lady very kindly sends the following recipe for glycerine lotion, which is refined and pleasant as well as useful. The pain occasioned by sunburned and freckled skin, often so troublesome to many of our fair readers, can be relieved, and the shining morning face of youth restored, by the application of glycerine lotion, made thus: Take one ounce of sweet almonds, or of pistachio-nuts, half a pint of elder or rose water, and one ounce of pure glycerine; grate the nuts, put the powder in a little bag of linen, and squeeze it for several minutes in the rose-water; then add the glycerine and a little perfume. The lotion may be used by wetting the face with it two or three times a day. This must be a grateful appliance of the toilette-table for a parched, rough skin. It should be allowed to dry thoroughly into the skin, when, if it feels sticky or pasty, it may be washed off with warm water.

In the sultry and oppressive weather of summer it is well to remember that the hot bath is of all others most cooling. No matter how heated the system may be, water as hot as can be borne is the safest and most efficient to relieve. One only wants to remain in it long enough to give every part of the body a thorough scrubbing with soap and a mohair wash-cloth, that cleanses the skin more thoroughly than even a brush. The hot water dissolves every particle of waste matter that clogs the pores, the rough cloth and soap remove it searchingly, and the towel is hardly laid aside before a delicious coolness passes upon one, and a freshness like that of a dewy summer morning. The dangers resulting from sudden checks to perspiration by plunging into cold water when overheated, or by sitting in a draught to cool, are avoided, and a greater sensation of coolness found by the use of the hot bath. People who suffer much in warm weather should reckon this a daily solace, and all enervating effects are averted by an instant's plunge into cool water of, say, seventy degrees. I say cool, for it certainly will feel as if iced after a bath of nearly a hundred and fifty degrees. In a common bath-room one may experience much of the real benefit of a Russian vapor bath.

It is hard that such a necessary requisite to the highest vigor should rank, as it does, among the luxuries. One can hardly imagine any addition to a fine house more desirable than that of a bathing hall, fitted up like those the Roman patricians added to their palaces, where any form of vapor or hot bath was at command. The public bath is hardly all that could be desired. Usually the bath-house is built in the court-yard, where tall houses on every side shut off the sunlight. The basement dressing-room is filled with narrow couches covered with light India rubber sheets, and is suggestive of nothing more pleasant than cast-off clothing, and rest measured by the bath clock, when one's pillow must be given up to another bather. There should be small dressing closets, as there are at swimming-baths, where one's clothes may be kept from contact with beds on which a thousand people rest in the course of a year. The reposing hall should be well lighted, paved with tiles, instead of being spread with bits of carpet to be kicked here and there; and there should be ample space between the couches. Every thing should convey the impress of space and of repose—of sunshine, for the sake of its reviving power on the body of the bather, and of refinement, for the soothing it always carries to the nerves.

From this huddled room the bather steps into one heated beyond summer heat, dark and dripping with moisture, with a plunge bath in the centre. The next has what seems like high marble steps running the length of each side to near the roof, with gratings let in the face of the staircase. The bather ascends one of these stony couches and lies down with his head on the slight elevation made every six feet or so for the purpose. Wrapped in a sheet already wet with moisture since leaving the dressing-room, a large sponge dipped in cold water at the back of his head, and another at his mouth and nose, he feels as if perspiration enough were already attained for sanitary purposes; but when, with a hiss and roar, the steam is let on through the gratings, the scene changes. Rolling vapor fills the room, so dense that every outline is shut out as completely as in the darkest night; the heat rises to suffocation, the new bather thinks, and he springs from his couch and rushes again and again to the douche in the wall to wet his throbbing head, and into the next room, which seems cool as a water-fall, for a gasp of air that he can breathe. The older and more experienced bathers lie still, and declare that, with head down and the wet sponge pressed to the nose, they can breathe without difficulty. What was perspiration becomes literally a flowing away in rills and sheets of water that drip from the bather's reeking sides. One seems to have turned to jelly, and submits helplessly to the scrubbing-brush and final douche with water at eighty degrees, which makes one almost shiver by contrast. The outer room is refreshing in its coolness, and one wraps a dry sheet and blanket round him and lies down on the India rubber cloth in dreamy indifference to all the rest of the world. What follows is Elysium. Every ache and pain is exorcised, every care dispelled for the time, in the trance of entire rest that takes possession. It is not sleep nor dream, but delicious inertness, with only sense enough left to let one know how happy it is. This is the dolce far niente the Italians aspire to, the sum of all delight possible to sensation. Passion, rapture, have no charms that equal it. It is the death and absolute extinction of all pain. After the reluctant waking and going out into the sunlight again one seems to have found a new self. The feather-like lightness and elasticity of every limb amount almost to delirium, so different are they from their usual dullness. If this freedom that feels like flying is simply health, how far gone toward death we must be in our ordinary existence!

In closing these papers it is proper to notice the inquiries of a few correspondents who have not had the luck in using the tar and olive-oil cosmetic that they could have wished. To those who find that its application brings out a fearful crop of pimples and turns the skin yellow, there is nothing to be said but that the ointment has been a friend to them, in detecting a state of the blood that is any thing but safe. People of sedentary habits, who pay little attention to their food, are not aware in what a vitiated state their blood may be for want of sunshine, good food, and exercise. Its torpid current leaves no visible mark of disease on the surface; the morbid humors concentrate in the vital organs, and finally appear in the form of chronic disorders. Consumption leaves the skin clear and brilliant, because the foul matters which ordinarily pass off through the skin are eating away the life in ulcers beneath. The tar brings these morbidities to the surface, and one application leaves a face in a sorry state sometimes. The writer knew three ladies of different families who tried the recipe at the same time with frightful results. The reason was, they were all in the state when a dose of blood purifier would have had the same effect. One of the party kept on using the lotion, and her face became smooth and improved after trying it three or four times. When people perspire freely this unhappy effect is seldom noticed. Apropos of this, a few lines of a letter from Rev. W. H. H. Murray, the author of the Hand-Book of the Adirondacks, will be of interest. A lady who was puzzled by the effect of her cosmetic wrote to him about it, knowing that he was familiar with its use in the mountains, and received this merry answer:

"I have had a hearty laugh over your perplexity. All I know is the mixture was common sailors' tar and sweet-oil, with the consistency of sirup. Our party, ladies and gentlemen both, have used it freely for years in the woods, and the ladies have always declared that it made their skin as soft as satin. Certain it is, it never caused any rash in their case."

It may be noted, too, that delicate, fair-skinned women are the very ones on whom the cosmetic will have the effect of drawing humors to the surface. Heavens! how many of this sort there are in the world, too—pale, shadowy as Sèvres porcelain, fragile of bone and tender of skin, no more useful than wish-bones of a Christmas chicken! They have intense souls; it is a pity they have not enough of bodies to hold them. Is there not wit enough in the world to conjure flesh to the bones and strength to the muscles of this great army of weak women?

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

FROM "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS."

THERE is something sustaining in the very agitation that accompanies the first shocks of trouble, just as an acute pain is often a stimulus, and produces an excitement which is transient strength. It is in the slow, changed life that follows—in the time when sorrow has become stale, and has no longer an emotive intensity that counteracts its pain; in the time when day follows day in dull unexpectant sameness, and trial is a dreary routine—it is then that despair threatens; it is then that the peremptory hunger of the soul is felt, and eye and ear are strained after some unlearned secret of our existence which shall give to endurance the nature of satisfaction.

Surely the only courtship unshaken by doubts and fears must be that in which the lovers can sing together. The sense of mutual fitness that springs from the two deep notes fulfilling expectation just at the right moment between the notes of the silvery soprano, from the perfect accord of descending thirds and fifths, from the preconcerted loving chase of a fugue, is likely enough to supersede any immediate demand for less impassioned forms of agreement. The contralto will not care to catechise the bass; the tenor will foresee no embarrassing dearth of remark in evenings spent with the lovely soprano.

It is precisely the proudest and most obstinate men who are the most liable to shift their position and contradict themselves: every thing is easier to them than to face the simple fact that they have been thoroughly defeated, and must begin life anew.

There is something strangely winning to most women in that offer of the firm arm: the help is not wanted physically at that moment, but the sense of help—the presence of strength that is outside them and yet theirs—meets a continual want of the imagination.

CHINESE FORTUNE-TELLERS.

IN nearly all lands and all ages fortune-telling has, in some form or other, been highly popular, from the instinctive desire of the human race to become acquainted with the hidden and unknown. Every school-boy knows how greatly divination was held in honor among the ancient Greeks and Romans; has heard of the power which the "medicine man" wields in the Indian village; and has perhaps dreamed of the black-eyed gypsy, who with seductive smile might some day accost him in a quiet, shady lane, and offer, for a slight consideration, to tell him of coming luck. In our own prosaic times and matter-of-fact country, however, gypsies and other professors of the art of reading the hidden decrees of Providence seem to have fallen on evil days, and when they venture on too obtrusive a practice of their vocation, find themselves an object of extreme solicitude to the myrmidons of the law; but in China the case is different, for throughout the length and breadth of all the eighteen provinces of that vast and populous empire fortune-telling flourishes, and is quite a matter of every-day life. The Chinese being an eminently superstitious race, are naturally eager to pry into futurity, and consult their favorite oracle upon almost every conceivable occasion. A Chinaman can neither be married nor buried, nor enter upon any business of the least importance, without the aid of one of the fortune-telling fraternity, so that it is no wonder that with them the craft is prosperous.

Probably the most popular method of telling fortunes is by the eight characters which give the exact time of a person's birth—two representing the year of the cycle, two the month, two the day, and two the "period" of the day at which the event occurred. Many of those who follow this branch of the profession are blind. They are led about the streets by boys, and have commonly two ways of proclaiming their calling, one being by means of two small bamboo clappers, with which they make certain well-known sounds, and the other by a yueh-ting, which is a circular piece of copper hung by two strings to a stick, a second stick being hung between the strings; this pendulous stick, when struck against the copper, produces a peculiar noise, which any one who has ever been in a Chinese town will at once call to mind. The peripatetic fortune-teller is nearly always blind, and he is said by the Chinese to "calculate fortunes," for which he gets about a penny; while those who, not being afflicted with loss of sight, establish themselves in shops, and wait for people to come and consult them, are said to "see fortunes," and being a somewhat superior class, they charge a double fee. They all make their predictions by reference to books, which teach them how to interpret the combinations of the horary characters, and whether they should deduce a propitious or unpropitious conclusion therefrom. Of course the blind man labors under considerable disadvantages in having to trust much more to his memory than is the case with his brother professor. To this class of fortune-tellers generally belong those who, when negotiations for a marriage are being opened, are consulted to determine whether the eight characters of both parties are sufficiently in harmony for them to become husband and wife; also those who choose lucky or propitious days for the transaction of important business. The aid of these soothsayers is invoked by the builder and proprietor of houses and hongs, and by the head-men in the erection of temples, etc. In the case of temples the ages of the elders and head-men of the neighborhood are made known to one who is able to divine what month, day, and hour will be lucky for the performance of the several kinds of labor connected with the erection of the proposed temple. In the matter of building a house or hong only the age of the owner and proprietor is made known to the fortune-teller. He applies the rules of his art to decide on the precise hour which will be favorable for beginning to "move the earth for the foundations, for putting up the ridge-pole in its place, for hanging the great or main door of honor, for digging the well, and making the fire-place in the kitchen."

A very popular, and at the same time the cheapest, kind of fortune-telling is by means of a bird and slips of paper. The professor of the black-art who adopts this method of divination, and is willing to satisfy the inquiring mind for the modest remuneration of about a half-cent of our money, "traverses the streets in search of employment. He carries in one hand a piece of the small end of a cow's horn and a bamboo stick. These two are tied together loosely at one end, and he manages to strike or clap them together so as to make a peculiar sound. In the other hand, or suspended from a front button of his coat, he has a small cage, containing a little bird of a particular species. He always takes with him on these professional excursions sixty-four small sheets of paper, on each of which is sketched a figure of a god, bird, beast, etc., and on every sheet is also written a short verse of poetry, usually four lines, each of seven characters. These sheets are folded up in such a manner that the pictures and the poetry are not visible. When any one applies to have his fortune told, he arranges the sixty-four pieces of paper on a table or on the ground, and places the bird-cage near them. He then opens the door, and the bird hops out and picks up one of the sheets with his beak. This the wise man opens and explains to the applicant."

Another class of peripatetic fortune-tellers devote themselves to inspecting the physiognomy. They are to be known by certain characters that are inscribed on a sachel which they carry with them. They select a favorable and convenient spot in the street where they can spread out a chart, which they consult in reference to the personal peculiarities of their customers. They carefully inspect every feature of the person who wishes to look into futurity, and compare together what they term the "five governors"—that is, the ears, eyes, eyebrows, nose, and mouth—to see whether they are in harmony, and whether the combined expression is good or not. They note the way in which the applicant walks and sits down, and so foretell his future. Furthermore, they examine the length of each finger, and pay particular attention to the lines or creases in the palm of the hand, taking careful note of its color and thickness.

Yet another mode of gaining an insight into the decrees of fate is by dissecting the written character. Those who practice this branch of the art take up a position at the side of some frequented street, where they spread out a cloth, and arrange their writing materials. They also have with them a box containing a number of pieces of paper, folded up, on which a single character is written; their fee is but small, being usually about a cent. The inquirer into futurity chooses two of these pieces of paper, which the fortune-teller opens; he then dissects the characters on them, writing out their various component parts. He next talks over the matter about which his customer is anxious for information, working in the meaning of the fresh characters obtained by the subdivision of the two originally selected at random, often increasing the number by skillfully adding strokes to, and thus changing the meaning of, the characters. Upon the materials thus got together he founds an oracular response as to the coming events about which he has been consulted.

Those who profess to reveal the secrets of futurity "by the use of the tortoise-shell and three ancient cash," have shops or offices, where they may be consulted by those who prefer this method of ascertaining their fortunes. The cash commonly used are a certain kind coined during the Tang dynasty (some twelve hundred years ago). They first light incense sticks and candles, placing them before the picture of an old man, whom they worship as the deity who presides over this kind of divination. They then take the cash and put them into a tortoise-shell, which they shake once or twice before the picture, invoking the aid and presence of the god. They next empty the cash out, and taking them in one hand, they strike the shell gently three times with them, repeating at the same time forms of incantation. The cash are again put into the shell, and shaken as before three times, when they are turned out upon a plate, and careful observation is made of the manner in which they have chanced to fall. After noting how many have the reverse side upward, the same cash are put into the shell, and a similar operation is repeated once and again. At the conclusion of the third shaking, and the third observation of the relative positions of the coins, the fortune-tellers proceed to compare the diagrams with the "five elements" according to the abstruse and intricate rules of this species of divination. After a tedious process of observations and comparisons, they pronounce judgment on the matter under investigation.

What is termed "geomancy," in so far as it has to do with the selection of a fortunate burial-place by a critical examination of the earth and scenery, comes fairly into the category of fortune-telling, for the Chinese consider that the future prosperity of the family of the deceased depends greatly upon a lucky place of sepulture being chosen. The Chinese expression for this is Fêng-shui—that is, wind and water; and whatever, in the opinion of the wise man, interferes with the Fêng-shui, is looked upon as very unlucky. It may be interesting to mention in passing that this superstition with regard to the Fêng-shui is one of the great obstacles to the introduction of telegraphs, railways, etc., into the country.

The man who "looks at the wind and water," armed with a compass and other implements of his art, accompanies a near relative of the deceased to some spot in the hills which is thought suitable for a burial-place, and he then proceeds to make his observations secundum artem. He notes "the nature of the ground, the color of the soil, its relative position to surrounding hills, valleys, streams," etc. If large rocks are found in the earth, or if the spot prove to be wet, it is at once condemned, and a fresh search has to be made for a place where the soil is dry and of a yellowish color. This species of fortune-telling is the most tedious and expensive of those which we have described, but the Chinese attach extreme importance to it.

EVENING DRESS.

EVENING DRESS.

THIS full-dress evening toilette is of groseille, or currant red faille, with an over-skirt of white Chambéry gauze. The demi-train skirt is of silk, with a Spanish flounce. The gauze over-skirt has a pleating on the edge, and is caught to the silk in horizontal puffs by garlands of variegated roses, red, pink, and yellow, with embrowned leaves. These garlands surround the whole skirt, except on the sides where the upper skirt is opened and forms medallions edged with a black lace ruche. The low round Josephine waist of silk has puffed gauze sleeves, and roses on the neck and bust. Roses are above the high puffed coiffure. The front of the hair is parted in the middle, and waved on the forehead. Pearl ear-rings and necklace with ruby medallion. Wide gold bracelets, and a large Trianon fan.

LAVENDER CULTURE.

COMPARATIVELY few persons are aware to how large an extent the culture of lavender for commercial purposes is carried on within a radius of thirty miles from London. In the county of Surrey alone there are nearly three hundred and fifty acres of land devoted to its growth, and the total extent of the lavender fields in the London district can not fall far short of five hundred acres. When three years old the plant is at its best, and when it reaches the age of seven years it has made so much wood that it is more profitable to uproot it and set a fresh plant. The harvest-time depends much on the state of the weather, but it usually commences about the first week in August. The flowers are cut with a sickle, bound up in small sheaves, and immediately carried to the distillery. There the stalks are cut off, leaving but little more than the flowers, by which the bouquet of the oil, afterward extracted, is much improved, though the quantity of the oil is sensibly diminished. Much care is needed on the part of those who handle the sheaves in the distilling house to guard against being stung by the bees which remain attached to the flowers. The temperance, industry, and providence of these insects are proverbial; yet their behavior in lavender fields, especially toward the end of the season, when the flowers are fully developed, can not be too severely reprobated. So careless are they of the good reputation they have earned that they refuse to leave their luscious feast even when it is laid on the trimming bench, and hundreds are thrown into the still, notwithstanding the efforts to dislodge them, in a state of helpless intoxication. When the oil is first distilled, it has a peculiar empyreumatic odor, but by being kept in bottles for twelve months it loses much of its harshness. It is still, however, unfit to be used as a perfume in its natural state. In order to convert the essential oil into what is known as lavender-water, it is mixed with from twenty to forty times its bulk of spirit, and with just a trace of neroli, or other essential oil, according to the taste of the compounder.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ELOISE.—Sleeveless jackets will be worn again. A black velvet sleeveless jacket will be very pretty with the dresses you mention. Make it by the simplest jockey basque pattern, and merely edge it with a piping fold of silk.

TEXAS.—Your samples of lace are all cotton woven imitations of Valenciennes.

AN OLDER SISTER.—Full directions for making the girl's patterns are given in the Bazar in which they are illustrated. You did not send your full address.

MRS. F.—The shirt and blouse waists are usually plain loose blouses. Pleated waists are formed of box-pleats.

CLARA BLONDE.—Get two shades of slate blue cashmere for your fall suit. Read articles to "Ugly Girls." Put two tea-spoonfuls of soda in a quart of tepid water and wash your hair with it.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Outside pockets are more for ornament than use.

ANZALETTA.—We have no cut paper pattern of the pervenche silk costume. Deep violet or else gray will look well with lavender.

W. R. L.—The brilliantine and beaver mohair are favorite fabrics of the alpaca kind. Make your dress with a polonaise by pattern given in Supplement of Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI.

LOST HOPE.—Make the skirt of your suit of London smoke silk with bias bands of wine-color down the front breadths, and flounces of smoke-color behind, with bias bands for heading. Then have an over-skirt of wine-color, with a sleeveless basque of the same, and coat sleeves of smoke-color. The silk skirt and Swiss polonaise will be suitable. Arrange your hair by any of the models given in the Bazar that you find becoming. We do receive half-yearly subscriptions.

C. A. S.—A mantle of black cashmere trimmed with fringe or else guipure lace would be suitable for a lady of sixty years. A plain one would cost $25.

LENA.—The simplest form of invitation for evening parties is now used. The formula is, "Miss A B C presents her compliments, and requests the pleasure of Miss D E F's company on Tuesday, March 5, at 8 P.M."

PERPLEXED SUBSCRIBER.—Your shades of green are good and appropriate, but the fabric is very poor. Make by Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Wear white muslin or else white twilled silk neck-ties. Green, buff, or brown gloves.

FIDGET.—Get camel's-hair or else cashmere of dark myrtle green for your polonaise. Make by pattern of blouse-polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI. Trim with bias corded silk. The Shah turban of felt trimmed as you suggest will be appropriate.

M. E. B.—The oxidized buckle and chain is not inappropriate with your mourning dress, though jet is in better taste.

C. F. A.—Make your dress by the Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Get also a dark cashmere suit and one of black silk. Leave other purchases to be made here. Get a round hat of black chip for traveling.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Make your pretty Japanese silk by the Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI., on page 569. Trim with bias bands of blue silk, and have a blue silk vest. Make a Gabrielle wrapper of your plaid poplin. Cut a straight basque front for your sleeveless jacket. A suit of dark cashmere is what you need for fall and winter.

A. B. C.—Of course a bride sends invitations to the bridegroom's parents as well as her own.

CLARA.—Put two gathered flounces ten inches deep on your black silk. Add puffs up the front breadth if you like.

BLANK.—At a dinner the leading lady guest should be seated at the right hand of the host, and the leading gentleman guest at the right hand of the hostess. —Redingotes will be worn this fall. Read the New York Fashions in Bazar No. 37, Vol. VI., for descriptions of fall and winter bonnets, and don't use prepared chalk on your face.

SUBSCRIBER.—We can not undertake to recommend either physicians or boarding-houses.

AN ENGLISH LADY.—Leave your daughter's card with your own when calling on friends, and avail yourself of every opportunity to introduce her personally to them.

M. S. W.—We furnish covers for the Bazar at 75 cents each. A binder will probably charge about the same sum for putting them on. If you wish to use the patterns on the Supplements, you can do so to better advantage if not bound in the volume, but kept in a separate portfolio. Back numbers are furnished by the publishers at ten cents each.

TWENTY QUESTIONS.—The illustration of a suit you have selected on page 516 of Bazar No. 33, Vol. VI., is one of the most stylish models you can find for a fall suit. The standing collar, ruff, and other accessories of the basque are particularly good, and are found on fall importations. The gray silk suit will look well worn precisely as you describe it. A dark blue cashmere redingote would answer with both gray and black silk skirts, and will be a fashionable garment this season. If you object to this contrast, you can get a cashmere of the same gray shade, or else a dark iron gray camel's-hair redingote. A pretty quaint little mantle of gray camel's-hair embroidered as you suggest for the polonaise with a darker shade, and some yak braid with curled fringe, would also make your gray suit stylish and warm enough for autumn.

M. A. P.—Trim your glossy black silk with folds and flounces of the silk of the dress. The Turkish toweling fabric is not suitable for trimming—it is used for redingotes.

ELLA.—The Blouse-Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. VI., is suitable for grenadine. Trim it with guipure or thread lace. Make your amber skirt a short demi-train.

MRS. C. C. C.—As you have invited your friends to call upon the guest who is staying with you, take it for granted their call is meant for her, and take her to the parlor at once.

MRS. J. T.—Scallop your wrapper all around, bind the scallops with blue silk, and put a pleating of blue silk three inches deep underneath the scallops to show in the space between them.

MRS. L. Q.—Remove the satin from your cashmere suit and trim with repped silk, velvet, or else yak braid. Alter the polonaise to a close-fitting garment. Read "Fall Redingotes" in New York Fashions of the present number of the Bazar.

VIENNA PREMIUMS AND SEWING-MACHINES.

WE copy the following from the New York Herald of August 12th:

THE REGION OF THE SEWING-MACHINES.

If Dante had been gifted with the spirit of prophecy, he would have set apart a region in his inferno to illustrate the rivalries and emotions of the sewing-machine manufacturers of the United States. The conflicts, the misunderstandings, the ambitions, the yearnings for approbation and notoriety, the odd, incessant efforts to win medals of progress, and renown, and merit, and honor which inspire the gentlemen who manage this industry, have given constant motion and life to the American department. So when His Majesty came into the sewing-machine department, every effort was made by our Commissioners to introduce him to each special machine and explain its peculiar qualities. Let me give you a list of the machines in the catalogue, so you may know what His Majesty was asked to do. First, the Howe Machine Company, New York; then the Singer Manufacturing Company, New York; the Whitney Sewing-Machine, Paterson, N. J.; the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, New York; the Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, Clevelond, Ohio; the Wilcox and Gibbs Sewing-Machine Manufacturing Company, New York; Ezra Morrill & Co., Derby Line, Vt.; George N. Bacon & Co., London, England; the Weed Sewing-Machine Company, Hartford, with the patent effective stop motion of Fairchild's attachment; the Secor Sewing-Machine Company, New York; the Mackay Sole and Shoe Machine, Cambridge; the Universal Feed Sewing-Machine Company. Every exhibitor expected a special visit from the Emperor, and His Majesty, with a patience and courtesy that should be commended, endeavored to visit them all.

After waiting a few minutes to comprehend the explanations made to him of the advance of the industry so largely represented in America, the Emperor continued his tour of the other departments, especially inquiring of his attendants what different principles were presented by each separate machine, in what respect one machine differed from the other—all of which was explained to him, ESPECIALLY THE NEW PRINCIPLE OF THE PATENT STOP, OR THE APPLICATION INVENTED BY MR. FAIRCHILD, AND NOW OWNED BY THE WEED MACHINE CO., BY WHICH THE ACTION OF THE NEEDLE IS ARRESTED BY THE PRESSURE OF A SPRING WITHOUT STOPPING THE MOTION OF THE WHEEL.

In the New York Herald of Aug. 19th we find awards were made as follows:

To the Wilson Sewing-Machines of Cleveland.

Elias Howe Sewing-Machine Company, FOR SEWING AND STITCHING.

Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing-Machine Company of New York (for BEST SINGLE THREAD SEWING-MACHINE.)

The Weed Sewing-Machine Company (for BEST STOP MOTION APPLIED TO SEWING-MACHINE TREADLES.)

The Wilson Sewing-Machine Company being the only exhibitor that received a grand prize medal for the best Sewing-Machine, and Medals of honor.—[Com.]
